will not only lick all the paint off your front door, but will gladly eat your doormat as well."

So Willard Parker went to New York and got himself a job as the matinee idol in "Lady in the Dark" with Gertrude Lawrence. (The same part, incidentally, which gave gorgeous Hunk O' Mature to Hollywood.) The road show played to the aristocracy of motion pictures when it reached Hollywood, and before his alarm clock could burble the following morning, Mr. Parker was the recipient of SEVEN motion picture offers.

By that time Max Arno had moved to Columbia, so Willard Parker looked up his old friend and told him how good his advice had been. Somewhat diffidently he mentioned his covey of offers, adding that if Max Arno wanted him to sign with Columbia, Max had first choice.

And that, chums, is an example of loyalty seldom found anywhere.

THE LOOEY'S CUTIE:

They were making a training film at the First Motion Picture Unit of the Army Air Corps, which is domiciled in Culver City. The extras needed for the particular street scene (being shot at night) had been supplied from the ranks of the families and friends of the men stationed at "Fort Roach."

One of the G.I.'s said to another, "Look over there and you'll see the smoothest babe you've feasted eyes on for a long time. Mmm, what a number!"

The second khaki took a long, fur-bearing look, then corrected the connotation of his glance. "Jiggers," he said, "that's the lieutenant's wife."

Brenda Marshall, knowing that Bill Holden was soon to be transferred, had been spending as much time with him as possible, even working until four in the morning as an unpaid extra in a training film.

FAN BAN:

On the set of "And Now Tomorrow" Loretta Young was showing Alan Ladd a letter she had just received from an irate fan, to wit: "Apparently you misread my letter. I asked for a photograph of you with your hair cut short, not hanging around your shoulders like unmown hay. I can't understand why you can't give me the kind of picture I want. I am returning this photograph because I am entirely dissatisfied with it."

If you know anyone who would write such a letter, how about giving him or her a brief chat on Manners Among Movie Fans?

MATTERS DOMESTIC:

When Bob Hutton and Natalie Thompson were married, they received such a glitter of wedding gifts that Mr. and Mrs. Cary Grant decided to withhold their present until Bob and Natalie could take inventory and decide what they needed to complete their housekeeping equipment.

Recently Cary said to Bob (of whom he had grown very fond while they were working together in "Destination Tokyo"), "Have you and Natalie decided what you need yet?"

Bob nodded. "Natalie thinks she'd like a pressure cooker," he confided in all the innocence of the non-shopping newlywed.

Mrs. Grant, with a patrol of friends who glory in a handicapped hunt, is still searching the local scene diligently—including all secondhand stores.

of one of Kay's neighbors. She has been unable to secure a telephone, so Clark—in calling her—had to dial the number of an M-G-M employee, who would then have Clark hold the wire while the neighbor or his wife rushed around the corner to fetch Kay to answer.

The moving van drew up before the low rambling bungalow, and a bright-haired girl came running out to welcome her delivery of furniture: one stove and one bed.

To date, these two items represent the total purchases of George Montgomery and Dinah Shore. As George is away on training film assignments most of the time, Dinah has remained in the apartment she has long shared with her girl friends. When she has a spare moment, she rushes out and shops for household fixtures, but TAWGO,* you know. There is very little to be had.

*There's A War Going On.

A SHOT OF B & B:

(Brief dialogues on the "Road to Utopia" set: The scene is one in which Crosby is making his usual brand of lackadaisical love to Dorothy Lamour. During a kiss, Captain Howard arrives as a set visitor.)

Hope: Jiggers, Crosby, here comes the Captain.

Crosby: Oh, the guy with TWO chips on his shoulders.

(Scene in which Bob Hope is feeding a large sheep dog originally named Curly.)

Hope: Look, Veronica, when you come to an elbow, it's mine.

(Scene in which Hope and Crosby, stripped to the waist and covered with grime, are stoking a boiler on a freighter in northern waters. Suddenly a door opens, and a character in white tie, tails, top hat and cane strolls through the stoke hole.)

The stranger: Could I trouble one of you for a light?

Hope: Sure, sure. (He lights the cigarette for the guy, then does a double take.) Say, where do you think you're going?

The stranger: Just taking a shortcut through here to my own set.

FURTHER REVELATIONS ABOUT A PAIR OF WONDERFUL GUYS:

Because of the gradually increasing number of servicemen who were visiting the "Road to Utopia" set, and because neither Bob nor Bing could be persuaded to resist ad libs toward their khaki audience—which promptly responded with laughter so deafening that production was being held up day after day—Paramount had to close the set, i.e., forbid any visitors whatsoever.

This ban had been in effect for several days when Bob, in passing through the main gate, noticed that a little cluster of G.I.'s had just been turned away by the gateman.

"Say, how about it?" he asked. "Why can't these guys go through the studio at least?"

"Orders from the front office," said the officer.

"Have you ever had orders to hold a foxhole, no matter what happened?" Bob asked.

The G.I.'s followed Bob through the gates.

AND BING:

The Crosby kid has always refused to lend his name to advertising tie-ups, but Bob caught him posing for a series of national cigarette ads. "All your old modesty gone up in smoke, huh!" he cracked.

Of course Bing doesn't need or want the publicity, but he really wanted the deal he got out of posing—One million smokes to be sent free to the troops serving overseas.

OPPORTUNE TUNE:

Panting, this department rushes forward with an answer to the burning question, "How did 'Shoo-Shoo Baby' happen to be written?"

It seems that Lena Horne was working at the Hollywood Canteen one night and became somewhat bored by the attitude of some of the players who were maneuvering for position on the program. One man didn't want to follow a certain girl because their patter was too similar; another girl didn't want to follow so-and-so, because both of them were blondes, and each felt that a brunette interspersed would enhance the attractions of all. All in all the broken field running was pretty grim.

As Miss Horne was leaving the Canteen with Phil Moore, she mentioned her weariness at such goings-on. "Shoosh, Baby," said Phil, "it's all part of the war effort. The soldiers see only the finished production, which looks smooth. I guess everybody gets a little rough behind scenes because it's in the air. Just shoosh, Baby."

And that, kiddies, is how popular songs are born.

TEASE & REPARTEES:

Luscious Maria Montez, beautifully gowned as usual, and wearing on her ears a pair of tiny solid gold bees sent to her from overseas by husband Jean Pierre Aumont, stepped onto the platform at the National Press Club in Washington. From the appreciative male audience arose a series of two-toned whistles.

When a measure of silence had been regained, Maria said softly into the microphone, "In my country, when a man whistles at a girl it is an insult."

The silence deepened into abashed gloom. "But," continued Maria, "I am not in my country."

Residents of Atlanta, hundreds of miles away, are still wondering what that explosive noise could have been.

BAG GAG:

A friend of Ray Milland's dropped in, several months ago, to tell that charming Welsh gentleman and his wife good-by. The Milland's were leaving for a brief New York vacation, so Mrs. Milland was packing. Ray, contrariwise, had been reading, his neck sunk into the back of a lounge, his feet propped on an ottoman. "Pack?" he said in answer to the visitor's question. "Sure, I'm going to pack later on. I know exactly what I need, and it will take me just 20 minutes to stow it in a bag." This comment was typical.

Mr. Milland, world traveler, learned the "travel light" slogan early in life and has always abided by it. When his wife, who is expected to carry on the star-wife tradition, takes a hat bag, jewel box, make-up kit and two large cases, Ray is astounded. When his male friends show up at the station with a Gladstone and two wardrobe cases, he is amazed. "What on earth do you think you can't buy, instead of taking it along with you?" he likes to ask.

Sooo . . . when the troupe with whom he was going overseas, gathered at the station, Ray—as usual—had two small bags. One of the girls arrived with three bags, a hat-carrier and a small trunk made necessary because of her dancing costumes and shoe changes. Another girl arrived with several week-end cases and a fortnighter in which her evening gowns (to delight the troops) were tissue-wrapped. Another had all the usual bags, plus an accordion.

The tour arranger looked over the situation, then turned to Mr. Milland. "One person in

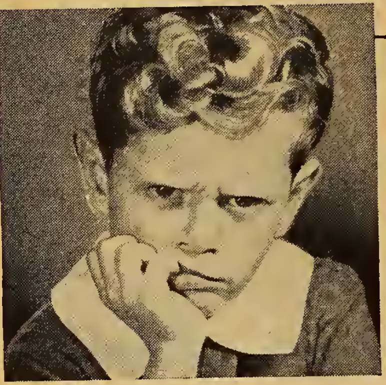
If Your Child
HATES VEGETABLES



try giving him Ovaltine

SCIENCE has proved there are certain food elements everyone needs for health. If there aren't enough of them in a child's food, serious things happen, such as poor appetite—faulty nerves, bad teeth—perhaps worse! Stunted growth, soft bones, defective eyesight.

Ovaltine supplies food elements frequently deficient in ordinary diets. Three glasses daily, made with milk as directed, provide a child's full minimum requirement of appetite Vitamin B₁, Vitamins A, D and G, and Minerals Calcium, Phosphorus and Iron—also supply niacin, pantothenic acid, pyridoxine. In addition it provides the basic food substances —complete proteins to build muscle, nerve and body cells—high-energy foods for vitality and endurance. It thus acts as an insurance against food deficiencies that retard appetite and normal growth.

So—if your child eats poorly, hates vegetables, or is thin and nervous, turn to Ovaltine.

each group is always appointed to look after the baggage throughout the trip," he told the man who hates baggage. "Since you are the only man in this troupe, I presume that duty falls to you."

BOGEY BACK:

Humphrey Bogart, having returned from his overseas jaunt, is currently at work at Warners' in "To Have and Have Not," in which Dolores Moran is his leading lady.

Reporting on his experiences, he says that troops asked three questions: 1) Are we going to get back to The States, only to find that they've foisted prohibition on us? 2) Can you encourage the folks at home to send us books, letters and chocolate bars? 3) When is Annie Sheridan coming over here?

Bogart's answers were 1) I don't think so. 2) Books and letters, yes—but is that a gag about chocolate bars? 3) Annie has had all her inoculatory shots and has been fingerprinted, cross-examined and entirely identified so that she is entirely ready to make the trip as soon as so ordered. And, in accordance with Mayo Methot's suggestion, Annie has collected umptee-sirteen gadgets to wear on her head. From the time the girls leave New York until they return to The States, it is practically impossible to get a shampoo, so seasoned entertainers take bandanas, snoods, clusters of flowers and collections of bows to gussy up their weary hair.

POSTAL PATENT PAPA:

Each Sunday, after Walter Pidgeon completed his radio broadcast, he returned to his car only to find the front seat littered with letters from fans. There were requests for photographs, for autographs, even for some of Mr. Pidgeon's cast-off haberdashery.

One Sunday recently, however, Mr. Pidgeon returned to find absolutely no mail of any sort in his car. Running his finger around his collar, he thought with a grin, "Hmm—I must be slipping." But, as he backed out, the station attendant came running over.

"Did you see my invention?" he asked with a grin. And he pointed to the small, neat mail box attached to the Pidgeon car door. Lettered on the device was the admonition, "Deposit Fan Mail Here."

QUICKIES:

When Sonny Tufts started "So Proudly We Hail"—his first movie—he was given a set of soldier's dog tags (identification discs, as if you didn't know). As a G.I. he had to wear them in every scene—Army regulation. That picture made Sonny a star, so now he has a sentimental feeling about his dog tags. He wore them during the civilian picture "Government Girl" and, as a military man, he is again wearing them in "I Love a Soldier." Stamped on the tags is: "Paramount Property Department, Hollywood, California."

* * *

One of his fellow inductees nudged the slim guy with the ingratiating freckles and the dimples. "Hi, California," he said. "The last time I saw you, you were having yourself a time at the 'Stage Door Canteen.' Whatcha doing here?"

"Being inducted," said Lon McCallister, trying on another blouse at Fort MacArthur.

THE LITTLEST LADD

Alana was four months old. (On her part, that is. The guy fell in love at sight). And in true movie style, it blossomed out of an initial misunderstanding.

Alan, in the service then, had just returned from duty in Walla Walla. First thing, he raced up to see his kid who lay in her crib, minding her own business. A voice shattered the peace. She wasn't used to the sound of male voices, and Alan's is particularly deep. The fact that it was saying "Hello, honey" didn't register. All she heard were the unfamiliar vibrations, and they terrified her. So she screamed. The closer he came, the louder she screamed. Mr. Ladd can take a hint. He backed away, and his stricken look is something Sue will never forget.

"My baby doesn't like me," said the tough guy. Sue didn't know which of the two to comfort first.

love affair . . .

Once they'd both recovered from the shock, Alan planned his campaign. He'd go up and stand beside her without talking—sort of sending out beams of good will in the hope they might penetrate. He'd hand her toys she was fond of. The time she grabbed his finger, his heart turned over. But by now she had him so bulldozed that when he opened his mouth, the voice came out strangled. So she screamed again—

It took him about a week to make the grade. In another week she was falling all over him. He also became her favorite pin-up boy. At sight of his picture, she starts yelling "Da-da" and strains out of Rinsje's arms to kiss it.

Like sensible parents, Sue and Alan try to be objective about their child. Rinsje holds with no such nonsense. Alana's the best, the most brilliant and beautiful of babies, and that settles that. Her parents point out that she's small for her age. "Look at those legs!" snaps Rinsje. "Like two little trees." They bemoan her indifference to food. "She eats fine," declares Rinsje. "Maybe a little slow. All good people eat slow."

Rinsje's from Holland, blonde and laughing and comfortable. Technically, she's the cook. But no nurse engaged by the Ladds ever had Rinsje's magical way with a baby. She wouldn't of course interfere with a nurse. All she'd do was look scornful at them. If the nurse couldn't get Alana to eat, Rinsje would pick her up and sing her a song. "I have such a voice," she explains, "that when I sing, everybody runs away. Except the baby. She listens to all my Holland songs, she understands and she eats."

Alan swears that his daughter thinks in a Dutch accent. "Call her sweetheart, and she won't give you a tumble. But say 'svithheart' and she's jelly in your hands."

So at last Sue got someone in to help with the cooking, leaving Rinsje free to look after her lamb.

The lamb takes after her father. She has his blue eyes, his blonde hair, his direct glance. (On the last point, there's a family difference of opinion. Alan calls it her mother's determined look. Sue calls it Little-Gun-for-Hire). Alan's face is long now, but baby pictures show a round little puss like his daughter's. He hates confusion and uproar. Loud voices are among the few things that make Alana whimper. And whatever Rinsje may protest to the contrary, their eating habits are cut from the same pattern.

Alan's breakfast used to be coffee. To please Sue, he now drinks a glass of milk with two eggs beaten up in it. For lunch he'll take anything, provided it isn't much. To make sure he gets food in him, Sue sends a turkey sandwich over to the set where he's making "And Now Tomorrow." She bribes one of the boys to get him a bottle of milk. The reason she has to bribe 'em is because Alan scowls at the milk.

"I can scowl blacker," she assures them.

So they stick the bottle and straw under his nose. "Drink up, or I'll tell Susie."

All of which made her feel he was adding insult to injury when he said one day: "It's awful, the way you can't make that baby eat."

"You make her eat," she suggested sweetly.

da-da goes bah-bah . . .

Caught unaware, he proved himself equal to the occasion. Jumped up and down like a yo-yo, making idiotic noises, which so astonished the baby that her mouth popped open, and Sue popped the spoon in.

There was another time when he really went to town. Alana wouldn't drink her orange juice. Even Rinsje couldn't make her.

"That's bad," said Alan, who never touches citrus. "That's very bad. We'll have to do something about it."

He wrapped her in a blanket and carried her out to the porch. Sue and Rinsje laid bets on the event. Half an hour later he reappeared with a sleeping baby and an empty bottle.

"How did you do it?"

He shrugged. "Just told her to drink it."

"And she just drank it. Scared of the Killer, I suppose."

If anyone's scared, it's Alan. Sue flips and swings and turns her upside down. Alan handles her like eggs at a diamond a dozen.

"What's the matter?" scoffs Rinsje. "You think she breaks?"

But they can't laugh him out of it. "She's such a little girl," he says.

One thing she didn't get from him. Alan hates having his picture taken. Movies would be heaven if he didn't have to make stills. The sight of a camera enchants his daughter. Flash a flashlight under her nose, and up goes the chin, out comes the grin, and she's posing, the ham. As a rib, Buddy de Sylva sent the Ladds a wire at her birth, offering her a 21-year contract. "She must have read the wire," says her dad.

She loves to watch him shave. Mornings, he takes her out of her crib and sits her up among the pillows of his bed, where she can get a grandstand view of the bathroom. Her fascinated eyes follow his every move, but she doesn't make a sound till he gets up a stiff lather, turns around and winks. That sets her gurgling like a runaway brook. Her father's soapy face as he gives her the eye is the world's best side show. It breaks her up. Next best, she likes to pull the hair on his chest. If that's covered, she drags his nose down so she can get at his forelock.

In Sue's arms, she waves good-by from the window till he's well out of sight. Then she'll spend the next half hour informing her mother or Rinsje or anyone hanging around that dada went bah-bah. If their interest wanes on the fifth or sixth repetition, that's okay with Alana. She goes right on broadcasting the news to herself.

Frank Freeman, head of Paramount, gave Alan a Boxer last Christmas, whom he named Jezebel because she's a little devil. Still in the puppy stage, she's under the illusion that people were made to be walked on. All but Alana. She skirts Alana carefully, growls at strangers who come too close and ducks her big head, to be patted by the tiny fingers. Jezebel's on Alan's side. You can all but hear her say, "She's such a little girl."

Her favorite spectator sport is a roughhouse between Alan and the dog. But what she'd rather do than anything else is dance with her dad. Rhythm's her middle name. The minute he starts singing, her legs start kicking in perfect time to the beat. He's careful to keep her abreast of the Hit Parade. It used to be "Pistol-Packin' Mamma," then "Shoo Shoo, Baby." Now it's "Mairzy Doats." The first time he sang it, she not only kicked, she squealed. "As I live and breathe," he marveled, "—a Bobby-sock!"

The Ladds are hospitable folk. Their friends come and go. Sue and Alan think kids should be neither too shy nor too bold, and the best way to achieve a happy medium is to get them used to people. Alana meets the public. She's not put on parade, but neither is she ignored. Pick her up, and she'll smile. Put her down, and she'll amuse herself. Give her a salty cracker, and she'll munch blissfully, making no bid for further attention.

As you know by now, Alan's a quiet guy, reticent about his emotions, not given to many words. So his love for his daughter finds expression in what he does rather than in what he says. The way he'll disappear, for instance, and Sue'll find him in the baby's room, drawing the covers round her or just looking at her maybe. His slow grin on being caught, and the way he'll try to wriggle out of it by pretending to be critical. "When's she going to have more hair?" or "Don't you think her chin's too short?"

The way his eyes go soft when she calls him Da-Da. The excitement in his voice one day when he yelled for Sue, and she went running because Alan so rarely betrays excitement. The baby had climbed up on top of the huge brown teddy bear Al Delacorte gave her and, hanging on to the bars of her kiddy coop, was standing for the first time. "Look!" said Alan, like Balboa sighting the Pacific. "Look at that little weeny standing up!"

Where his own health's concerned, he has no sense. He'll ignore a cold. He'll go out in the rain without a coat. He hates being fussed over. But, boy! does he die when the baby's sick.

One night he and Sue got in late and went to the nursery as they always do. Alan took one look. "There's something wrong with the kid."

It was the start of a pretty sharp case of flu. The worst of it was that she didn't fuss or cry. The worst of it was that she lay so still. "It's not fair," Alan broke out, "for a baby to suffer when she can't tell you what she needs."

"She can't and you won't. I get it coming and going," moaned Sue.

lucre for alana . . .

For four days he hardly left the house. The morning her temperature returned to normal, he went out and bought her two pair of sleepers, one blue, one white. (He doesn't like pink). Sue found them across the foot of the crib with a card. "For my good girl. Because she looks so darn cute in 'em."

He loves buying her things. Once he appeared with two doll-beds under his arm. Not till Alana tried to stick them into her mouth did he realize that he'd been somewhat premature. Sue wanted to get the baby a locket. It's not Alan's way to insist on trifles, so when he said, "I'd like a locket from me around her neck," she knew it was no trifle to him.

On the other hand, he's against extravagance—especially in wartime. He's proud of Alana's being a Victory baby. He likes it that her shoes are felt instead of leather, that her kiddy-cart rolls on wood instead of rubber, that her bassinet was one Sue gave the eldest Crosby boy. Dixie redecorated it and sent it back to Sue.

Of all Alana's Christmas gifts, there were two he went mad over. Because of the thoughtfulness they represented. Because his friends had made them for his baby with their own hands. One was from Isabel Gray, who used to be his teacher—a beautiful satin coverlet. The second was from Lou Gould, formerly of the art department at Paramount, now master sergeant in the Army. It's a clipping album. The title sheet reads: "MY LIFE WITH ALANA—A Ladd Production —Directed by Sue and Alan Ladd—An Original by Sue and Alan Ladd—Any Similarity between this Baby and any Other is Strictly Impossible."

He spent Christmas Day with the coverlet over one arm and the album under the other. He called people up to come over and take a look. He still hauls them out every chance he gets and is no whit abashed when friends say: "It's a dilly, Alan. I said so the last ten times and I still say so."

He gets a terrific kick from Alana's fan mail. Most of them ask for pictures of the three Ladds together. It bothers him that the pictures can't be sent. To send them all would be just impossible.

beamish baby . . .

He gets his biggest boot, though, from his daughter's disposition. Alan, the toughie, loves kindliness in people. Alana's a sunny baby. She wakes with a smile and goes to bed without a murmur. She's glad to see you and, when you go, she waves a cheerful bah-bah and starts talking to herself. Take her ball away, and she doesn't bat an eyelash.

"We're keeping our fingers crossed," says Sue. "Maybe she'll grow up to be a little heller."

"Not a chance," says her dad.

He leaves her upbringing to Sue, but he's got certain theories. Hates to see a kid messy. Sue thinks it's kind of cute to see the baby with cereal smeared all over her face. Alan can't stand it.

He believes in public schools. He thinks kids should be given small responsibilities early. Spoil a child, and you're doing her a grave injustice, letting her think she's the center of the world.

The baby was born with a tiny white spot on her gum. "Maybe a tooth," said the nurse. Later it turned out to be a little blister. But meantime Alan had been going around bragging about his newborn infant's tooth.

"That practically makes her a genius," somebody told him.

This he didn't like. "Genius, my foot! She's a plain American girl."

That embraces his ambition for her. He wants her to be a plain American girl—honest, capable of doing for herself and others. The less she gets hurt, the happier he'll be. But he knows she has to get hurt—everyone does—so he and Sue try to equip her to face her hurts and build them into strength and courage.

As for a career, that's up to her. She'll know how to make beds and cook and wash dishes. If she wants to be an actress and shows talent, fine. But they're certainly not going to groom her for it.

"What she'll probably want to be," says Alan, surveying her 15 pounds, "is a vet."

They have a date every Sunday. Alan's building a fence round the fishpond. Under a big sycamore stands the kiddy-coop, with Jezebel guarding it. Sue, coming out, sees a small face peering in admiration through the bars.

"Da-da," she hears.

Alan catches her eye. Comes that grin. "Remarkable child you've got there, Mrs. Ladd. She likes me."

DR. EDWARDS' OLIVE TABLETS

CURL-CUES FROM VERA

No Soap! Vera is Miss Caution herself about rubbing a cake of toilet soap directly on her lovely hair. "Not for me" she insists. Ordinary cake soap leaves a thin film over each hair that dulls locks and makes Hollywood hair styling impossible. 'Nother thing: Miss Ralston practically admits ownership of the brisk massage technique of shampooing.

Gleam Routine. Next on the hair-beautiful routine is a color rinse. Try the very special cake shampoo that tints as it washes. Or else run down the block and buy a packet of separate color rinse. Now easy as that, dissolve the tinting rinse in warm water and either brush or wash through your hair.

Blonde Trouble. Your problem, miss? Oh, yes! How to keep your hair from losing its lively color: If it's a Betty Grable-ish type of golden blonde, the right rinse for you is the light golden blonde.

Red Lights. Hey Red! You've a lot in common with Greer Garson, Ann Sheridan and Lucille Ball. A henna rinse will make your locks look redder. If it's just natural highlights and sparks you're set on bringing out, try the auburn rinse.

Jeannie with the Light Brown Hair. You feel you're stuck with being, quote, the typical American girl, unquote. And you really long for honest-to-goodness glamour? Take heart, lady! A warm chestnut brown rinse will add a coppery lustre to your hair and have the boys whistling.

Note the Raven. You're a reasonable facsimile of Hedy Lamarr and you wish to play up your long, black, silky tresses? Use a blue-black rinse!

Silver Threads. We've the neatest beauty aid of the year if your hair is an uninteresting grey, streaked or faded. It's a jumbo pencil put out by a sister firm of hair specialists. You pencil your own color right back onto your greying hair. This pencil isn't a dye at all; it will wash out with your next shampoo. Fast drying time makes this jumbo pencil ideal for last minute grooming touches.

Oily Head? We've been told on the QT that dark hair often hides a multitude of sins. Feel your topknot. Is it oily? You've been cheating on your shampoos because you thought no one would notice. If you want to get your hair back to normal, try shampooing it twice a week for a while. Between shampoos, an astringent or drying tonic will help to keep hair free of oil. Cut down on fatty, heavy foods.

Permanently Curled. This is the season for new permanent waves. Ocean and lake bathing stare you in the face, and who wants to be caught with limp hair by a best beau. Not you! For handy home use, try one of the home permanent wave kits. You can treat your hair to a permanent as easily as you set it. It's economical and beautifully effective. You might try a regular machine permanent that is controlled to fit your hair type, or try a new cool wave this summer.

Shine and Reign. Yup! You can be queen of them all if you follow Vera's favorite hair routines down to the last bob pin. With a bit of persistence, a stock of hair prettifiers and the proper procedure down pat, (the through-the-keyhole, very latest lowdown on Hollywood hair styles is on p. 66) you, too, can sprout hair as gleamful and dreamful as Hollywood's prettiest lassies

V-TABS!
Anti-Acid . . . .
Anti-Fatigue . . .
Vitamin Tablets

NOT A CATHARTIC

Here at last is a sane, modern way to reduce old-looking fat that robs you of allure! By the V-TAB Method you need not go on a starvation diet, take habit-forming cathartics or do tiring exercises. Simply reduce the intake of fat-producing elements with the help of V-TABS which not only reduce your appetite so that you don't want to eat excessively, but also take the place of many fat-producing foods by fortifying your diet with needed minerals and vitamins.

HARMLESS . . . PLEASANT

Simply substitute V-TABS and fruit for your regular lunch, take a V-TAB morning and afternoon, and follow the simple eating and breathing directions in the booklet.

LESS ACID . . . LESS FATIGUE

V-TABS are anti-acid in effect, as well as marvelous for overcoming daily fatigue. Are YOU always tired, full of acid, unenergetic . . . as well as too fat? Then V-TABS are especially fine for you. As fatigue and acidity disappear the abnormal appetite will decrease, causing your fat to disappear as pep and energy increase.

DOES HOLLYWOOD HATE FRANK SINATRA?

giving the kids instructions, chiefly about that squealing. You've heard all sorts of rumors on the subject—how it's artificially induced, how they turn a record on and off. It's no record, and they turn it off all right, but never on. That's spontaneous combustion.

Why do they have to squeal? Let one of them tell it. "When I used to hear it on the radio, I thought how can anyone act so silly? Then I came myself. Well, you know in 'Speak Low When You Speak Love'?—how he makes it go funny at the end?—kind of drops it way down?—well, the scream came right out of me—his voice pulled it out—I just couldn't stop it—"

"Okay, if you have to squeal," the producer says, "but not till the end of the song. And if you're good, Frankie'll sing you some extras."

"We'll be good. We'll be very good. Bring him on—"

The curtains part, and Frank stands there grinning at them. They adore him, but they don't stand in awe of him. That's his doing. His manner's friendly, casual, matter-of-fact. They might all be his kid sisters. He likes and understands them. It's not so long since he was their age, pasting up a scrapbook on Bing Crosby that would have knocked your eye out. They feel he's their friend as they're his, that they have a part not only in him but in Nancy and the kids. They ask for the latest family news and get it. He talked to Nancy in New Jersey yesterday. No, the baby's not singing yet, but brother, does he squeal! That goes over big. Someone sent him a box of candy. Thanks, and he'll start on it after the show. "And, may I add, the boys in the band'll help me." Someone else wants to know what color socks he's wearing. He pulls up a trouser leg and makes like he's coy—for whom the belles fold . . .

"Now that's enough foolishness." He calls on producer and assistant to take a bow. "And last but not least, Sibelius himself." That's Axel. "Here we go, and I hope you like the show."

If you want to get the measure of what these kids are like, watch them while he sings. The upturned young faces are rapt, but there's nothing hysterical about them. They're lit by a kind of soft wonder, fresh and sweet and moving in its starry innocence. Okay, they've got a crush on him, so what? Where's the healthy adolescent who doesn't go through some such phase of calf-love? Five years hence they'll be smiling over it with maybe a touch of rue. Meantime, praise the Lord that they're swooning with Sinatra, not heiling some Hitler.

After each song, a little bow of thanks. Between Hit Parade tunes, three or four extras. "Anything special you'd like to hear?" he asks and ducks under the bombardment. They don't pester him for more than he feels he can do. If he touches his throat, that means he's saving his voice, and they subside like angels. He goes over to talk to Axel or one of the boys. "Even from the back he looks cute," sighs a little blonde.

Sometimes a kid tries to pass up an autograph book. "You know that's against the rules. Catch me after the show."

"We can't get near you then."

"Sure you can. Everyone does," he grins.

He's never been known to turn down

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN

Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

an autograph request. If he doesn't have time for them all, he takes the books along, and somebody sees that the kids get them back.

That he talks their language became eminently clear one Wednesday when history was made on his own CBS program. On the Hit Parade broadcast, the squealing doesn't matter so much. Coming at the song's end, most of it can be tuned out. On the Vimms broadcast, it throws the performers off, interferes with the lines. This particular Wednesday, Frankie came down to the footlights, and he wasn't smiling at all.

"I've talked to you kids about this before," he said. "I've asked you to confine your—sounds of appreciation to the end of the song. These broadcasts are being shortwaved overseas. It's tough enough to get them in a foxhole without interference by a lot of noise.

"I know you've got to applaud and, believe me, your applause is music to my ears. The screaming isn't. I've asked you many times to cut it out. Now they're getting mad at me, and I don't blame them. They tell me that unless the screaming stops, there'll be no studio audience for this program. I won't like that, and I don't suppose you will either. But it's up to you."

They sat like mice.

"Will you co-operate? Will you wait till the end of the song to applaud? Will you do this for me?"

Came a subdued chorus. "Yes, Frankie, we will."

The show went on. There wasn't a sound till the finish. Then penitence, enthusiasm, and all were released in a burst of wild clapping. Best of all, Frankie was smiling again. They were forgiven.

We doubt if he ever read Dale Carnegie's book. He doesn't have to. He wins friends by being himself, even when the cards are stacked against him—as they're sometimes bound to be, with human nature the way it is. In the face of a Sinatra phenomenon, human nature tends to rear its bristles. Who is this guy? What's he got? Let him show me. I dare him.

That was Hollywood when Frank came out to do "Higher and Higher" for RKO. That ain't Hollywood no more. "The great man's coming," they sniffed before ever laying eyes on him. "Frankie's comin' back," they grinned, when he returned for "Manhattan Serenade."

He didn't set out to woo anyone. His philosophy's simple. He likes most people, most people like him. If you don't like him, well, what the heck, you can't like everyone, he'll live.

Big shot or small his manner's the same—simple, offhand, unselfconscious. First day on the set, he sat bug-eyed through other people's scenes. "Gee, this is marvelous. I can watch these guys and learn." He broke himself up over Leon Errol. He's God's gift to comics anyway—starts laughing first, and when everyone else is through, you can still hear Frank chortling.

The first day they reserved judgment, the second day they warmed up, before the third day ended he was one of the boys. Not till the fourth day did he find out he had a portable dressing room.

"Is your dressing room handy?" the assistant director asked. "Would you like to have it moved?"

"Can you move 'em? I thought they stayed put."

"I mean the portable—right here on the stage. Don't tell me you haven't used it yet."

"I thought that was a place for props. What would I use it for?"

"Resting between scenes—"

"Are you kidding? When would I hang around and gab with the guys—"

He and Marcy McGuire were talking one morning, when she broke off in the middle of a sentence, eyes widening in dismay.

"What's the matter?"

"It's my mother's birthday, and I forgot it this morning—"

"That's bad. What'll you do?"

"What can I do? Call her up now. But it won't be the same."

"Want me to sing her 'Happy Birthday'?"

"Oh, would you, Frank? That way I can fix it up fine." They both ran for the phone. "It's a special day, Mother," chirped Marcy, "so I've got something special whipped up for you. Introducing Frank Sinatra—"

"—Happy birthday, dear Anona, happy birthday to you." Frank gave it the works, then handed the phone back to Marcy.

"That was awfully sweet, dear," said her mother. "Now tell me who was really singing."

The story was too good to keep. Frank told it around, and they've never let him live it down.

In the final analysis, the test of a star's popularity rests with the crew—those anonymous experts who do their jobs, think their thoughts and remain unimpressed by names, having seen too many flare and burn out.

One morning they were found huddled over a newspaper column that had taken a crack at Frank.

"Let's go pop the guy in the jaw!"

"Where would that get you? No, let's write a petition."

They drew it up themselves, refusing all aid lest it smell of publicity. They petitioned the guy to kindly refrain from taking any more cracks at Mr. Sinatra without checking up, because they the undersigned hereby informed him that what he put in the column about Mr. Sinatra today, Friday the 18th, was strictly eyewash, and seeing they worked with Frank every day, if they didn't know, who would?

The petition was never sent. Frank got wind of it and, if he'd been a girl, he'd have bawled. "Look, fellas, if the guy wants to needle me, he'll needle me regardless. Why waste this on him? I'd like to have it. There's nothing I'd rather have. Some day I'll show it to my kids."

Some ABC stuff about E

E IS A VERY impotant letter in this war.

It's the name of the War Bonds you buy—"War Savings Bond Series E."

As you know, a Series E. Bond will work for you for ten full years, piling up interest, till finally you get $4 for every $3. Pretty nice.

There'll come a day when you'll bless these Bonds—when they may help you over a tough spot.

That's why you should make up your mind to hang on to every Bond you buy. You can, of course, cash in your Bonds any time after you've held them for 60 days. You get all your money back, and, after one year, all your money plus interest.

But when you cash in a Bond, you end its life before its full job is done. You don't give it its chance to help you and the country in the years ahead. You kill off its $4-for-every-$3 earning power.

This is good to remember when you might be tempted to cash in War Bonds. They are yours, to do what you want with.

He reached for a laugh to cover up. "'You weren't such a bad guy, after all, were you, pop?'" he bleated.

Maybe the toughest nut he had to crack was his first appearance at the Hollywood Canteen. What bunch of American males would pass up a chance to heckle the idol of the bobbies? Their guns were primed and their ammunition ready. You could feel it in the air—

Frank was introduced. "Hiya, fellas." For a moment he stood there, looking them over. "There's one thing I can see about this audience," he drawled. "And that is, nobody's going to swoon." That gave him a bridgehead, which was strengthened by his first song. They didn't swoon, but they liked the way he sang. He asked what they wanted and gave it to them if he could. If he couldn't—"You want to get me run out of here on a rail?" or "Think I'm Caruso? All together— NOoooo!" He got them to sing along, and before the evening was over, a crowd was up front, close harmonizing all the old sentimental pushovers with him, while the rest sang from the floor.

How he feels about servicemen was made clear at Brittingham's one day. He'd run in for a bowl of soup between rehearsals. A sailor asked for his autograph and thanked him. Frank winced. "I'm the one that's honored," he said.

His appearance at the Shrine netted a million in bonds—most of them sold by the bobbies to parents and friends. At the Lakeside Country Club he and Crosby and Hope auctioned off miscellaneous treasures for bonds—a pound of meat, Marlene Dietrich's garters, Dotty Lamour's sarong. One man, who bid on a model airplane, gave it to Frank. "For your kid."

"Mind if his papa plays with it first?"

The largest single bond—$20,000—was bought for the pleasure of hearing Bing and Frank sing "People Will Say We're in Love," while they leered at each other.

Frankie's still nuts about Bing. According to him, "Crosby's in a class by himself, and the rest of us are fighting it out down below someplace." He knows nobody takes their make-believe feud seriously, still he's happier when a Crosby-Sinatra gag is turned against himself.

"I'm making a picture," says Hope, "with Frank Sinatra's father—Bing Crosby."

"Where is Frank?" Bing wants to know. "Oh, I beg your pardon. I thought that was the mike."

Frank doubles up. He's rehearsed the gag, he knows it's coming, but he doubles up just the same. It slays him.

The baby played him a rascally trick. He was expected about the middle of December, and Frank arranged his dates so that Nancy'd be well on the road to recovery before he had to leave. But young Sinatra dallied, and his pop had to go.

He did his pacing on the train. No news. He jumped out at Pasadena, rarin' to get to a phone, but reporters blocked him. "Try to get the hospital from that booth over there," he told his cousin Frank. "I'll stand where I can see you."

He answered questions with one eye on the booth. The other Frank gestured, and our Frank ran like hell. Only to be told, nothing doing.

Frank was at CBS on January 10th when the news came through. A boy! "How's Nancy?" Fine. That was when his knees gave and he had to sit down quick. The kid's a whopper. Eight pounds, 13 ounces. Born at six o'clock. "He couldn't have been. It's only four-thirty now." Not in New York it isn't. "What

"a dope!" he moaned.

He'd said all along it would be a boy. Half an hour after he got the news, the AP boys showed him wire-photos of his son. "Hey, look at his hand!" One of them was spread out like a starfish. "Knuckly, like mine. "Looks cuter than I thought. Little Nancy was more wrinkled up. This guy looks like he'd been around a couple of weeks." Then he came to, and his grin was shy. "Makin' noises like a poppa, huh?"

And why not? All the world knows how he feels about his wife and kids. Reading a letter from Nancy on the RKO set, he let out a whoop that brought people running. "Look! Little Nancy dictated it. 'Papa, come home soon—' "

When he's at home, he sings her to sleep every night. The new baby got his first lullaby over the air. It was strictly against the rules, but nobody seemed to mind when Frankie said: "I'd like to sing one of my favorite songs to my little son in New Jersey. So pull up a chair, Nancy, and bring the baby with you. I want him really to hear this—

"Sweetest little fella,
Everybody knows,
Doan' know what to call him,
But he's mighty lak a rose—"

It was his own father who gave Frank one of his biggest, if quietest thrills. Dad Sinatra's a fireman, proud of the big red truck he drives. But he'd had his heart set on sending his only son to college, hoping he'd decide to be an engineer. When Frank made his own decision, there was no heavy-father stuff pulled, but the old man did go around looking pretty glum. Even Frank's success on the radio didn't reconcile him to the loss of his dream.

In New York Frank took him to a showing of "Higher and Higher" in an RKO projection room. That must have been when the whole thing came real to Pop—seeing his kid up there on the screen, center of big-time Hollywood names, he must have realized for the first time what Frank had wrought. Because when his son turned to see whether Pop was enjoying it, there he sat with the tears in his eyes.

In Hollywood, he's living at the Sunset Towers this trip. The only personal touches around the living room are a lovely picture of the two Nancies, a lot of sheet music and a grand piano, on which he and Axel try out songs. Through the years he's increased his breath capacity by a series of self-invented sniffing exercises—like sniffing a flower. Started with 12 sniffs, and built up to 40. Used to wear a 14 collar, now it's 15½.

He thinks it's funny when they call him the hepcat's boy. He's a singer of romantic ballads—the kind of animal no jivin' slick chick wants any part of. He can't read a note. All he's got is a good ear—sez he. That's why he gets a bang out of the classics—they're so full of pretty melodies to pick out and remember. He collects symphonic records and goes to symphony concerts every chance he gets.

Between radio and movies, bond rallies and command performances, he hasn't much time for social life. Get's to an occasional ice hockey game, but prefers to relax at home with the boys—Axel, Phil Silvers, Sammy Kahn and two or three others. Has them to dinner and fusses over the table himself. The food's always prepared Italian style, and there's always spaghetti. He can tuck away plenty when he's not working—otherwise, he's too nervous to eat much—orders eggs or soup or a custard—anything you can gobble down in a hurry.

He's got a yen for good clothes—prefers three-button, single-breasted jobs—still wears bow ties, but not as much as he used to—likes wide-mouthed collars that leave plenty of space for a Windsor knot. Picks quiet colors except for an occasional sweater. Owns one that's orange.

After the war he hopes to build in California. Not that he won't always be crazy about New York. But from all indications most of his work will be here, and besides it's a great place for kids. He wants a big backyard for them, and he'd like to rig up a little gym where he can teach little Frankie to box. If he's anything like his sister, he'll be a scrapper. Frank himself's a handy man. He's going to hack him off a slice of garage, turn it into a workshop and fix everything that breaks.

He's got a temper—oh, definitely—but keeps it under pretty steady control. Being ribbed doesn't bother him. He howls at imitations of himself and would sooner miss his breakfast than Al Capp's "Li'l Abner." The day Abner signed a song-by-song contract because he might not survive to sing the next, they found Frank hysterical. In Boston Al Kapp called and took away a month's material.

Frankie's good-natured. Some of the jabs aren't. He still refuses to let them get under his skin. "Better people than I'll ever be get fun poked at them. If they can take it, what have I got to yap about?"

One thing does burn him up. He can't stand having the bobbies panned. That's come to be quite a peeve with Frank. They're swell kids from nice families. They've got growing pains, that's all, and if growing pains make you a moron, then aren't we all?

The kids are less articulate about their feeling for him. All they know is, they're mad about him—because he's cute and darling—because his eyes are like two blue spotlights that go right through you—because his voice sounds like a marvelous clarinet, and he can hit a riff with it, same as Harry James does with his horn—because sometimes he's like a little boy and you want to take care of him, and sometimes he makes you swoon.

One of them hit the nail pretty straight on the head. Her father expressed a certain disappointment that a daughter of his should have come down with Sinatritis. "I thought you had more sense—"

"Daddy, how old are you?"

"Thirty-eight."

"Well, that explains it. You're just too old to understand. That's why you think I'm purely out of my mind. If you were younger, you'd be glad I adore Frankie. Because all it proves is I'm normal."

The greatest star of the screen!

No more stirring tribute to the dauntless British spirit has been written than the vivid lines of Alice Duer Miller's "The White Cliffs".

★ ★ ★ ★

In filming this living symbol of British heart and heroism, the Studio which produced the great "Mrs. Miniver" continues a tradition—making of "The White Cliffs of Dover" another great and important picture.

★ ★ ★ ★

This is magnificent MGM entertainment—but it is also a contribution to the hope of the future in the partnership of nations, especially those which share a common language.

★ ★ ★ ★

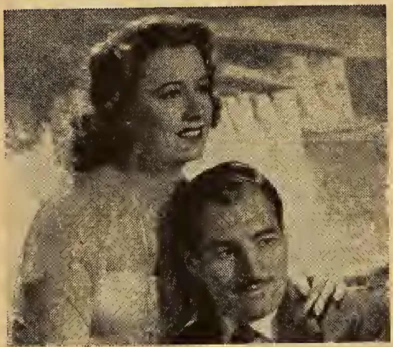
For it is a story of a way of life and shows how that way of life dovetails with the American Way.

★ ★ ★ ★

The canvas is large—the story is simple and personal. Centering around an American girl—played by the charming Irene Dunne—and the love she finds among the stately homes of Britain, in the person of Alan Marshal.

★ ★ ★ ★

Adventure, excitement, bravery, action and infinite tenderness are all woven into "The White Cliffs of Dover"...in the screen play by Claudine West, Jan Lustig and George Froeschel.



The cast of supporting players contains names that in themselves deserve supporting casts. Among them are...Roddy McDowall, Frank Morgan, Van Johnson, C. Aubrey Smith, Dame May Whitty and Gladys Cooper.

★ ★ ★ ★

Primary credit should go to Clarence Brown who gratified a strong ambition in planning and directing this production. He was admirably spurred on by the able cooperation of a man who has emerged as the screen's greatest producer, Sidney Franklin.

★ ★ ★ ★

Together, they have showered loving care on this new, momentous MGM enterprise.

★ ★ ★ ★

Just as "Mrs. Miniver" moved us, so will "The White Cliffs of Dover". A heart-warming reception is its sincere due.

UNCERTAIN GLORY

■ Errol Flynn! Paul Lukas! Can you imagine two more different types? But what a combination they make in "Uncertain Glory"! One—the reckless, bitter young criminal. The other—the shrewd detective who has followed him, hounded him, from his first petty burglary to murder and the guillotine he now faces. However, Jean Picard is not destined to die so unromantically. The prison is demolished during an air raid, and he escapes, escapes to Bordeaux, but not for long. The matter-of-fact, middle-aged detective, Bonet, knows his prey's habits and friends too well. A couple of days, and Inspector Bonet is placidly reading a newspaper in a Paris-bound train, Jean's wrist handcuffed to his.

Then along comes a twist of fate that no one could foresee. They are forced to change trains because a bridge ahead has been blown up by a saboteur. The Gestapo has (Continued on page 12) seized one hundred hostages who will be shot unless the saboteur gives himself up. Jean has an idea. He isn't afraid to die, he tells Bonet, but he dreads the guillotine. Now a firing squad—there is a death for a man. Suppose he goes to the Gestapo, tells them he is the saboteur. They will shoot him, release the hundred hostages, and Bonet will have saved the lives of all those innocent men.

"Don't talk nonsense!" Bonet tells him roughly. But Jean just grins. He can see the idea working in the detective's mind. . . . Why not let this criminal die in place of the hundred hostages? Why not?

So that night, instead of being in jail in Paris facing the guillotine, Jean lies in a bedroom of a village inn. The village by the bridge which was sabotaged. He is not alone. Bonet doesn't trust him to that extent. But he is, in a way, free as he has never been before. Because Bonet, against his own better judgment, has phoned the Sureté in Paris. "The prisoner, Jean Picard, tried to escape. I shot him as he was swimming the river. The body has not been recovered." Jean Picard is officially dead. There is left Jean DuPont, saboteur.

The next day they go to study the scene of the explosion, for the Gestapo will ask questions, and Jean must know the answers. In their search for details, they meet a pretty young girl, Marianne (Jean Sullivan). The dashing, handsome Jean greets her with pleasure, and in spite of Bonet's grumbling and objections, manages to spend considerable time with her that day. But somehow he can't make love to her with his usual facility. Marianne is different from any girl he has ever known. He thinks of her that night and finds himself wishing that he had led a different life. Ridiculous, of course. She's only a village girl. Still, if he can wriggle free from Bonet, he might even take her with him to some far part of the world and start all over again.

For it has never been any part of Jean's plan really to give himself up to the Gestapo. Why should he? What does he care for the hundred hostages? He has as much desire for life as they! If only Bonet were not so ready with that pistol. . . .

The next day another curious trick of fate leads them to the real saboteur. They find out from him just how the thing was done. Then he goes back to England, and now there must be no more delay. The time for the death of the hostages is coming closer and closer. They must go at once to Paris, to the Gestapo, and tell them Jean is the saboteur.

But Bonet is ill. He has had a cold for days, and now it is suddenly worse. "Probably pneumonia," the doctor assures them cheerfully. "He can't travel, for days." It is like a sentence of death to Bonet. Everything depends upon his accompanying Jean to Paris, to see that he goes through with the plan. Because otherwise Jean won't do it. He will never walk into the Gestapo headquarters alone and give himself up. After all, he is a criminal—a murderer! Bonet knows that better than anyone. . . .

Well, you take it from there. Paul Lukas turns in a performance as good as in "Watch On The Rhine," and you've never seen Errol in a more exciting role. The things that guy can do to a girl's heart! —War.

P. S.

Title is lifted from a Shakespearean quotation from "Two Gentlemen of Verona," and describes the picture as a tender love story: "Oh, how this spring of love resembleth the uncertain glory of an April day." . . . Errol Flynn says his part in the picture is "the best I've ever had." . . . Newcomer Jean Sullivan is 20 years old, a student at U.C.L.A. when she isn't emoting in front of the cameras. Studio scouts pursued her for six months before succeeding in getting her name on the dotted line. Came here from Logan, Utah, to study drama and was in no hurry to join the professional ranks. . . . Now that Paul Lukas has won the Academy Award, Warner Bros. is doubly gleeful that he's cast so importantly in the film. Paul, amused by the sudden turn of events, says that in "Watch on the Rhine" he was "discovered" for the seventh time in his 15 years here in Hollywood. First time was in 1928 when Paramount brought him here from Austria to play opposite Pola Negri in a minor epic called "Loves of an Actress". . . . Technical director for the picture was Paul Coze, noted French artist, ethnologist and historian. Coze supervised the construction of an entire French village on Warner Bros. famous Dijon Street, permanent Gallic set near the back lot. . . . Before the troupe could work on location at Escondido, California, they had to promise to help the local farmers pick the lush grape crop, ripe and almost spoiled for lack of workers. All 200 of the men, led by Flynn, worked two hours before and two hours after the day's shooting, saved the entire crop.

THREE MEN IN WHITE

Dr. Gillespie is rapidly becoming as much of a medical institution as the Mayo Clinic. People write him detailed descriptions of their symptoms and demand a diagnosis by return mail. All of which stems from the fact that Lionel Barrymore is a fine, convincing actor who makes Gillespie as human as your own family doctor. He has his troubles. At the moment he's in a devil of a mess. Dr. "Red" Adams (Van Johnson) and the young Chinese-American doctor, Lee (Keye Luke), are both determined to win the position of Dr. Gillespie's assistant. There doesn't seem to be any way to choose between them. Sometimes he thinks that Lee is the smarter of the two—but then, young Adams has a lot of persistence and curiosity, both good qualities in a doctor. Well, he's got to decide, no more shilly-shallying. The thing to do is to give each of them a test case and go by the results. Sure, that'll settle it!

Dr. Lee's test case is Mary Jones. Mary is a little girl who gets convulsions and turns green in the face every time she eats candy. "I'll clear this up in a hurry," says the confident Lee, never the modest type. Somehow it doesn't seem so easy, though, when he gets working at it. . . .

Dr. Adams gets his case by accident. And I do mean accident. A pretty girl, apparently drunk, crashes her car into his. Jean Brown (Ava Gardner) isn't drunk as it turns out, but by the time Adams finds that out, he has his case. The case is Jean's mother, Mrs. Brown, who has arthritis in an incurable form. "If it's incurable—and I know it is—why don't I just give up?" Adams asks himself. He doesn't give up, though. He keeps working at it. . . .

He also tries—feebly—to keep away from Ruth Edley (Marilyn Maxwell), the

P. S.

Our of-all-things dept.: Keye Luke spent hours between takes learning to speak and read Chinese! Seems Keye, who yearns for a post as interpreter for the War Department, must know the Mandarin dialect as well as the Cantonese with which he's already familiar. . . . Scene where Mr. Barrymore drives into a parking lot was strictly impromptu. Photogs were shooting background shots in the studio parking lot when Lionel accidentally drove his car into camera view. It was a perfect "take" and was left in the picture. . . . Entire cast and crew took afternoon off to listen to the world premiere of Lionel Barrymore's musical composition "Partiah," played by the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, and short-waved to Hollywood. . . . Metro employees, used to seeing the famous in their commissary, were impressed when Lionel brought his famous sister Ethel to lunch there several times. . . . Studio made a glamour gal out of Marilyn Maxwell and brought oomph to the Doctor Kildare series when they introduced several Irene gowns to the picture in addition to the usual white nurses' uniforms. . . . Picture was produced in 34 days—something of a record for M-G-M. This was possible because the hospital, offices and restaurant—familiar by now to Kildare fans—are left intact on the sound stages. . . . Van Johnson left for Florida and "Thirty Seconds Over Tokio" day after final scenes were taken, and Marilyn went to another stage for an Abbott and Costello picture in which she plays the queen of their harem.

MEET THE PEOPLE

Rosie the Riveter and William the Welder seem to be coming into their own, with an M-G-M musical practically dedicated to them. It's a big, fancy, extravagant show. Beautiful Lucille Ball plays an actress turned welder, and Dick Powell is a riveter who's a writer on the side. Bert Lahr is as funny as ever, and so are those sterling props of all M-G-M musicals, "Rags" Ragland and Virginia O'Brien.

Julie Hampton (Lucille Ball), redheaded musical comedy star, meets a riveter called Swanee (Dick Powell) when he sells enough war bonds to win a date with her at a shipyard rally. She soon finds that Swanee is a guy with imagination. He takes her to what he calls his "Starlight Roof"—a romantic spot on a hill overlooking the fiery glow of the shipyard. Instead of making passes at her, he reads her a play he's written, called "Meet The People," complete with music. Julie is surprised to find that it's good. She persuades a Broadway producer to put it on, with her as star.

Comes the dress rehearsal. Comes also Swanee, fresh from the shipyard. He takes one look at the show and says, "Nothing doing!" He's written about real people, workers in overalls and slacks. They've hopped it up into a dream world of riveters in rhinestones and welders in chiffon.

Swanee calls the show off and goes back to the shipyard, leaving a note for Julie saying, "Some day you ought to really 'meet the people.'"

Julie broods a while, then arrives at the shipyard, complete with mink coat and Hollywood slacks. She puts in a couple of weeks of her very best acting as a welder. She convinces Swanee that she's on the level, that she really has met the people at last. He tells her that now he will let her do the show on Broadway. Then he catches her posing in her welder's outfit for some leg art for the photographers and realizes that the whole thing was an act. But the joke is on Julie, for along comes a Presidential edict freezing war workers to their jobs. Julie's a welder now for better or worse. The show goes on at the shipyard instead of on Broadway, but who cares as long as we get to see it? And hear it, too—lovely tunes, and Vaughn Monroe and Spike Jones.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Desi Arnaz, husband of leading lady, Lucille Ball, was most loyal visitor to the set. Each time Desi would get a pass to come home from his camp at Arlington, California, Lucille would have to work most of the time he was here. He'd go to work with her and spend long days on the stage just to be near. . . . Another husband on the set was Kirk Allen, bridegroom of dead-pan Virginia O'Brien, who was acting as technical adviser for the film. Kirk is a swing shift inspector at one of the large California war plants. . . . Bert Lahr became a father on the one and only day there were 300 extras working on the set, which ran up a fancy cigar bill. . . . Party was given by the cast to celebrate the birthdays of writers Harry Clork and Alfred Block. Guests each brought beautifully wrapped gifts which turned out to be personal belongings of the two men, swiped from their homes by Bert. . . . Lucille was thrilled at being voted the "Sweetheart of the Chinese Air Force" and presented with tiny gold wings with the Chinese emblem by a delegation from Luke Field. . . . Boys in South Pacific sent Miss Ball a grass skirt with the stipulation that she must send it back unless she had her picture taken in it for their quarters. Lucille turned up several hours later in the still department insisting that she be photographed in the skirt. . . . Charles Riesner is now nick-named "One-take Charlie." His methods for getting a perfect "take" the first time have always been a mystery, but now the secret is out. Each afternoon Charles has the commissary bring in huge hunks of cake and slabs of ice cream which he sets before his cast. If the scene is a good one, everyone has refreshments—if not, back it goes to the kitchen and no amount of begging can make him change his mind!

AND THE ANGELS SING

Once upon a time there was a family of angels. They didn't have wings, but they all had beautiful voices—and beautiful legs. Their names were Nancy, Bobby, Josie and Patti Angel, but you know them as Dorothy Lamour, Betty Hutton, Diana Lynn and Mimi Chandler.

The Angels have a father whom they call Pop (Raymond Walburn). Pop wants to buy a farm, but since he has no job except cooking for his four beautiful daughters, the chances of getting it don't look too good. Still, Nancy has a secretarial job, Josie gives piano lessons, and Patti takes care of the neighbors' children at so much per hour. Now if Bobby would break down and get a job, too, they might

3 ways to tell a Fib

(FROM ANY OTHER TAMPON)

Only FIBS* of all tampons give you all 3

1. Fibs are "quilted"

. . . for more comfort, greater safety in internal protection—that's why, with Fibs, there's no danger of cotton particles clinging to delicate membranes. And quilting controls expansion . . . so Fibs don't fluff up to an uncomfortable size which might cause pressure, irritation, difficult removal.

2. Fibs have rounded ends

THIS — NOT THIS

. . . smooth, gently-tapered ends . . . for easy insertion! Unlike any leading tampon you've ever tried. Your own eyes tell you that Fibs must be easier to use! You'll like the just-right size of Fibs; they're not too large, not too tiny.

3. Fibs—the Kotex* Tampon

. . . a name you know, a tampon you can trust. No other brand is made of Cellucotton*, the soft, super absorbent used in Kotex and demanded by many of America's foremost hospitals! In Fibs, as in Kotex, there's no compromise with quality—you get protection as safe as science can make it.

The Kotex Tampon for Internal Protection

By Jean Kinkead

That old black magic got you in its spell?

Here's how to cope with the date situation from backward parents to forward fellas!

■ Here we are knee-deep in Spring, and we've just been wondering if your young man's fancy has lightly turned to thoughts of stuff. Well, yes? Well, good! You can skip this edition and go write in your diary. If, however, you could stand some date data—how to get 'em, how to act on 'em, etc.—this is especially for you. Read on.

Date Bait: You needn't be beautiful to get the eye from a guy, but you can't be a crumb, either. Shampoo your hair every week and brush it between times so it shines like a G.I. button. Scrub your face morning, noon and night, and remember that make-up—when and if—should be smooth and subtle. Briefly, make the most of You with the help of our chart "Glamour for the Teens," which is all yours for free. (See page 26). Then, having turned yourself into a slickeroo, go on from there.

First move is to get over your awe of men; to be as casual with them as you are with the gals. Best way we know to acquire poise with the boys is to pick on some nice shy one and try to make him feel at ease. Maybe there's a quiet lad in your Chem class. Smile at him. Chat with him about Frank Sinatra or Henry Aldrich or the track team. Walk with him to your next class. You think you wouldn't dare? Sure you would, if you'd just keep concentrating on the fact that he's the scared one, and he's getting the thrill of his life out of your attention. Work on a few shy numbers until you gain confidence, then put some big shots on save enough for at least a down payment.

Bobby, however, doesn't want a job. Not in a hick town like Glenby Falls, where they live. If it were New York, it would be different! New York, as everyone knows, is full of handsome, exciting and eligible men. And if there's anything Bobby likes, it's men! Particularly men like Happy Chandler (Fred MacMurray), a band leader whom the Angel sisters meet at a little roadhouse where they've been hired to sing. The Angels hate to sing, but ten bucks is ten bucks. Happy looks the Angels over and picks Nancy, but Bobby picks him. She thinks he's wonderful. She thinks so even after he borrows 190 dollars (she ran the ten up to that in a crap game) and leaves for New York with his band. The rest of the Angels don't see Happy in quite that light. To them he looks like the common or garden variety of thief. They decide to go to New York en masse and get their dough back.

It's something of a shock to Happy when they arrive, but he's a fast talker and could probably have fixed everything if he hadn't fallen in love with Nancy. That complicates matters because Bobby thinks he's in love with her. There's a hilarious scene when he takes them both to the same night club, and each one thinks she's alone with him. Don't ask me to explain—hurry over to the theater. You'll have a wonderful time! Fred MacMurray's scenes with Betty Hutton couldn't be funnier! —Par.

P. S.

Dottie Lamour was taken out of her sarong and put into some glamorous Irene gowns. Leg art was supplied by Fred MacMurray (and a couple of very nice limbs he has, girls!). . . . Fred exposes his nether extremities in an eccentric comedy dance, garbed in a Tyrolean costume. . . . Dorothy's jitterbug routine not only caused her many bruised muscles before she'd mastered it, but also cost her five pounds the day the scene was shot. . . . Betty Hutton goes back to the ridiculous (after her sublime performance as worker of the "miracle" that happened in Morgan's Creek) with one of her knock-down, drag-out arrangements of "Bluebirds in My Belfry". . . . Huge one-ton chandelier was concocted by the property department out of ash trays, small glass candle holders, little glass cupboard knobs and other scrap glass around the studio. . . . Cigarette gal with the beautiful torso is Julie Gibson making her debut in pictures. Julie is the girl with the lovely voice who once sang with Jimmy Grier's band. . . . Studio make-up men have decided Betty is to keep her hair the exact ash-blond shade she has it for this picture. Seems to photograph better that way. . . . Betty has had only two days off in the past two years. As a reward for her hard work, Paramount granted her a much-needed eight week leave of absence. Betty rested for one day then headed for the South and toured Army camps for the rest of her vacation.

. . . Girls have 52 changes of costume for this one. Conservation-minded studio designers saved precious materials by using identical patterns and material for many of their dresses. . . . Raymond Walburn's eyebrows should get equal billing with Ray. They get an extra heavy workout sitting on the brow of the father of three beautiful and zany daughters who constantly thwart his ambitions toward a soy bean farm. At one point they actually merge with his hairline.

MAN FROM FRISCO

You've heard a lot about Liberty ships and Victory ships. Probably you never knew much about how they were made, or why, though. In "Man From Frisco" you get the inside dope on the whole hustle-bustle system, plus a thrilling story. Michael O'Shea plays a guy named Matt Braddock. Matt has, in his own words, "built dams, bridges and railroads, all the way from here to China." Now he's going to build ships, and he has some revolutionary ideas about how to do it. The trouble is, Matt never heard of that old saying, "You can catch more flies with honey than you can with vinegar." He slambangs his way through life, issuing orders and pushing people around, and then wonders why he doesn't get more cooperation. Oh, sure, he gets results, but he gets them the hard way. Or so his assistant, Johnny (Ray Walker), tries to tell him.

Matt and Johnny come to the little shipyard at Point Pleasant to try out Matt's theories. They're greeted with definite un-enthusiasm by Joel Kennedy (Gene Lockhart), head of the yard, and by the workers. Especially when Matt opens up with his usual volley of orders. He soon finds no one will work for him. In fact, no one will even give him a bed or food. Diana (Anne Shirley), Kennedy's daughter, is particularly antagonistic, but his son, Russ (Tommy Bond), 16, is inclined to be friendly. "Maybe you could build a ship first and put it together afterward, like Matt says," he tells his father.

Kennedy decides to give Matt a chance. In a couple of weeks the sleepy little village has turned into a seething mass of welders, riggers and defense workers of both sexes and every nationality. Some of them have worked for Matt before and are devoted to him. Others don't care who they work for, as long as they help beat the Axis. They all do a good job. Even so, Matt isn't very happy. The eyes of the whole shipbuilding industry are on him, and he's behind schedule. Besides, Diana is still unfriendly. Then young Russ has an idea—an idea that leads in startling fashion first to tragedy, then ultimately to triumph.

'Bye now. I'm off to take a course in welding. Seeing "Man From Frisco" makes you want to help build ships.—Rep.

P. S.

Michael O'Shea has an assistant named William Kahn—nicknamed "Citizen"—who acts as his cook, valet, critic and aid. During production Citizen Kahn found an abandoned bungalow on the back lot at Republic studios which he remodeled into a living room and kitchen for Michael. There he cooked hams, turkeys and Southern fried chicken each noon for his boss and anyone else who might drop in for lunch. . . . Extra list for this picture includes 50 percent of the employees at a famous Richmond, California, shipyard. Cameras were dollied through half the plant for background shots of the workers at their benches. . . . During the two weeks spent in San Francisco, the shipbuilders taught the actors to wield welding torches, rivet guns and showed them how to climb into the complicated overalls they wear. . . . Property men reconstructed a bow of a Liberty Ship on a studio sound stage where most of the action takes place. However, several of the launchings pictured are the real thing, taken at Richmond and at San Pedro, California. . . . Three-year-old Michael Barnitz, who plays the son of Stephanie Bachelor, was a model child—did as he was told and never cried—until the day of final shooting when the director tried to sit him in a high chair. "That," declared Master Barnitz, "is baby stuff!" and he would have none of it. No amount of coaxing or bribery could induce him to sit in the chair, until Michael O'Shea convinced him that it would take a bit of fancy acting for a three-year-old boy to act like a baby. That did it! Little Mike climbed into the highchair, banged with his spoon and drooled. "Like when I was a child," he grinned! . . . During the two months of shooting, actors picked up a good deal of Navy and shipyard lingo but none so quickly as Ann Shoemaker, who later confessed to being descended from a Captain Commandant of the Navy.

ONCE UPON A TIME

The hero of this one is a dancing caterpillar. You heard me. Of course Cary Grant is around, too, playing the same kind of smooth crook with the heart of gold that went over so big in "Mr. Lucky". But the whole plot revolves around Curley, the caterpillar. Jerry Flynn (Cary Grant) encounters Curley at a moment of crisis. Jerry's last three shows have been turkeys. If he doesn't raise one hundred thousand smackers in a hurry, he'll have to give the famous Flynn theater back to the Indians. By the time The Moke (James Gleason), his assistant, has paid off the cast of the last show, Jerry has exactly one lone nickel left. He tosses it over his shoulder for luck, and that's how he meets the dancing caterpillar. Because Pinky (Tom Donaldson), the young owner of this phenomenon, picks up the nickel and in return gives Jerry a glimpse of Curley's act.

"This," Jerry declares, "is something the world should know about." He arranges to have Pinky bring Curley to his hotel the next day and has reporters from all "The More Women at War—the Sooner We'll Win!"

We'd like to take War Jobs—BUT

...MY HUSBAND DOESN'T WANT ME TO WORK!

Answer: Your war job doesn't necessarily mean your husband needs your financial help! It means your country needs women—millions, like you—to keep civilian services going, save fighting men's lives. Explain this urgent need to your husband! Read your local want ads for war jobs that are open now!

...MY HOUSEWORK KEEPS ME PLENTY BUSY!

Answer: Are you tying yourself to your own apron strings—when our boys are dying at their "jobs"? Every day, working women manage their homes successfully. Let the family share your household chores! Or, take a part-time job. Ask your U. S. Employment Service Office to suggest a "working" plan.

...ARE CIVILIAN JOBS REALLY IMPORTANT?

Answer: The humblest job in a home front service is as important as Victory itself! Laundries, cafeterias, hotels, stores . . . transportation, food packing industries . . . all must carry on. Help them! Even if inexperienced. Your newspaper want ads show where you're needed, or see your U. S. Employment Service Office.

...I'M NOT THE MILITARY TYPE!

Answer: Many a "home girl" makes good as a WAC, WAVE, MARINE or SPAR. They work at scores of varied, interesting jobs you too can learn—if you qualify. Free a man for front line duty . . . help bring your man home sooner! Today, get complete details at your nearest Army or Navy recruiting station.

KLEENEX TISSUES

*Published in the interest of the war effort by Kleenex Tissues

Paper, too, has a war job . . . that's why there's not enough Kleenex Tissues to go around. But regardless of what others do, we are determined to maintain Kleenex quality in every particular, consistent with government regulations.

the papers there. The reporters, however, are not impressed. With a world at war, who's interested in a caterpillar? "It's a symbol!" Jerry explains desperately, but Brandt (William Demarest) leads the other newspapermen out in disgust.

Then Gabriel Heatter hears about Curley, and devotes his next radio broadcast to him. Pinky and Curley become famous overnight. Hollywood is interested. The reporters flock back. Pinky decides that Jerry is the greatest guy in the world and tries to sell his pretty sister Jeanne (Janet Blair) the same idea. Jeanne isn't so sure. She thinks maybe Jerry has an ulterior motive up his sleeve. Of course she's so right. Jerry, the louse, is planning to sell Disney the movie rights to Curley and use the money to get the Flynn theater out of hock.

Everything is all set. The Moke is to steal Curley while Pinky's asleep, so Jerry can take him to the Coast. But The Moke gets drunk, and the whole plan goes haywire. Which, as it turns out, is just as well.

Cary is handsome and reckless and wonderful, as Jerry. Janet and the others are swell, too. But me, I'm writing fan letters to Curley, the dancing caterpillar!—Col.

P. S.

This picture probably holds the world's record for title changes. Originally it was "My Client Curley," was changed to "Curley," then to "Yes, Sir, That's My Baby," back to "Curley" and finally to "Once Upon a Time". . . . Casting directors ran into trouble trying to find a suitable "Curley." Seems most caterpillars are without the necessary acting experience. However, "Curley" was found on the New York stage, and though she turned out to be a prima donna who had to be packed in cotton, fed specially prepared carrots and kept in an air-conditioned box, she did very well. . . . Ten-year-old Ted Donaldson makes his debut to movie audiences after an extended run on the New York stage in "Life With Father." Cary Grant named him "the greatest child actor I have ever seen," and studio officials agreed, gave Ted a long-term contract. . . . All six-foot-two of Mr. Grant spent one whole day in a four-foot-high room during scenes in the "Curley Club." Called the studio next day to say he was too stiff and sore to climb out of bed. . . . Cary set a new record for tying a bow-tie. There is a bit of dialogue to go with this process, and the tie had to be put on and tied correctly before Mr. Grant finished talking. Try as he would to speak slowly, the best he could do was eight seconds. Consequently, Cary is probably the only man in existence who can manage this ticklish job in such a short time. . . . Jimmy Gleason tried to talk Director Hall into permitting him to wear a toupee in this picture. Mr. Hall didn't think he'd like it. Jimmy took things into his own hands, including $55.00, waltzed into the nearest wiggery and bought himself a head of hair. When he showed up on the set next day, cast took one look and broke into howls of laughter. Mr. Hall made a quick movement with his hand, and for the second time in his life, Mr. Gleason lost his hair!

THE WHITE CLIFFS

This is the kind of picture that wins Academy Awards. It's full of laughter and love and tears, and it is handled with consummate artistry. It is the story of a girl named Susan Dunn, who goes to England to stay two weeks and spends the rest of her life there. A girl who becomes Lady Ashwood but stays a Yankee in her heart. All the little differences between the English and Americans are brought out into the open and shown up as insignificant in the face of the big things that bind our countries together.

Irene Dunne is a natural and appealing Susan, and Alan Marshal makes Sir John Ashwood a fine, romantic figure. Roddy McDowall, Frank Morgan, Van Johnson and Gladys Cooper all give superb characterizations.

When Susan arrives in England with her father, Hiram Dunn (Frank Morgan), it starts to rain. It keeps raining for two weeks, and all Susan sees of England is fog and a few museums. Then, the night before they are to leave, a kindly old gentleman (C. Aubrey Smith) takes her to a court ball and she meets Sir John Ashwood. That does it! Susan goes to visit John's family at their ancestral home instead of accompanying her father back to America.

The house is a huge old place—beautiful, but cold and a little frightening. John's mother and friends are like that, too. At first Susan can't get on with them at all, but later she learns to love them. She already loves John, and he persuades her to marry him and live in England, in spite of her father's outraged indignation. They have a wonderful honeymoon. Then—World War I, and John must join his regiment.

During the weary years of war, Susan and her mother-in-law (Gladys Cooper) become close friends. Susan bears a son, a new Lord Ashwood, but John dies in battle before he ever sees his heir. America enters the war at last. In one of the most heart-stirring scenes you ever saw, Susan holds her baby up in her arms to see the Yanks come swinging up the old London street to the strains of "The Stars and Stripes Forever." Young John Ashwood grows to manhood, with the ever-present threat of another war hanging over him. When that war comes at last, Susan accepts with patriotic resignation the part he must play in it.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Clarence Brown has a peculiar superstition. He directs the first scene of each day's shooting with his bedroom slippers on. Then changes to his shoes. . . . Peter Lawford really went into training for his strenuous role in this picture. Spent every evening in the U.C.L.A. gymnasium, working on the bars and rings. . . . Roddy McDowall made two important speeches while this was in production. One was to the A.E.R.C.O. workers in a Long Beach, California, plant and one was at a Pacific Coast shipyard upon their presentation of the Army-Navy "E" award. Reason for these talks, of course, is that Roddy's father is an officer in the British Merchant Marine. . . . Take a good look at the lace on Miss Dunne's white gown. It's priceless heirloom lace from Belgium which belonged to Irene's grandmother and also adorned Miss Dunne's wedding dress at her marriage to Dr. Francis Griffin. . . Technical director for this picture was Lt. Gen. Sir Sidney Lawford, father of Peter Lawford. General Lawford was one of the highest ranking officers of World War I . . Idea for "White Cliffs of Dover" came from the poem of the same name written by the late Alice Miller after the terrific bombings of the English Coast. Miss Miller was inspired by the courage and determination of the people who lived near the famous White Cliffs. . . . Director Clarence Brown took the cast on location to his ranch in Calabassas, California. Has done this for every picture he's made. . . The two landing barges used in the portrayal of the Dieppe raid were built by the prop department and are exact replicas of those actually used in the 1942 raid.

PARDON MY RHYTHM

A gentleman named William Shakespeare once turned out a little opus called "The Comedy Of Errors." If he hadn't already used the title, it would have been an apt one for this Universal picture. Practically everyone in "Pardon My Rhythm" suspects somebody of being in love with someone else, and it's usually the wrong person. If you don't get what I mean (and who could?) go and see the picture. You'll not only find out who loves who, but you'll be soothed by the charming voice of Gloria Jean and the rhythmic cadences of Bob Crosby's orchestra.

It all starts with Gloria Jean's boy friend, one Ricky O'Bannon. (His pay check at Universal is made out to Mel Torme.) Ricky has a high school orchestra that's hotter than an overworked machine gun. The band practices at the home of Jinx Page (Gloria Jean) and ignores the neighbors' agonized protests. The kids are after top honors in a state band contest, and the neighbors' nerves are of secondary importance.

At the contest finals, the hours of practice are rewarded. Their band wins! Bob Crosby is one of the judges, and he goes for the way Ricky plays the drums. So much so that he wants to sign the kid for his own band, pronto. But Jinx counsels Ricky to wait till after the national finals, much to Crosby's indignation. What's this little mouse got to do with it, anyway? This is a deal between men! Irked at the intervention, Crosby dreams up a plot. He asks his beautiful torch singer, Dixie (Marjorie Weaver), to make with the eyes at Ricky and persuade him to listen to reason. Jinx (no dope, she!) gets hep and does some counter-scheming. She persuades her handsome father, Tony (Pat Knowles), to go to work on Dixie. Tony's girl, Julia (Evelyn Ankers), decides he's really in love with Dixie and is pretty upset as a result. Crosby also takes a very poor view of such goings on—Dixie is supposed to be working on Ricky, not Tony. Ricky himself has no idea what's cooking, but whatever it is he doesn't like it! See what I mean about a comedy of errors? Of course everything straightens out eventually to the sound of some very hot music from the band.—Univ.

P. S.

Hep-cats and 'gators will find a new idol in Mel Torme, 18-year-old composer-singer-drummer-actor, who gives out with some very fancy drum work along with Bob Crosby's orchestra. . . . Mel breezed through the picture breaking every standing superstition of the industry. Brought his black cat to work, whistled on stage, walked under ladders and refused to do business on any other day of the month but the thirteenth. . . . Gloria Jean signed her fifth consecutive contract with Universal during production. . . . Juvenile orchestra was drafted from among the personal friends of Miss Jean. Kids are all appearing professionally for the first time. . . . Bob Crosby gets his long-awaited

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Frank was singing on the stage of the Paramount when some smarty threw him a penny. Quick-witted Sinatra smiled and said, "There's only one kind of animal that throws a (s)cent"—then nodded to the orchestra and finished his song (amid the cheering of his fans.)

Are You in the Know?

In writing your soldier, do you—
- ☐ Rave about your dates
- ☐ Tell him your troubles
- ☐ "Talk" to him as you always did

Don't be a tear jerk...or killjoy! "Talk" to him gaily...give with the latest gag. Let your heart have a word, about the talks, walks, dances you shared. You'll be glad you didn't break those dates, when your calendar said "stay home." You didn't—for you'd learned Kotex isn't like other napkins...doesn't just "feel soft" at first touch. That Kotex is more comfortable because it stays soft while wearing.

What is she doing?
- ☐ Playing with dolls
- ☐ Studying Fashion Design
- ☐ Learning puppetry

Got a knack with the needle? Good style sense? Fashion design offers a rosy future! Meanwhile, join Home Ec and Art classes. And as shown here, practice fashion design with miniature models. Fashion, you know, inspired the flat, pressed ends of Kotex. This is a patented Kotex feature—ends that don't show because they're not stubby. You can wear the clingingest creation with nary a telltale line!

Should you try this if you are—
- ☐ Shy
- ☐ On the prawl
- ☐ A five by five

Each answer is right, and here's why. Any active sport unshells the timid soul . . . pares down excess poundage. And for date bait, it's wizard! So, play up—even on "trying days". With Kotex sanitary napkins you can say goodbye to little nagging worries. For Kotex has no wrong side to cause accidents. And the special Kotex safety center gives you worry-proof protection.

Know your napkins—

More women use KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

"DAYS OF GLORY"

1,352 PRIZES!

1ST PRIZE..........I. J. FOX FUR COAT

2ND PRIZE......$200 IN WAR BONDS*

Try and try again prizes

1,350 Prizes of $1 each in War Stamps

* All Bonds and Stamps donated by RKO Studios.

 If you win one of these prizes, you are still eligible to compete in future contests.

HERE'S HOW: Turn to the picture story of "Days of Glory" on page 40, and see picture No. 9. What do you think Toumanova is saying to Gregory Peck? What would you say if suddenly you found yourself in the arms of the man you loved, facing untold dangers, seeing him, perhaps, for the last time? Maybe, like Toumanova, you'd say "Darling . . . I know it now . . . A person can die of happiness!" Or maybe you wouldn't make any noble speeches, maybe you'd just murmur "Dearest." Try to put yourself in Nina's place, and in your caption (15 words or less), say whatever you think you'd really say in her situation. Be sure to read the story of "Days of Glory" on page 40 before writing your caption.

RULES:

1. Write your caption in not more than 15 words.
2. Fill in your FULL NAME and address on the coupon. State whether Mr., Miss or Mrs. (If Mrs., give your own first name, not your husband's.) If your coupon is not complete, your entry will not be valid.
3. Submit only one entry. More than one will disqualify you.
4. Anyone may enter the contest except employees of the Dell Publishing Company and members of their families, and those who have already won big prizes in MODERN SCREEN'S 1944 contest series.
5. Entries to be eligible must be postmarked not later than July 10, 1944.
6. Neatness will count, but do not send in elaborate entries, as they will receive no preference.
8. The contest will be judged by the editorial staff of MODERN SCREEN. Decision of the judges will be final.

Has over 30 in his collection, several of which are authentic Egyptian and Indian trinkets taken from the tombs and crypts of the ancient world.

GOODBYE, MY LOVE

This twisted tale of passion and murder is played against the somber backdrop of Russia just before the Revolution. There is a curious quality of predestination about it. When the characters face tragedy, they never try to avoid it. Instead, they pace the floor, muttering about fate and the stars.

Take Fedja (George Sanders), for instance. He is a young judge, banished from St. Petersburg to polite exile in a country town because of over-fondness for the wrong kind of women. Does his exile teach him anything? At first, it seems it's going to. He becomes engaged to a charming and well-bred girl, Nadina Kalenin (Anna Lee). He is, he tells his old friend, Count Volsky (Edward E. Horton), completely reformed. The count, who is known as "Piggy," is a futile, silly little man, typical perhaps of the decadent aristocracy of the period.

Fedja's reform lasts only until he meets Olga (Linda Darnell). The Greeks had a word for girls like Olga, but you can't use it in a nice magazine like MODERN SCREEN. She is engaged to an elderly overseer named Urbanin (Hugo Haas). But, regardless, on the very day of her wedding she begins an affair with Fedja which is to bring tragedy to five people.

Nadina is the first. Olga deliberately lets her learn of the affair, and Nadina, broken-hearted, gives up Fedja forever. Then Count Volsky becomes enamored of Olga, and, since he has considerably more money than Fedja, finds her responsive. She is, as a matter of fact, planning to keep them both around, but this proves impossible. For one thing, her husband Urbanin, who never knew of the affair with Fedja, soon sees the Count's interest. That is when the murders begin. They don't stop until destiny at last steps in, and justice is done—by accident.

George Sanders almost succeeds in making you sorry for the passion-crazed Fedja. Anna Lee and Linda Darnell are, as usual, ornamental.—U. A.

your string. They'll be noticing you by now. (They always notice the girls who get convoyed to class.) Begin dropping them casual hello's and have some sure-fire conversation-starters on hand for that terrific moment when one of them pilots you from Latin to gym. Something as trivial as, "Gosh, I used to be afraid of you!" or "No doubt you've heard it before, but you do look like Sonny Tufts," will please him pink.

Now that you really know some boys, how to maneuver them to the dating point? Half the time, you have to put the words in their mouths. F'rinstance. You both like Duke Ellington. You've got a couple of his new platters, so you say to Bill quote come on over and I'll play them for you some time unquote. Most likely, he'll name the night, and whee! you've got a date. Other methods: You discuss picnics. He loves 'em. You do, too. So say, "Wanna try out my new charcoal stove some Saturday?" Turns out he does! He says he's going to see "Lady in the Dark" this weekend. You say, Coincidence! So are you. He says why not go together. Or maybe he's going horse-back-riding Sunday. Well, golly, you are, too. Sunday at ten, then? Fine! You'd love it! That's the way it goes at first. When you've broken the ice, things just get rolling, and you'll find yourself turning down as many as you're snapping up.

Mother and Dad usually take the first date kind of hard. One minute you're a wee thing in a torn pair of jeans; the next minute you're all slick 'n' smooth and jabbering something about Saturday night. It kind of hits them. Better to say, "Joe Blow asked me to go to the movies with him Saturday," instead of a flat, "I'm going to the movies with J. B. Saturday." "I'm going" is frequently a red flag in your father's face, and "you are not" is a likely rejoinder. Having dropped the bombshell, be prepared to answer a million questions. They'll want to know who he is, what his father does, what crowd he goes with, what he eats for breakfast. Forewarned is forearmed, so inquire around about him. (This, incidentally, is as much for your own benefit as your family's.) And no need to tell you to steer clear of lads with not-so-hot reputations. Be as casual as you can about the whole business, because if you're practically hysterical with excitement, the family may see fit to call it off. If, on the other hand, you take it in your stride, act as if it were the most natural thing in the world, ten to one they will, too.

You look your most swoony, and you're all ready at the appointed hour. When the doorbell rings, you're the one to answer it, not Mom—who though perfectly harmless might frighten him out of his wits—nor your leering little brother. Greet him with a big smile, a "Hi!" and take him in to say hello to the family. If you're going to leave him while you go grab a coat, give the group a conversational straw to clutch at. Something like, "Bob's mother works over at Red Cross, too, Mom." Or, "He's our ace half-miler, Pops." Then hurry, hurry, and leave before anyone gets bored. Once you're out in the wide world, start the talk going with something blithe like, "I think you made a hit with Dad," or "Mmm, I like the sport coat." Let him help you going up and down curbs, praise the seats he snags at the movies, let him recommend a delish sundae for you after the show. When you get home, hand him the door key and let him wrestle with the trick lock. It's such tiny things as these that make a man feel awfully man-of-the-world. Big points to remember: 1, Boys like to talk about themselves, but they need a starting point. Your best bet is to quiz them about what branch of the service they want and why. 2, The girl is the one to say when it's time to go home, and be sure you say when while things are still fizzing. Don't wait until you're yawning in each other's faces. 3, Your date wants to know you've had a luscious evening, so tell him, and here's one time you can lay the adjectives on thick.

to kiss or not to kiss . . .

We know it's a problem. When you don't kiss them, they think you're an iceberg, and when you do, they think you're fast. What to do? Well, first let's talk about when to say no. Never, never kiss them on the first date or even on the second or third. After you've become quite good friends, a nice, tender good-night kiss just seems to make a swell evening perfect. Sort of like the icing on a cake. However, it's up to you to confine your woo to that brief, sweet moment at the door. He would very likely love to come in and talk it over in your dimly lighted living room. Maybe you'd like it, too, but if you want to hang on to his friendship and to the friendship of all the other nice guys you're dating, skip the smooching department. He can hold your hand in the movies, put his arm around you walking home, kiss you good night a couple of times—but as for really sitting down and going at it seriously, nope! Your foot's down.

So much for when, now let's talk about how to say no. The first time he tries to kiss you, ward him off with, "Ah, Bill, this has been so much fun. Don't let's spoil it." Or, "Gosh, you're way ahead of me, Bill. Let's save that for awhile, shall we?" Then give his hand a nice friendly squeeze and skip inside before he has a chance to make an issue of it. He'll be intrigued, not angry. After your friendship's established, and you've progressed to good-night kisses, he may persist in trying to lure you into bigger and better lerve bouts. That's when you appeal to his better nature with such-like: "I'm disappointed, Butch. I thought you and I were a little above that stuff." Or, "I guess I was wrong about you, Joe. Here I've been thinking you were kind of special." If he gets huffy at you, let him huff straight out of your life. You're well rid of him.

I met a sailor at a USO dance for whom I am but mad! We exchanged addresses (he's on the briny now), and I've written him a dozen letters and torn them all up thinking I should let him write first. Would it be too hussy-ish if I were to scrawl him a strictly unsentimental note?—Nancy Shea, Madison, Wis.

G'wan and write to the guy. It's perfectly according to Hoyle, and he'll be thrilled. Don't drool, but break down and give him a ration of sentiment. You know, "Gosh, I miss you," or something. Then let him answer before you V-mail him again. After the correspondence gets under way, don't worry about who owes whom a letter. Just write whenever you feel particularly communicative. He'll love it!

I haven't heard from my favorite sergeant in three months, and I'm frantic. It's not that I doubt his love, because that's one thing in the world I'm dead sure of, but I'm worried about his safety. I don't know his home address or I'd write his mother, and I hesitate to trouble the Red Cross. Can you tell me if there is any other way to get information?—B. C., New York, N. Y.

Why not write to the chaplain attached to your soldier's outfit? Tell him your problem briefly and ask him for any information he has. Address the letter to the chaplain of your soldier's religious denomination (for example: Presbyterian Chaplain), using his (the sergeant's) overseas address.

What do you do when you fall for a chap at a Canteen, and it's beautifully mutual—only he's got a girl back home? Where does honor end and self-preservation begin?

Tell you next month, chicks. That and the answers to all the Canteen dilemmas. Meantime, the welcome mat is still on our desk, so if you've a problem, tiny or terrific, won't you let us help? Maybe it's a guy or a career or a baby that's got you frazzled. Pitch us the whole story, and we'll answer as fast as the old typewriter can beat it out. If there's a bit of a delay, don't scold us, please. We haven't forgotten you. Be sure your name and address is on the letter as well as the envelope, or we can't possibly answer you. There are dozens of address-less missives in our dead letter file right now for that very reason. Where to write? To Jean Kinkead, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

Flash! Just got a note from Wade Magrum, president of the Roddy McDowall Fan Club, inviting all Co-Eds who like Roddy to join. Two very enticing features of his club are: (1) There are no dues at all. It keeps going on voluntary donations. (2) Through the club you can acquire pen pals from all over the world. For more information, write to Wade at Box 452, Peace River, Alberta, Canada.

NO ROOM FOR TROUBLES IN THE NEW KIT BAG . . .

But plenty of room for magazines and note paper, cigarettes, sewing kits, razor blades . . . shall we go on? Or is it enough to say that all the small essentials servicemen keep writing home for are being packed in Red Cross kits and sent overseas. Trouble is, somebody's got to do the packing. Somebody's also got to make the thousands of surgical dressings . . . and the layettes for servicemen's babies . . . and sweaters and endless other items. Does a finger seem to point to you? Well, swell. Stop by at your local Red Cross and get the dope on their Production Corps. You know, if you're too tied up to come downtown, there's work you can do at home . . . with patterns, materials and instructions furnished by the Red Cross. And if your club just happens to be casting around for a project, what nobler one than this? There've been lots of surgical dressing contests in high schools through the Junior Red Cross. And, boy, you should have seen that white gauze fly.

TRUSHAY* . . . THE "BEFOREHAND" LOTION

Smooth it on before you tackle daily soap-and-water jobs! Helps keep busy hands soft!

A marvelously different idea in lotions! Trushay, used before you wash undies—before you do dishes—guards smooth, white hands. Helps prevent soap-and-water damage, instead of trying to correct it after it's done. This rich, creamy lotion's grand for all-over body rubs, too—soft and soothing for chapped elbows and knees. Trushay's economical, so you can use it all these ways. Ask for it today —at your favorite drug counter.

*Trushay was formerly called Toushay. A different spelling —but the same wonderful "beforehand" lotion.

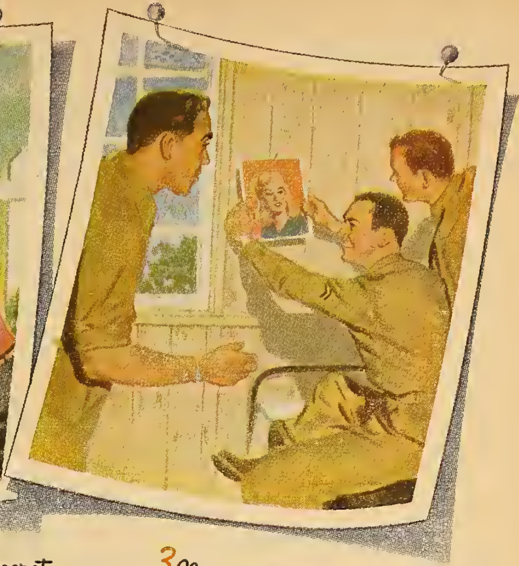
1 Winnie had the glooms the day Mommy snapped this picture. "I'm nobody's pin-up girl," she sobbed. "What I need more'n anything is a complexion like your velvet-cheeked baby's." Mommy smiled sympathetically: "Baby's beauty routine is no military secret. Listen . . ."

2 Then she learned my Beauty Secret —regular, gentle cleansings with pure, mild Ivory Soap. My doctor backed Mommy up on that! He told Winnie why my Ivory's so good for grown-up girls' complexions . . . "It has no coloring, medication or strong perfume that might be irritating."



3 Now, she's a Pin-up Girl—prettiest one in the whole darn barracks. Her Corporal says so! That "Ivory Look" is what he goes for—that smoother, velvety complexion she wanted and won. No wonder Winnie's piling praise on me, and my one 'n' only beauty soap—Ivory.

surprise! for our readers

Is there anything duller than a bowl of oatmeal (with or without lumps)? If there is, it's a magazine without surprises. Having spent a quarter of a century hating oatmeal, you can imagine how I love a surprise . . . To make a long story short, we've just signed Louella Parsons to write our Good News each month. Henry and I are fixing to take a walk in the clouds. And will Superman kindly move over and let a couple of good men pass? . . . Yeah. That's how this newest surprise makes us feel. And why not? We're going to be the best-informed movie magazine in America. Shucks—in the world! . . . You all know Louella Parsons. In Hollywood, nobody has a baby—not even a twinkle in the eye—without Louella's knowing it. She's as much a part of Hollywood as Metro or Grauman's Chinese. She's seen stars grow—and fade, helped build them. She loves Hollywood, and it's a two-way romance! . . . Turn right now to page 58, where Louella greets you. Perhaps you'd like to answer in kind with a little note to welcome her. She'd love to hear from you. We're proud to welcome Louella Parsons to the MODERN SCREEN gang. . . . P. S. Fredda Dudley's still going to be with us, knocking out those swell stories as only she can. Take a look at the terrific job on Betty Grable's new baby on page 36!

Who Shot Lon

● It was a night to remember. A thing to take away with you. Lon, standing on his head in a corner over some darn fool charade. A couple of guys at the phonograph drooling over James. The Great Dane kissing each guest as he entered. And later, the wonderful mellowness of midnight with the fire toasting their toes and oiling their tongues. After-the-war talk of a sloop off the Bahamas. Lon's sloop . . . and Bill Eythe's. And two hours later the way they all unfolded themselves and said they really had to go and promptly stayed till three. Then, finally, on leaving, the way they stood at the front door telling us from MODERN SCREEN what a fine party we'd thrown for Lon. "Wonderful party! It's awful he has to go, but since he does, darn it, this is the way to do it." That evening just about wound things up for Lon. Except for the large to-do at the studio just the day before he left for camp. (They'd managed somehow to rush through prints of his new film, "Home in Indiana," for him to see before going.) Lon stumbled through those last weeks at home looking forward and backward at once. Melting at the old things and, gosh, so eagerly toward all the newness ahead.

We did! Yep, lined up the victim . . .

aimed our Rolleiflex . . . and clicked! And, honestly, we never shot a sweeter guy.

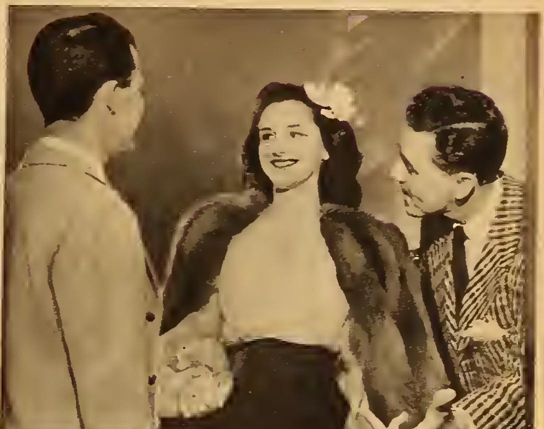
McCallister?



Lan and pal Eythe greeted guests effusively. First arrivals were Mary Anderson, Marj Riordan (above) who sped over from set. Left at 11, to make 6 A.M. calls!

Object of Eat the String game: to race opponent down to dollar bill in middle. Winnah: Mary Anderson. Said runner-up Lan, "Aw, I let her. She's my guest."

Balloon-blowing John Harvey took terrific ribbing from Lan and Marj. But he was last to leave. Hated to go 'cause wife Judy was in hospital with their first child, 4-day-old Joanna.

Prize-winning charade was Mary Anderson playing a mare; Bill, a doe, and Lan a lamb. Catch? Four days later Mary celebrated second anniversary alone with book. Husband's in Navy.

Gang split into 3-man teams, practically blew brains out trying to waft balloon into center of room, on hands and knees. Blonde June Haver, just 18, piano soloed with Cincinnati Symphony Ork at 7, studied at same dramatic school as Ty Power. Dates Farley Granger.

Grandma spent most of evening rustling victuals for party. At studio party, few days later, pals optimistically presented Lon with pocket of razor blades and poem to fit. Other gifts: books, 6 Bibles.

Gang watched from bleachers while Lon tried walking across floor in foot-long strides, on string seen only through telescope. Mary Anderson and Marj Riordan, Lon's official cheerers, wrote him stacks of letters, made him promise to open just 1 a day in Army.

Few days after this, Lon was answering to name of Herbert, issuing clodhoppers to new G.I.'s. Got pass from 2:30 Sat. till 9 P.M. Sun., first week-end. Trolleyed straight home. Spent evening with Eythe.

Humphrey, who never saw Hollywood's "Casablanca," did see real thing on overseas stint with wife, Don Cummings and Ralph Hark, above.

Humphrey and Sluggy (short for Mayo) took off on Nov. 24 for war zones, lighted back in Los Angeles, 35,000 miles later, after intensive entertainment tour of the Mediterranean and African theaters.

Flying over old Pompeii, Bogie yelped, "Look at those ruins of Pompeii." Tough little G.I. beside him shrugged, "Heck, you ought to see what we did to Bizerte." (Above with wife Mayo and Co.)

"The Filthy Four"

It was a thing, that tour! Bogey and Co. jouncing in jeeps over shell-pocked roads . . . thumbing rides on fighter planes . . . tossing gags off the backs of trucks to hand the weary guys a laugh.

■ The set that day was a cheap waterfront barroom. Hollywood extras made up like tough mugs leaned on the counter, and in one corner a colored boy banged a piano, honky-tonk style. A greasy bartender slopped over drinks on the bar. Flashy half-caste tootsie extras swayed in and out.

"Okay!" called the director. He had lined up the first scene of "To Have and Have Not," Ernest Hemingway's hairy-chested shocker of the Florida keys. It was a setting for violence, vice and rugged love. It would be Humphrey Bogart's first scene in his first picture since he came back to Hollywood from entertaining Uncle Sam's overseas soldiers.

"Okay, Bogie," repeated the director. "Now you stroll into the dive—plenty tough, see? C'mon, let's go through it once. Just to get the feel of it."

Humphrey Bogart left the side of his wife, Mayo, who had driven him to the studio. He strolled on the scene, dirty denims, a sweat-stained shirt, cigarette drooping from his twisted mouth. A bad hombre, you could tell. Slowly Bogie sized up the joint. He raised his ice-tea "whiskey" to his lips.

But suddenly he grinned, then laughed out loud. That wasn't in the script. But Bogie couldn't help it.

"Well, honey," he yelled to Mayo, "I guess this is where we came in!"

It was indeed. But with all that familiar Bad Man Bogie setting, it still seemed mighty strange to Humphrey Bogart to be back in Hollywood making faces for a camera again. Like it seemed queer to be sleeping in soft beds, taking shower baths, seeing lights blaze at night, eating (Continued on page 98)

Some people die and go to heaven. Some—like Vicki Grable James . . . are born right into it!

■ The band assembled quickly for rehearsal at the broadcasting station. Two dilatory members, taking Gulliver strides and breathing hard, rounded a corner and made for the rehearsal room. Outside they took an extra second to smooth their hair and straighten their ties. Even late, they didn't want to look as if they thought they were late. When they sauntered in, they discovered that their brief drama was without an important audience. For the first time in the memory of band members, Harry James was absent from rehearsal.

With their eyes doing splits between the clock and the door, the band waited. At last, 30 minutes (Continued on page 113)

At Long Beach Bond rally, Grable's nylons went for $40,000. Army poll places James above Grable, rates him as favorite maestro.

Before baby came, Betty played backgammon with Harry for staggering stakes. Winner socked money into baby bank. (Above: "Pin Up Girl," with John Harvey.)

Betty, who's a crony of Lana Turner's, hopes her Victoria will bloom into the gorgeous, gurgly tyke little Cheryl's turning into. Lana and Steve set the Jameses up with bassinet. (Here with Crosby at airing.)

Dedicated to her by Harry—"Only You Have Kissed My Heart." B. is only femme among top 10 entertainers named in Army camp poll.

Sour Pus

It used to be practically swords-at-dawn each time they tried to rib him. But Helmut's catching on.

By Jack Carson

The other morning Helmut Dantine walked into the office of an ambitious press agent at his studio.

"Could you," Helmut inquired politely, "show me a picture of this young lady I am always going out with to the Hollywood night clubs?"

The press agent did a double take and thought fast. He dug around in his files and came up with a picture. "Here," he said, "that's her. Your current heart beat—Gloria Van Vaincourt, the New York society heiress!" It looked a lot more like Fifi La Tour, burlesque queen, than any society heiress.

Helmut studied the still thoughtfully. "Charming," he said, with just a touch of Vienna accent. "I must meet her. When can you arrange an introduction? I want to thank her for being so nice to me."

The press agent gulped and grinned. Then he had to confess what Helmut Dantine already suspected—that there wasn't any Gloria Van Vaincourt—except for publicity purposes. He had to wise up Helmut (Continued on page 86)

One day soon after Helmut landed, cop overtook his car, said "Pull over." H., thinking cop was chummy W. Union boy, smiled, drove on. Got ticket.

Helmut wangled advance of $200 on first role, sunk it safely into filling station. Juiciest role to date, dark-eyed Greek in "Mask of Dimitrios."

Seeing British Army pic, "Desert Victory," Dantine gasped to find, among prisoners, the Nazi who'd tossed him into concentration camp 5 yrs. before.

STORY. The plain lay flat and ugly, war-scarred, rising slightly as it approached the forest. On the horizon was the bomb-shattered outline of a city. Here on the Russian plain around Tula even the sky was grey, heavy, forbidding. A wagon came hurtling down the dirt rutted road; its driver was standing on the seat urging the panting horses forward. Behind him, still in the distance, two German (Continued on page 106)

PRODUCTION. Not one member of the cast will look familiar to movie-goers. Producer Casey Robinson, armed with a strong, stirring script, said "No" to agents wanting to sell him top-ranking stars, ordered the RKO Art Department to turn out sketches of the characters in the story as he pictured them in his mind.

The finished sketches were then sent to talent scouts, to little theater groups, to drama editors all over the country. Robinson's (Continued on page 112)

1. One of Vladimir's (Gregory Peck) guerrillas finds Nina (Toumanova) slumped at edge of marsh, carries her to darkened cavern hiding the little band.

5. In long night in forest, after raid, he guesses why Nina has stayed so willingly, tells her he'll keep her near him always.

6. Yelena, quietly, hopelessly in love with Vladimir, is sent on mission, claws her way back to die of bullet wound. "Love him for the two of us," she tells Nina.

7. Later, Nina and Mitya bring Vladimir vital message from headquarters. Nazis search their meeting place.

This was no place for a dancer . . . not here with this tiny guerrilla band, in the midst of war and death. This surely was no time for love.

2. To the disgust of his sister (Dena Penn), 15-yr.-old Mitya (Glenn Vernon) is smitten by dancer's fragile beauty. The others are cool to Nina.

3. When they're ordered to join other guerillas in drawing off Germans in coming attack, Nina's forced to stay. If she leaves, hideout might be revealed.

4. In quick, heart-stopping moment, Nina kills Nazi, is accepted by Vladimir, blonde Yelena (Maria Palmer) as equal.

8. Vladimir is safely hidden. Mitya is doggedly silent before cruel grilling of Nazis. Next day, in public square, he's hanged but Vladimir and others work on.

9. Stolidly facing their certain death, Nina and Vladimir prepare for the crucial battle ahead, fearing nothing while they're together . . . caring for nothing but their work.

For awhile the O'Connors' future looked like a turkey's the day before Thanksgiving. (Part II)

But it's not such a miracle considering his life story from the beginning. Don's solid star sensation has been luck- (Continued on following page)

ing in the cards since he was born, the baby of the famous O'Connor Family, the "Royal Family of Vaudeville"—known on every American show circuit, Big Time or Tank Town. Acting and entertaining since he could open his eyes, cradled on a dressing room table and schooled between acts, Don never considered being anything but a star one day. A spunky, precocious, mischievous, wise and high-spirited kid, still he owned a tremendous loyalty to his acting clan and also never considered being the one to break up the fabulous O'Connor Family.

Yet at 12, that decision faced Don in Hollywood. When the O'Connor Family entertained at the Motion Picture Relief Banquet an offer bounced right back for the first big O'Connor movie break. But not for the O'Connor Family—just Donald. Don knew if he accepted, it meant the breaking up of the O'Connor Family, a vaudeville tradition, and his whole life up to that point. A big part with Bing Crosby meant a lot of wonderful things, too. But family loyalty won out. At the banquet that night he told the agent who had brought the exciting tidings, "I'm a vaudeville artist. I was born that way. And anyhow I don't know anything about making movies. Skip it."

The rest of the O'Connor Family had other ideas on the Hollywood break that 12-year old Donald had decided to turn down. That night in the hotel they ganged up on him—his mother and big brothers Billy and Jack.

Effie O'Connor told Don what the manager of the last theater they had played together as a family had told her. A big theater it was, in a big city, and the manager had seen thousands of entertainers come and go.

"In all the years I've been here," he told Effie, "I've predicted greatness for mighty few artists. Most of them are ham-and-eggers and always will be. But of the few I have predicted a future for—not one of them has crossed me up. And I say, Mrs. O'Connor, that that youngster of yours, Donald, is going to be a star!"

His mother hadn't told Donnie that till then; it might go to his head. But now she thought it was time. Maybe he could see that a kid with his talent couldn't deny it—family feelings or no. Sentiment went far in show business—the racket was sugary with it. But a break always kicked sentiment out the window—that's the way the (Continued on page 70)

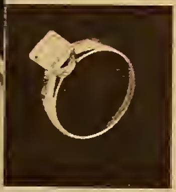
She's Engaged to an Air Force Officer

Another charming Pond's bride-to-be . . .
Helena Rausch of Middletown, Ohio, is engaged to Lawrence Richard Nelson of Dayton—now "somewhere overseas"

ON HER JOB—or at home—there's always a flower-fresh charm about Helena's soft-smooth face.



HER RING—a beautiful square-cut diamond

Helena's great, great grandparents went West in a covered wagon and settled in Ohio.

And now Helena is a pioneer, too—one of numbers of lovely Pond's engaged girls who are "war-working" for the safe return of the men they love. At the Aeronca Aircraft Corporation, where Helena has been since September 1942, about 60% of the workers are women.

Helena's own job is inspecting spare parts for airplanes—and very close to her heart. "Every girl who takes a war job is helping to bring our boys back sooner," Helena says.

All kinds of necessary jobs need women—in plants, stores, transportation, restaurants. Won't you see what you can do? Check help wanted ads, consult local U.S. Employment Service.

Her complexion is exquisite . . . porcelain-fine, and fair! "I don't know what I'd do without my Pond's Cold Cream," Helena says. "It's perfectly lovely to stroke on Pond's and smooth off that factory grime."

Helena beauty creams her face like this: She slips Pond's satin-white Cold Cream all over her face and throat. Pats lightly, quickly. This softens and releases dirt and make-up. Then she tissues off.

She "rinses" with more Pond's—swirling her creamy-tipped fingers round and round her face. "And when I tissue off again my face is sparkling clean," she says.

Use Pond's Cold Cream Helena's way—every night and every morning—for daytime clean-ups, too. It's no accident engaged girls like Helena, exquisite society women like Mrs. William Rhinelander Stewart choose Pond's.

She's lovely
She uses Pond's!

Dearest Mom

There's so much Ronnie can't talk about —the smile when you said good-by . . . the wonderful way you took Janie into your heart.

■ Dad was taking a bath when the letter came. Mom pounded at the door. "Jack, listen, listen! Ronnie says we're to come just as soon as ever we want to."

The splashing stopped for a moment, then it sounded like a couple of porpoises in the tub.

"Jack! What on earth are you doing in there?"

"Singin' glory hallelujah and scrubbin' my back!"

It wasn't a surprise exactly. Nell and Jack Reagan had known since June that they were going to join Ronnie in California. Only they hadn't expected it quite so soon. "About six months maybe," Ronnie had said. "Always provided they don't give me the air—" And here it was hardly three months . . .

Three months since Ronnie had phoned from Des Moines. The minute she heard his voice, Mom knew something was up. Always kept his feelings under control, Ronnie did, ever since he was little. But he couldn't fool her—

Janie and Mom Reagan are closed corporation, periodically hold rave sessions over their Ronnie; but only when he's out of the vicinity!

Reagans occasionally night life, prefer home and fireside. Ronnie first went into Army as cavalry reserve looey. Later was switched to Air Corps.

Before Maureen was born, Reagans salted away $5,000 for offspring's education. Planned on Notre Dame if they had a boy. Decided to let M. pick her own school when time comes.

"A big advantage we Cadet Nurses have is that the course in most schools has been stepped up . . . twenty-four to thirty months, where it used to take three years. If you are still in training when the war ends—and if you have at that time been enrolled for 90 days—you get your full course just the same."

"The Cadet uniform is so smart! It's for outdoor wear, and I don't think there's a better looking one in the women's services; but I'm glad it's optional. It is nice to get into an honest-to-goodness dress now and then to remind yourself, and the boys, that you're a girl after all."

"Of course, I want to get married; but being a nurse doesn't mean that I can't. There are lots of chances to meet nice men, and there's free time so we can have dates. In many schools, a girl can marry while she's still a student."

"I signed up the very week I graduated"

"I guess just about every girl has thought at one time or another that she'd like to be a nurse. Now 65,000 girls like me are getting the chance this year . . . the U. S. Public Health Service is paying our way. Tuition and fees, room and board and uniforms—all are free . . . and we get a monthly allowance besides."

Free training with pay in the

U.S. CADET NURSE CORPS

"It's a nice feeling for a girl to know that she's doing her part in the war, for even a student nurse is soon able to help release nurses for other war service. I love children, and can't wait to help with the new babies."

"Our allowance keeps me in spending money very nicely. It starts at $15 a month, then jumps to $20 after nine months, and it's at least $30 after twenty-one months."

"Nursing's the war job with a future! There are so many opportunities—as an Army or Navy nurse, a public health or industrial health nurse, in child care, orthopedics, psychiatric nursing . . ."

"I like my school—the work is so fascinating, it's such a comfortable, pleasant place—and the girls are fun. You're allowed to choose your own nursing school, you know, just as though you were going to college."

OF A SERIES OF ADVERTISEMENTS PREPARED AND SPONSORED BY EASTMAN KODAK COMPANY, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Maureen, whom parents call "our greatest accomplishment," will be 3½ in July. Determined not to spoil her, Janie gives her household chores.

Janie's so happy over her first starring role in "Make Your Own Bed," she's infected everyone on set with beams. Inherits talent from her mom, Parisian actress-thrush.

Before landing in films, Janie tried modelling, stenography, manicuring, crooning. She's 28; Ronnie'll be 30 in Sept.

Last year at Danny Milland's birthday party flirty Maureen planted kiss on photographer. No such hussy, Janie thinks only of her "sweet little fellah"—R.R.!

Nell. But you won't get the letter till tomorrow, and I can't wait!"

A movie contract! That sort of staggered them. They were just beginning to get used to his having done so well in radio. Things were moving pretty fast for a couple of Dixon stay-at-homes. They began moving faster—

"You know what's going to happen," Ronnie was saying. "When I get out there, and I'm sure I'm going to stay, you and Dad are coming out to live."

Mom choked up. Even Dad looked a little shaken, though of course he'd have boiled in oil rather than admit it. Dad and Ronnie were alike, only Dad was more so—seemed to think it was some kind of crime to betray emotion. Neil was more like Mom. He'd come up behind her at the stove, "How's for a kiss?—Okay, never mind the act. You know you're dying to kiss me!"

"There! Now get out before I throw you out—"

Ronnie's heart was just as warm, but he wasn't demonstrative. Which didn't bother Nell at all. "The Lord makes the pattern," says Nell. "Who are we to try to change it? . . ."

"Read me the letter!" (Continued on page 54)

Jack was yelling now from the bathroom.

"I'll do nothing of the kind. You come out of there and we'll read it together."

Ronnie had written: "Come whenever you're ready, but don't travel in a hurry. Take in the Grand Canyon and all the little canyons, because once you're out here, you won't want to budge."

They packed, sold their furniture and were gone by the end of the week, owing no man anything. They stopped at Des Moines by invitation to see Ronnie's first picture—"Love Is on the Air"—previewed. As Dutch Reagan, Ronnie was Des Moines' adopted son, and the town was out to honor his parents. They did the preview up brown—with reporters and everything—and sent the clippings around to Nell and Jack.

" 'There sat his tearful mother—' ", read Jack.

Nell winced. "They must have meant cheerful—"

"Every little while she'd murmur, 'That's our son.' "

"I never opened my head!"

" 'There sat his gray-haired father,' They got one thing right anyway—"

"One thing right!!! Why, Jack Reagan, there's not a gray hair in your head!"

"Just a moment, please. 'There sat his gray-haired father, handsomer than either of his boys—'." He slipped the clipping carefully into his wallet. "All I know," grinned Jack, "is what I read in the papers."

They took their time driving out, saw all the wonderful places they'd always dreamed of seeing. Ronnie was working the morning they arrived, but he got an hour off and dashed over to the hotel where he'd taken an apartment for them.

The whole thing seemed too good to be true. To have California and the boys as well—because Neil came out, too, before very long—was almost more than anyone had a right to ask. If it hadn't been for Jack's heart . . .

They'd found out about it several years ago—that day he'd told Nell, of his own accord, to send for the doctor. Her own heart (Continued on page 79)

love story

You have no words for it . . . it's simply there, in Lana's voice and in her eyes when she talks about the baby.

In midst of supposedly idyllic marriage, Lana's divorce action came as bambshell. Steve, recently signed by Columbia, is expected ta became screen star.

■ If Lana were twins, she'd be perfectly happy. One of her could go to M-G-M and make "Marriage Is a Private Affair." One could stay home with the baby. As it is, she trots bravely off to the studio each morning, and leaves her heart behind.

"Look at inventors," says she, "and the wonderful stuff they invent. Look at Einstein, figuring things nobody understands. Why don't they get busy on something important—like how you can be in two places at the same time?"

You think she's beautiful? Brother, you ain't seen nothin' till you've seen her face when she's talking about her baby. It's hard to describe the transformation. Take all the words the poetry boys toss around —like tender (Continued on page 57)

Before Cheryl came, fans hoped for another Lana, deluged Cranes with wee pink items. Cherry's all the baby Lana wants right now, will have no more for while.

Night Cranes turned up at Academy Award dinner with Frank Sinatra and Gloria De Haven, Lana wore flat-top chignoned hair-do created for her rale in "Marriage Is a Private Affair."

and luminous and starry and radiant—combine their best features with Lana's, and you begin to get the general idea.

She's ready to admit that there've been babies before Cheryl Christina, and babies since. Even prettier babies maybe—how should she know?—she hasn't seen them all. ("I don't believe it," she whispers in Cheryl's ear.) She wouldn't brag about her child—certainly not. It's not bragging to say that at seven months she weighs 21 lbs. Stick her on the scales if you don't believe it. It's not bragging to repeat what the doctor said—"the Cranes have a perfect child." That's just science or something. She knows Cheryl's no different from hundreds of other babies. ("Don't you believe it, darling—of course you're different—you're the only one that belongs to me.")

To say she counts every moment lost that's not spent with her daughter is a mild exaggeration. Very mild. Look what she misses when she's away. For instance, the night she got home and her mother flew to meet her—

"The baby's *walk*ing!!"

"You're *kid*ding!!!"

"All around her crib—hanging on to the bars—"

"And I wasn't here to see—"

"Come on in. Maybe she'll do it again—"

But you can't fool Cheryl. Having been fed and sponged and stuck in her crib, she knew what came next, and it wasn't walking. She smiled dreamily up at her mother—"There's a time for everything"—and went off to sleep. Lana had to wait till Sunday to see the miracle with her own eyes. And though she'd been prepared, it still came as something of a shock. Her baby standing on her own little-bitty feet. (She doesn't say little-bitty, she coos it like a dove—it's a kiss, a caress, adoration, thanksgiving and laughter all rolled into one.)

Next, she was at the phone, calling the doctor. "But she's only seven months. They don't walk till they're practically young ladies. Do you think it's all right?"

"I don't know what you can do about it. If she's walking, that means she's ready to walk." (Continued on page 93)

■ Hello, all you MODERN SCREEN readers. Let's get acquainted.

You and I are going to do Hollywood together for a while—so it's best we get to know each other.

I hope what you have heard about me is nice—at least, fair. I'm not half the Lady Ogre I've been painted. I know YOU a great deal better than you suspect.

I know that most of you are young, eager and very interested in what makes Hollywood go 'round. Well, so am I.

Maybe I'm not a debutante, or a size 16 any more. But I've never grown blasé about the movies and the people who make them—and I hope I never will.

If you feel like writing, I'll be glad to get your suggestions about people and parties you would like to hear about. So—here we go!

As a hostess there's one thing I have never had the courage to do—and that is to invite two girls who like the same man to the same party.

So wouldn't you know it would be a man, Eddie Mannix, who would invite three of Captain Clark Gable's favorite "dates" to the same shindig? Only a man could pull a thing like that!

On his last furlough, Gea. Mantgomery braught Dinah o diamond brocelet. They rarely entertain, prefer ta be alone!

The '43 Academy Award winners: Paul Lukas far "Watch an the Rhine" and Jennifer Janes far "Sanq af Bernadette."

The ladies, all blondes, were Betty Hutton, Virginia Bruce and Kay Williams. Far be it from me to take sides, but here is what happened:

Virginia Bruce talked "politics" all evening.

It was Betty Hutton's birthday—so she talked mostly about herself.

Kay Williams didn't do much talking.

P.S. Captain Gable took Kay Williams home that evening. (There should be a moral there somewhere.)

* * *

From a supposedly "secret" destination, Bob Hope sent Bing Crosby a Panama hat with the note:

"Guess where I've been?"

Frank Sinatra and Gloria de Haven got along like a Welsh Rarebit and a dish of ice cream on "Manhattan Serenade." There were fireworks from start to finish between The Voice and the little cutie from M-G-M who apparently never was a Sinatra swooner.

The big flare-up came two days before the picture was finished.

Gloria walked out on the set wearing a huge feather in her hat. It got in his way, and Fraaaaaankie was annoyed. There was some foot-stamping and tears on Gloria's part and some sulks from Sinatra.

But it all had the most beautiful ending: Frankie presented Gloria with a watch set in rubies when the picture was finished. "Thanks" he wrote, "for being so swell about—everything!"

Richard Jaeckel's at the age where he feels he has to swallow life and drama in big chunks. One day he talks about getting married. The next, he's going to join the Coast Guard.

He's 17 now—and a movie hero ever since "Guadalcanal." But I can remember when he was in short pants and used to come out to Marsons Farm with his mother.

It's just three years ago Easter that he came to me and said: "Aunt Lolly, I'm too big to hunt Easter eggs with the other kids. They're so little—and I find them all. It isn't fair!" Now, when I see him, he talks about his next starring role!

Inscribed in a ring Paul Lukas gave his wife, Daisy, on their 16th wedding anniversary is, "For Services Far Beyond the Line of Duty!"

Betty Hutton's dying to fall in love!

"Gosh! What's the matter with me? What's the matter with the men? I have a date—and the guy sends flowers—and we go out to dinner—and the lights are low—and the music is sweet—and maybe he's going into the service next week—so we get sentimental—and you both think for a little while that maybe you're in love.

"So what happens? The next morning—it's just a flashback!"

She's the craziest kid in Hollywood. But one of the swellest—and most honest.

Maybe if Betty would stop trying so hard to fall in love, the real thing might come along.

"Van Johnson," one of the M-G-M executives told me, "is Frank Sinatra without the voice!" He based this amazing claim on the reaction of the girls at the preview of "Two Girls and a Sailor." They didn't swoon—but they squealed plenty!

Alan Ladd is 1-A again, as you know—but I wish everyone would quit taking the attitude of being (Continued on page 62)

■ A man needs a fresh girl once Summer starts to set in. Now, hold on a sec'. Who said anything about switching partners? I mean flower-fresh, dew-fresh. You all along, silly—cotton-fresh! From one stylist to another, there's nothing better. Why d'ya suppose Adrian mixed cotton up with sequins for evening the way he did? And why do you think that—right this minute—gals with that kind of money are paying around $100 a throw for cottons in the hoity-toity New York shops?

There's more to it than meets the eye—even the fashion eye. F'rinstance, most men can't stand anything but cotton next to them—which should give you an idea or two. I'll admit it takes plenty of tubbing. But it takes to tubbing so beautifully. If Sonja Henie can go for the soap-suds routine the way she does in the interests of spic-'n'-span-ness—so can you.

First off, you need a suit to wear right now in town. If you're a lazy-bones about ironing, seersucker's your dish. But it won't win you an Oscar for originality in 1944. Chambray, now, is something to shout about. Especially when it's tailored the way I found it here. Comes in misty blue, rose or "brief case" tan (that's just war-time for "luggage," pal). Wish they'd let me send along a sample of the big crystal buttons. They're super.

Of course, I know you're itching to wear those shoulders of yours sunny side up. And you needn't be a Maria Montez to do it in my pet Mexico sunback cotton. Has a ghost of a bolero to keep you within the law within the city limits. Notice closely the way the bolero stripes go cross-wise atop the up-and-down stripes of the skirt. An old Latin trick that broadens the shoulder line, makes the rest of you slim by contrast. Comes in south-of-the-border color combinations—brown, purple or green predominating. Another Mexico idea is black cotton in the same kind of outfit. Wonderful if your (Continued on page 97)

"so sorry." and moaning, "What a shame about Ladd."

I'm sure that is not the way Alan feels. He was honorably discharged from the Army because of his health. He took a month's rest at Palm Springs before returning to work at Paramount in a picture with Loretta Young.

All the time he was making the film, he took good care of himself—stayed away from the night clubs and kept to the old early-to-bed-early-to-rise treatment.

If the good rest and the good care have rebuilt his strength and recovered his health—I'm sure Alan would be the last guy in the world to feel with his maudlin sympathizers—"so sorry"—that he will be back in Uncle Sam's uniform after he completes "Two Years Before the Mast."

I WISH: Judy Garland would start looking more like she did when she was plump, saucy and happy . . . Maria Montez' studio would forget those sarongs for awhile. She's one of the best dressed girls in Hollywood off screen . . . Dennis Morgan would reduce just a little . . . Joan Fontaine would change her mind about retiring from the screen after she makes "Forever" . . . the Stork would make Loretta Young very happy by making it a boy for the Tom Lewises!

It is a good thing there wasn't anyone from 20th Century-Fox around to hear Betty Grable's first words to Harry James after the arrival of Victoria Elizabeth: "You aren't disappointed because it's a little girl, are you, honey?" Betty asked. "I'll have a little boy for you, too, honest I will!"

The studio that can hardly wait for their Million Dollar Pin-Up Girl to come back to work, would have swooned en masse at that.

"Vicky" James is bedded down in the prettiest nursery in town. She sleeps in the white lace bassinette Lana Turner gave her—but everything else in the room is pink or blue.

She's a Pin-Up Baby if I ever saw one—blonde hair, blue eyes, just like her mother's.

By the way, Betty and "Vicky" wear identical little jackets—Betty's bed jackets were copied from the cute baby jackets she received at a baby shower.

The whisper around town that Shirley Temple had a boy friend named Dare Harris, the good-looking lad who accompanied her to the Academy Awards at the Chinese Theater, was greeted with laughter by the young lady herself.

"It's very funny," she told me after her picture appeared with Dare's in a morning newspaper, "I'll tell you the truth: He works for Mr. Selznick and so do I—so the studio thought it would be nice if we went to the theater together." Never thought I'd live to see the day when Shirley Temple was telling me about a publicity romance.

In spite of a few lukewarm statements to the contrary, there were paternal objections to the elopement of Donald O'Connor and Gwen Carter just before he joined up.

But the folks need have no worries. Gwen is a plenty smart little girl. She's got a very level head on both their shoulders even if she is just out of high school.

In her spare time now that Don is in the Army in Texas—she's been studying typing and shorthand.

"You never know what will happen—or how long this war will go on," Gwen says. "It's only fair for me to prepare myself to share our financial burden while he's in the service. I've read where the boys worry more about the folks at home than anything else.

"Well, it's true, Don is getting a movie star's salary in the Army. But even if he weren't, I'd want him to know there wasn't anything to worry about back home. That is," she giggled, "there won't be—if I ever learn shorthand!"

What's come over Lana Turner?

She is going in for dignity plus. The last few times I have seen her she has been arrayed in severe all-black, her hair parted in the middle and low on her neck and no trinkets or the jewelry she used to love, at all.

And I can remember when Lana was THE Sweater Girl!

Don't think for a minute that Universal is going to neglect Peggy Ryan just because Donald O'Connor is in uniform. I understand they are shopping around for some of the old Mabel Normand hits for Peggy—particularly, "Mickey."

Speaking of Peggy—she lives about a block from the Hollywood Canteen. She's a riot with the boys every time she shows up.

But most of them don't recognize the kid who gets out and spades the Victory Garden or who washes her own car in the driveway on Sunday mornings.

"It's not everybody who can be a star at the Canteen one minute—and an Ella Cinders in her own back yard right around the corner," Peggy told me.

I'm crazy about Danny Kaye. Might as well admit it. He came over to my house the other day with his wife Sylvia, and nicer people I've never met.

Danny gives Sylvia the credit for all his success. "She stuck by me when no one else could see me," he says. Both of them refused cocktails. Sylvia drinks coffee—Danny drinks nothing but milk.

I always thought it was the red-headed gals who were supposed to have the most sex appeal. But when Greer Garson was to be her most devastating self in "Mrs. Parkington," she decided to don a black wig. Which reminds me that Ingrid Bergman also went femme fatale by donning a black wig for "Saratoga Trunk."

Greer's flaming hair is so gorgeous I never thought she would ever resort to covering it up on the screen. But she has a marvelous sense of humor.

"I really wasn't in favor of the black wig at all—at first," she laughs, "but when I crossed the lot—and one of the boys whistled as I went by—that made up my mind!"

Dropped over on the set of "The Conspirators" during the first days of shooting to visit with Hedy Lamarr and Paul Henreid.

"Louella," Paul said, "Hedy owes me ten dollars and I think she should pay it."

Hedy looked almost as surprised as I did. "How come?" she asked.

"Don't you remember in Vienna, when we were working for Max Reinhardt, I said that I bet we would co-star in a picture in Hollywood one day—and you made it ten dollars that I was wrong?"

Hedy laughed, "You're right"—and forked over the ten spot.

The newsiest V-letters I get come from Richard Ney who is somewhere in the Pacific aboard the USS Jaguar. He writes:

"The Academy hi-jinks were short-waved to us, and it was a kick to tune in on Hollywood for the celebrating. Did you know, Louella, that the lads hereabouts rate Spencer Tracy as tops among the Hollywood hemales and that Robert Montgomery is something of a legend among the MTB men of these waters.

"Jackie Briggs has been a sick boy. He was down for the count (105 temperature) with dengue fever. But he's back on the job again manning and operating the output of an advance radio station. Also my hat is off to Mrs. B. (Ginger Rogers to you.) By honest count Jackie received 15 letters in one day from the little woman. I am also able to report from first hand knowledge that he is still a champ at gin rummy."

Sometimes I feel like turning Veronica Lake over my knee and spanking her. She can be such a grand girl when she wants to—and then she does a right-about-face and is as naughty as the little girl with the curl right down the middle of her forehead.

Veronica was very temperamental during the filming of "Bring On the Girls"—reporting late to work and leaving early almost every day. She should remember that movie-making is a business—a serious business these days—and those temperamental antics just don't go anymore.

One of the really tragic things about the Dick Powell-Joan Blondell parting is that little "Normie" Powell did not know he was not Dick's own son until the story broke.

"Normie" is Joan's son by a previous marriage to George Barnes, the cameraman. But he was so little when his parents separated that he knows just Dick as his father.

It was one of the unhappiest moments of Joan's life when she had to tell the little boy.

I remember something that Fredric March once told me about his adopted children.

Freddy said: "As soon as they are old enough to understand what I am saying, Florence and I intend to tell the children that they are adopted.

"We want to spare them the heartache of learning the truth from other children some day. We want them to understand and to be proud that of all the children we could have had—we chose them because we loved them so much."

Paulette Goddard's overseas wardrobe weighed exactly five pounds and consisted of various and assorted bras and shorts and a few dresses—not one of which hit below her celebrated knees. Because there are no hairdressers where Paulette was heading—she very practically planned to wear her hair in pigtails with colorful flowers for ornaments.

Did you ever have a Christmas party in the Spring?

I did—and I don't remember having more fun. It was a crazy idea planned to make up to Major Ross Shattuck (who has been overseas for two years) for missing out on two Christmases at home.

The fun started when I tried to buy a Christmas tree. Everybody looked at me as though I were absolutely crazy. But I soon got the ball rolling.

The Robert Youngs sent over a potted Cedar tree that was just exactly the right size—and they also sent along a Santa Claus centerpiece for the table. It was so funny putting Spring blossoms in the pot-bellied "Santy" and filling little red boots with sweet peas from the garden.

The evening was so balmy that by the time the guests started arriving, and we turned on the lights on the tree—the doors and windows were open.

Captain Clark Gable brought Kay Williams to the party.

The Herbert Marshalls arrived with a beautifully wrapped Christmas present which turned out to be an assortment of things from the Five and Dime store.

And just to keep in the spirit of the thing, Don Ameche mixed an eggnog. Unseasonable, but oh, so good!

Gene Tierney is radiantly beautiful since the birth of her daughter, Daria. I asked Gene where she ever got that name—it's unusual to say the least. "It was my great-grandmother's name," she explained, "I liked it because it is so unusual, and there's not much chance to make a nickname of it. I hate nicknames."

The baby weighs 14 pounds now, and the doctor says when she weighs 20 she will be big enough and strong enough to travel to Hollywood and be with Gene. She was so tiny and so fragile when she was born that she has never been taken out of the apartment in Washington where she is with her adoring grandmother.

It was her sixth-month wedding anniversary—and Maria Montez was the bluest gal in town. It's true she had received a nice fat letter from husband Jean Pierre Aumont—but that wasn't the same as having him home.

The doorbell rang, and Maria's maid came back quickly to say there was a man calling who had to deliver a certain package just to her alone.

Maria ran to the door. "Before Mr. Aumont went away," the stranger said, "he told me to mark this day well and to deliver this package to you with his love!"

It was an exquisite topaz set—clip, earrings and bracelet, all in true French taste, and engraved inside the bracelet was "My little wife."

keep those honeymoon hands!

Presenting handsome hand hints that your Beauty Dept. has collected from Hollywood. Here's the latest on keeping your fingers lily-white, your nails a-sparkling!

■ When he held your hand 'twas soft and dainty. Then the gold band was slipped on third finger, left hand, to the strains of Lohengrin. You know the rest of the story . . . dishes to wash, beds to make, stoves to clean. Your lily-whites took on a red and angry tone. But cheer up . . . we've unearthed Hollywood hand-hints that will help you revive those honeymoon hands.

Now whoa, there. Don't all you MODERN SCREEN-ers, involved in everything from jam-making to arc-welding, go fractious and say that Hollywood stars do nothing to soil their dainty digits. That's where you're wrong. Hollywoodites come fully equipped with children, houses (and housework!), gardens and dogs. Further, the stunts they have to do in assorted pictures would make arc-welding look like a picnic. Screen stars are between two fires—a job that musses 'em up plenty, while demanding that their hands look as if they never do a thing heavier than hemstitch a handkerchief.

How do they manage? Jane Wyman says it's done with good old soap, hot water and brushes. Says that, while all of us wash our hands a dozen times a day, it still takes a thorough scrubbing, preferably at night, from finger tips up to and including elbows. After this nightly soaping, Janey wipes her hand thoroughly, pushes back the cuticle at the base of each nail.

CREAM CUE. If you're a WIFE, a WAC or a WORKER, your hands get constantly into things that dry them out. After the washing and rinsing that Jane speaks up for, finish off by wringing your paws in hand cream (yes, go ahead—wring those hands hard!). One hand cream we dote upon is a rich, whipped-up job that lathers in well because of its smooth texture.

Evelyn Keyes, Columbia bright hope, may be coyly keeping a secret here . . . but it's no secret that the Keyes fingers are dainty and well-manicured.

PROTECTION PAYS. Use a protective cream when a-toiling at anything really messy. The worst of the dirt will give you the go-by, having no place to cling. Which is okay by you! And just listen to what one of these greaseless creams will do: You put it on before starting work. There's no sticky deposit. It seems to disappear . . . but really doesn't! Not at all, it's right there to keep grime and grease on the surface of the skin so that when clean-up whistle blows, it can be washed away like a flash without de-skinning yourself.

LOTION LURE. No "absentee hands" for you. Do all you can (for patriotism, as well as prettiness) to avoid 'em. Wear gloves when possible. But, gloved or not, use a good hand lotion before work and every time you wash. Keep a bottle handy, and several times a day smooth generously all over hands, wrists and even your arms. There's a particularly wonderful, pearly lotion, about the consistency of rich, creamy milk. It goes on with a silky texture, leaves a pleasant, almondy scent.

MANICURE MUSTS. What with creams, protectives and lotions keeping your hands so super-smooth, it's only fair that you should treat them regularly to a really bang-up manicure. Learn how by a glance at page 68. And here are some extra cues. For your shaping job, an emery board is really much gentler than a steel file—especially if your nails are thin. Incidentally, if your nails are fragile as egg-shells, it proves you're low on vitamins. Begin to enliven your menus with carrots, tomatoes, oranges.

Is there lacework around your cuticle? That means you're the careless type. But you're going to reform, aren't you? You won't use horse-and-buggy methods of cutting your cuticle. It's apt to be dangerous. Instead, you'll try a special liquid cuticle remover that's absolutely safe.

Lucille Ball thinks two coats of nail polish last longer than one, appear clearer in color, smoother in finish. But she says the second coat has no value if (Continued on page 105) finger tips!

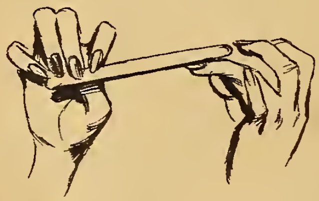
Just follow the directions given on our nail-care chart below. Result: one first-rate manicure for you! For inspiration glance at Annie's lovely digits.

OFF WITH THE POLISH. Saturate a wedge of cotton in polish remover and do the trick. Be ultra-careful to re-cap the bottle of remover after you are finished, or you may find it empty next time. Warning: always use a liquid polish remover. Never, never, scrape and tear the old color off your nails. It's bad for them.



GET YOUR NAILS IN SHAPE. File them into graceful ovals with your emery board. Don't be over-zealous about cutting corners because you don't want dated, clawlike fingertips. Medium length nails help you to be your most efficient self these days, whether you keep company with a typewriter, kitchen sink or riveting machine.

SOAP AND WATER, HERE YOU COME! Fill up a basin with warm sudsy water and soak your paws for a few minutes before scrubbing them with a hand brush. (Of course you'll use a pure soap!) After hands and nails are scrupulously clean, dry them well. While the cuticles are softened, gently push them back with the edge of your towel.

NEXT, A GAY SHELLACKING OF POLISH. Over the initial coat of colorless polish foundation, apply the polish in four long, smooth strokes. For long-term endurance, go over the nails with a second polish coat. Later, give your fingertips a special overcoat to insure against chipping. Your nails will be a-sparkle for days and days.

SMOOTH OVER ROUGH SPOTS. Be sure to massage your hands with quantities of soothing lotion when the nails are dry. If redness and cracked fingertips are your present peeves, smother your neglected mitts in hand cream at bedtime and slip on cotton gloves overnight. Before embarking on a really messy job, apply a protective cream.

DONALD O'CONNOR

show world wagged. It was natural and right. His mother told Don this, and she said she ought to know. Hadn't she been in show business since she was five years old?

Jack and Billy chimed in, too. Billy had terrific comedy talent. He had ideas for a double with just his brother Jack, he said, and maybe this break could give him a chance to develop—maybe it was the answer to everything! Mom could stay in Hollywood with Don. She wasn't as young as she used to be, and a stay in the California sun would do her good, also a rest and a home that wasn't running on wheels. She deserved it. And that movie check—O'Connors could always use money. They were good arguments.

Jack said he and Billy could throw together a new act in jig time. Billy for comedy, Jack for stunts, and Jack's baby daughter, Patty, who even as a tot had a voice like Kate Smith, could still make it a family act. Maybe Millie, Jack's wife, off the stage since an accident, could fill in a spot—anyway she could take care of the troupe. It ought to be a grand act.

"What's the name of this act?" Don wanted to know.

"Why, 'The O'Connor Family,' of course!" said Jack. "What else?"

Young Donnie grinned. "Okay," he said, "if you'll keep it that way, and save a spot for me. Where do we find this studio?" he asked.

mighty atom . . .

They found it over on Marathon Street in Hollywood. Paramount Studios, where Wesley Ruggles was getting ready to shoot "Sing You Sinners" with Bing Crosby and Fred MacMurray. At first, Don's small build almost lost him the chance before he got it. On the testing stage Ruggles saw how small he was. Because, for his age, 12, Don then looked like he might be eight. He was only four feet, eight inches tall. He was to grow four inches in hardly more than a year, grow so amazingly beanstalk fast, in fact, that it was to toss him right out of his contract. But at that time the California sun hadn't got to work on Don. He was still a runt—a mighty atom.

But when they tried him on the songs, "Pocketful of Dreams" and "Small Fry" and saw how nimble he was at catching on to anything, Don's years of trouping paid off. The main doubt all along had been whether he could take the rough work. Because in "Sing You Sinners" Don was slated to play the part of a jockey and take some pretty dangerous spills in a race. He didn't look rugged enough, but when they brought that up, Don said nothing. He just went over to a side of the stage and tumbled across it with trick falls, somersaults and acrobatics like he'd been learning from his big brother all his young life. That convinced everybody quick.

—how to choose your right summer powder shade

MISS CYNTHIA McADOO, blonde, very charming, and very young, says, "Fair skin like mine turns a rich, rosy tan in summer—and ordinary sun-tan powders show up yellow, especially around the nose and mouth. The shade I love is Pond's Dreamflower 'Dusk Rose.' It has a soft glow that blends marvelously with my tan—makes my skin look smoother! If you're a blonde, choose Pond's 'Dusk Rose' for summer."

MRS. LAWRENCE W. EARLE, a beautiful, starry-eyed brunette says, "Summer sun turns my brunette complexion a golden bronze. My favorite summer powder is Pond's deep golden 'Dark Rachel.' It makes my tan look richer and softer—and never gives that whitish, powdered look. I really think that Pond's Dreamflower 'Dark Rachel' is the ideal shade for sun-tanned brunettes!"

There were a lot of reasons. One was that Don was good. He could sing and act and read his lines like they were meant to be read. He had grit, too. He took nine falls at a barrier off a race horse until the cameraman got what he wanted. He won the admiration at once of Arthur Jacobson, the associate producer, and his part kept growing. And he captured the fancy of both Bing Crosby and Fred MacMurray, the stars. They became pals.

Bing and Fred and tiny Don used to sit on the set between scenes and sing while Don played his accordion and showed them just what it was like to play the five-a-day. They used to toss gags at him and watch him bounce back with ad lib answers, like all seasoned vaudevillians can, from Fred Allen on down. They traded jokes and old minstrel nifties—the Joe Miller kind—that Don knew by heart.

Bing and Fred got a terrific kick out of it and decided that Don was an O.K. kid. The clambakes got to be such a daily habit on the set that Wesley Ruggles would shout, "All right, boys—when you finish the vaudeville show—how about starting this picture?"

It ended up with Don O'Connor getting third billing in the picture, a hit, and he stole his share of it from Bing and Fred. Before it was half through, he had a contract. He was in. For years after that Donald O'Connor called himself "Small Fry" for good luck. And up until a few weeks ago—until his new studio, Universal, decided it was bad publicity to continue—he signed all his fan autographs "Small Fry." Now he's signing them "Mister Big."

Those set shenanigans on his first picture banished 12-year-old Don's early misgivings that making pictures wasn't going to be fun. He had the time of his life, and it staved off the homesickness he knew he was going to feel some day for "the road"—his real home. He moved into a Hollywood bungalow court with Effie on DeLongpre Ave. and settled down to being a hard working movie star. That was no idle phrase. Suddenly more parts for the cocky undersized actor appeared on the Paramount schedule than he could handle. He did two and three at a time. He made 11 features in a little over a year.

He liked making "Men with Wings," the story of the Wright brothers, where he played Fred MacMurray as a boy and pal-ed around with him and Ray Milland. There was some excitement when a burning plane lit in a wheat field and set it on fire with Don up to his tiny neck in the stuff. It was fun, too, making his first starring picture, "Sons of the Legion," and co-starring in "Tom Sawyer, Detective." But the factory side of Hollywood studios began to make him restless.

The pictures rolled by—"Boy Trouble," "Night Work," "Million Dollar Legs," "Death of a Champion," "Beau Geste," and over to Warners' on loan for "On Your Toes" with Zorina. There he played the kid of an old vaudeville family—and it made Don homesick for his old irresponsible homelessness.

He'd get long letters from Billy and Jack all this time, out on the road again, and postcards from little Patsy. And each one would hand him a pang. He could see the footlights, hear the band tuning up and feel real live audiences rustling, daring him to make them applaud. Each letter or card came from a place he knew like the palm of his hand. He'd picture the O'Connor brothers backstage and in the hotel rooms that he could frame in his memory, and wonder where they were going after the show. He longed for the hectic taxi rides to the depots, the jouncing lullaby of a Pullman berth and the midnight arrivals at brightly lighted stations, the roar of each city, every one different, each with its different pals to greet. He wanted to know, "How are all the kids in Kokomo?"

Don O'Connor had enough fun around Hollywood. He didn't particularly care for school on the set four hours a day, or even the Hollywood Professional School where he put in a term. He didn't like school—period. But he had some fun swimming and boxing at the Athletic Club and at the roller skating rink at the old Warner studio on Sunset Boulevard. There were a lot of cuties around he could kid with, and Bing Crosby would pedal over on his studio bike to see him on his set every time he made a picture.

But Don O'Connor missed the O'Connor Family. And all the big names and great actors in Hollywood couldn't make up for Billy and Jack and little Patsy. His mother sat on the set with him every day and got paid for it—Don was a minor—but she was bored, too. She missed the spiced existence of vaudeville life. After being on the road you felt like a vegetable in Hollywood. What was most swell about it to Don and Effie then was—that check. And it was good. Up around $900 a week. Although, oddly enough, money had never meant a thing to the O'Connors. They'd never saved any because they put no premium on it. They made good checks for their acts on the big time—$500 and $600 a week for the family. And when it was gone, they were never really worried. The O'Connors could always work. They had a good act, and they were welcome. All it took was a wire or two and maybe some "get-away money." Don O'Connor grew up firmly believing that line, "he who steals my purse, steals trash." He had a contempt for riches. And he still has today. If the law hadn't forced half of his earnings into a trust fund, he'd have come away from Paramount cheerfully broke. Just as today, the money that passes automatically into the same fund is just the same as if Don had never earned it. A while back, he got a studio bonus of $1500. Don cashed the check in 150 ten-dollar bills and carried it around with him. That was real money; he could feel it in his pocket, although much more goes into his accounts every month. Pretty soon, by the way, the $1500 vanished.

So—back when his first Hollywood star flared and then died—Donald O'Connor had little cash money—and no regrets—when the bad news came. It was logical: The wardrobe man said he was too big for his britches—Wesley Ruggles told him the truth when he jerked him out of "Invitation to Happiness." "You're too big. Grown too fast. There aren't any 'awkward age' parts." He knew it wasn't his fault, because he'd never held up a take once in his life, and his fan mail was swelling. He blamed it on the California sun that he should shoot up four inches in a little over a year. But Don wasn't sorry.

He felt let down, of course. Everyone does—even an actor—when he loses a job. For a few days Don was lost and despondent. He was still only a kid—almost 14. There were plenty of other studios in Hollywood, and jobs he could have got—because he'd done all right at Paramount, and the other studios knew it. Independents and smaller outfits would have welcomed Don and found something for him. But even though he was a kid, he was wise. Before Paramount dropped his option, he told his mother, "If they let me go, I'll leave this town and go on the road. Then, when I get past that awkward hump —I'll come back and wow 'em." He meant it. From the minute he walked out of Paramount's gates, Don's mind was made up. He never saw another studio, never made even a phone call for another job. And something else—a coincidence—helped Don carry through his decision to leave Hollywood clean. The same week Paramount dropped him from the payroll, the O'Connor Family—what was left of it—rolled into town—Jack and Billy and Patsy and Millie. When they trouped in the bungalow court, laughing and happy, full of plans and breezy with tales of the vaudeville circuits, Don felt like he'd just burst out of a stuffy room into fresh air and sunshine.

"Sure you're going to join us," they welcomed. "You're coming back where you belong. And listen—with the name you've made in Hollywood—why, we'll be terrific. Look—here's how we'll bill it. 'The O'Connor Family with Donald O'Connor'!"

Don's brief case of the blues vanished. They wired for bookings, and the theaters snapped them up. The O'Connor family, in force rolled out onto the broad highway, laughing and cracking jokes and singing "Happy Days Are Here Again." Don hadn't even thought how he'd fit into the act again. But as they drove along the highway to San Francisco, they planned that, too. He'd do his "Small Fry" scene, the one that had made him famous, with Bing Crosby in his first picture. In San Francisco "Donald O'Connor" went up in bright lights on the marquee. But so did "The O'Connor Family."

They rolled on East, playing as they went—Salt Lake City, Denver, Kansas City, Omaha, Chicago. And movie offers caught up with Don everywhere he stopped. One-picture jobs, spots and bits here and there. Good money, all of them, but to Don they were just buzzards winging after the dead Hollywood stardom he'd outgrown.

From Chicago Don and the O'Connors ran down to Danville to see Uncle Will and Aunt Josie and the O'Connor cousins in their "home town." They had money in their pockets and plenty of booking offers. In fact, the reason they went to Danville was to prepare for a foreign jaunt. A contract was on its way for the O'Connor Family, and Don was to leave at once for Australia on tour. They went "home"—the only home they knew—to rehearse the act they'd take abroad. As usual, whenever the O'Connors hit Danville, they played the local theater. This time, after Don's movie fame, the whole town turned out. It was nearing Christmas and excitement, merriment and good will surrounded them. Happy days had indeed come again.

Then one night after the show. Billy O'Connor said he felt funny. He went home to bed, and the next morning he had a raging fever. The doctor said "scarlet fever." Some neighbor kids had it, but nobody had paid much attention. That was the week before Christmas. Billy died a week later, the day after Christmas. He was just 26.

For the first time in his life Don shared in the O'Connor family grief. The early deaths of his baby brothers and sisters had taken place before he was born. The tragic ends of Arlene and his father were before he knew what it was all about. But when Billy went, something happened to Don.

Everyone had loved Billy O'Connor. He was that kind of a boy. Full of life, merry, a natural born comedian bursting with talent. He had coal black hair and gray eyes, a husky build and all the good nature and confidence in the world. Had he lived, Don swears he'd have been another Bob Hope. Billy was closer to Don than any one else in the O'Connor family. Don copied, admired and worshipped Billy. Billy had taught Don a million stage tricks. He tossed him around the stage as a baby and made him learn his profession and learn it right, for Billy was serious about being funny. He kidded about everything, as Don does today, but he was good, as Don is, too. So when he died, it was like losing half of Don O'Connor's self.

Don never made much fuss about his grief. Even the family never knew exactly how he felt because he wouldn't say anything, even to them. But they found a letter he had written to a pal of his, another vaudeville kid. Don had forgotten to mail it. In that, they read how Billy's death had affected Don.

"I'll always remember Billy as he was—alive and happy," Don wrote. "But I feel like part of me had died, and I guess that's how all of us feel. I wonder if the O'Connor family will ever be the same again."

Don's dark doubts were not idle ones. He was right. From the minute of Brother Billy's death, the O'Connor family never was the same again. Ill-luck fastened on to it like the Old Man of the Sea, and all that was left of what had once been a big, robust family of nine, had shrivelled to three, and Don O'Connor, the baby, was only 15 years old! They had never stared into this tragic reality before—but when Billy died two things happened: The O'Connors realized that the Family Act was just hanging by the ropes. And, what was left of it rested mainly on the slim boy-shoulders of Donald. They weren't sturdy enough to hold off the weight of bad luck that came along.

It's awfully easy and more fun than a barrel of monkeys. But do keep score accurately if you want an idea of your Star Intelligence Quotient. The quiz offers three sets of clues, the first on this page, the second on page 87 and the third on page 97. If you can guess, on the first clue, the name of the actor or actress to whom it refers, score yourself 5 points. If you get it on the second clue, give yourself 4. And if you must turn to the third clue before guessing the name, score yourself 3. For your total score add up all 20 individual scores. 84 is average for the somewhat easier quiz this month. For the answers, turn to page 117, but don't look before you're finished. Peeking spoils the fun.

draped in 8-balls . . .

Billy's death killed the Australia trip. The O'Connors laid off two weeks in Danville and tried to collect their thoughts and their courage and make a decision. A New York offer made it for them. It offered Patsy a part in "Panama Hattie," then a solid musical show hit on Broadway, with Ethel Merman. Patsy was to take Joan Carroll's part, when that kiddie star discovery trotted out to Hollywood and the movie gold mines. There was no mention of any other O'Connor. Nobody said anything, but everybody realized that from now on the O'Connor Family was mostly a name. Everyone would be on his own.

But they all went to New York. Patsy, Don's niece, but much more like his sister, like all the O'Connors, was born with talent in every inch of her body. She had a wonderful voice, was clever and cute and caught on quickly. As a tiny tot she had beat Don to Hollywood by five years, going to Fox studios for "Redheads on Parade," but getting nowhere much afterwards, because a little dimpled goddess named Shirley Temple was right on the same lot.

Patsy had the only job in the O'Connor family for a while. But soon Jack and Don teamed up in a vaudeville double and "turkeyed" again around New York and the East, playing the small towns, with split weeks and one-night stands for lunch-money, compared to Don's Hollywood salary—and that had stopped now by only a few months. If the comedown hurt Don, he never let on. One thing Effie and Jack knew—Hollywood hadn't made Donald O'Connor one bit high-hat or know-it-all. He still came to them and asked for advice on this and that bit of vaudeville business. They were still his teachers—his only teachers—as the O'Connors had always been for Don. And he stayed cheerful, although the breaks went from bad to worse.

First Jack ran into a quinsy throat and went to the hospital for a long stay. That broke up the act. Then Jack's wife, Millie, had to undergo a serious operation. Patsy, the meal ticket, began to grow on Broadway as Don had in Hollywood. She grew right out of her job in "Panama Hattie," and when it went on the road, they included her out. Then Patsy, too, immediately came down with a serious strep throat and landed in Roosevelt Hospital. There was a time when everyone was sick except Don and his mother, and nobody working—not even Don. His vaudeville act was gone. He was still too young by law to work alone in night clubs. The bills piled up. When the various O'Connors crept convalescent out of bed, weak and shaky, they put the family act back together again, but it wasn't what it used to be.

There weren't any vaudeville dates. Vaudeville was in one of its many sinking spells. The O'Connors played anything they could get. They were in hock to friends for hospital bills, and the hotel clerks were getting nasty. Times were tough—plenty. Sometimes they skipped a meal, and at the Plymouth Hotel, where Don and his mother stayed, they looked down the street once in time to see a desperate girl leap from the 20th story window to the pavement below. It made them look at each other.

But in that crucible of tough times Donald O'Connor found himself being forged into a man, even though he was only 16 years old. The turning point in his life, he thinks, on looking back, was when Billy died, and the realization arrived that things were up to him—little Donnie. For the first time in his life he had sober thoughts, he knuckled down, he grew up. He worked. It had all been fun and a lark and easy pickin's before. But now Don carried the act, and he had to measure up to it. Two years of this had made him ready for really important Broadway star jobs. Only there weren't any jobs.

So the O'Connors went back to Illinois, as they always did when trouble was double. Back to the haven of Uncle Will's big house for a brief rest, and then to the country club in Peru, run by the old family friends, who always came up with a job for cakes and coffee when that was what the O'Connors needed most. That was in November, and for the first time in their lives the Christmas holidays were coming on again, and this time there were no bookings for the O'Connors. Christmas had always been big O'Connor family fun up until lately. They'd always doll up their dressing room with colored lights wherever they played and even haul in a tree. But last season it was Billy's death, and as another New Year approached, there seemed to be about as much future for them as there is for a turkey the day before Thanksgiving. Things couldn't go on like that. They had to make some decision.

This time Don knew the decision they made would have to be something daring and different. It couldn't be just another reforming of the ranks and setting out again on the vaudeville circuits. The O'Connor Family was still an act—but that was all. After all these years it was crumbling fast. They had to make a new decision—and again a telegram made it for them.

A friend of the family, their agent in Hollywood, Colton Cronin, had run across a movie job for Donnie that fit like an acrobat's tights. Universal was brewing up "What's Cookin'?" and needed a new Mickey Rooney. Cronin also was up on the fortunes of the O'Connors and knew that when times got tough, they'd do almost any show job to get out of debt. He wired. "Have offer for Donald Universal Studios," and he named the salary. It was good.

That news reached the O'Connors on December 7, 1941. Some other news reached them the same day: The Japs had bombed Pearl Harbor.

Neither item that day hinted of the significant change both would bring in the life of Donald O'Connor.

Don had to wire back the truth: The O'Connors couldn't make the cross-continent jump in the financial state they were in. And as usual, where Don went, the O'Connors still went—even if there was work only for Don. "Wire getaway money," he told the agent, "and we'll come."

It came back—$100.

That was about all the O'Connors had to carry them—five of them—from Peru, Illinois, to Hollywood. And they had just five days to get there. Trains were out of the question. They just didn't have the fare. They greased up the old car and set out.

That's a trip Don O'Connor will remember a long time. The last jump of the O'Connor Family, all of them together—Effie, Jack, Don, Millie and Patsy, all crowded into the car, racing across the country to Hollywood. Winter was breaking over the plains and the mountains they had to cross. Rain mixed with sleet and turned into snow. They huddled together, wet and not too well fed by day and shivered in flimsy auto camps an motels at night. The old auto creaked and rattled and groaned and slithered on the wintry highways—but it kept going. It had to—the five-day deadline was being whittled down.

Coming into Albuquerque, New Mexico, they noticed streams of cars with California licenses passing them, headed East. Some had beds strapped on the top, and furniture and trunks lashed to the sides. All were bulging with people and their worldly goods.

At Albuquerque a negro at a gas station filling their tank chattered through the icy wind. "You-all goin' to California? Bettah not. No-suh. Ev'body in California's comin' through here—headin' East. De wah! Japs gonna bomb California." He shook his head solemnly. "You-all goin' to a b-a-d place!"

It's just a natural instinct, getting together and swapping stories about the people and things that interest you most. That's why they have societies for ichthyologists and philatelists and ornithologists. Since a Society for Swapping Stories about Stars is not quite feasible, we're doing the next best thing. We're opening our columns to you, asking you to write us your true personal experiences with Hollywood actors and actresses. And for each incident we use, we'll send you $5. Keep your stories short and use the incidents sprinkled throughout the book as examples. If you want your letter returned, be sure to enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Several years ago I had a bit part in an Orson Welles play. Mr. Welles thought a white spotlight, focused on us, would be very flattering. I bravely spoke up and suggested that blue and amber would be much kinder. Mr. Welles promptly replied by having all my three lines in the play cut down to one.

Anne Carlsen,
New York, N. Y.

The O'Connors had to laugh at that, in spite of their weariness and low spirits. "All we need now," said Don, "is a good bombing!" Their old happy-go-lucky mood flared up, and the O'Connor family rolled over the pass into California, back on the beam. Back in Hollywood and broke, but what did that matter? They arrived on Christmas Eve, and they had a Merry Christmas in the old bungalow court where they'd always lived in Hollywood, all five of them. The sun was shining that day and the next day, too, the day Don was due to show up at the studio. Don had a hunch he'd be starting the New Year right. He wasn't wrong.

Universal had assembled a bunch of juvenile talent for "What's Cookin'?" A sort of "Best Foot Forward" idea. The story wasn't much, but the talent was. And it was just this talent which Donald O'Connor had in bunches, that made him a hit in the picture, made him stand out and let him carry through his second Hollywood break to star again for the second time. All he had was a one-picture job. That one picture had to win him a contract, or they'd be back on the boards now too weak to hold the O'Connor clan.

Oddly enough, what did it was a scene that he blew higher than a kite! It was with Gloria Jean, a long bit of dialogue, written stuff, that has always been hard for Don to memorize—somebody else's stuff. He wasn't particularly nervous before a camera, but he forgot the lines. So he blew it, but kept right on ad libbing as he had always done on the stage, getting funnier and funnier and piling laughs on top of one another. The camera kept running, and the director, Charlie Lamont, knew a good scene when he saw it. He kept it in the picture, and that scene was the one that made a hit for Don O'Connor at the preview.

But that lucky bit of accidental business meant far more than a hit in "What's Cookin'?" It meant more than preview cards calling Don O'Connor "another Mickey Rooney." More than a term contract that came when the Universal big shots saw what they had in Don O'Connor. It was the premium payment that insured Donald O'Connor's later solid hits which today have made him the hottest young star in Hollywood, the fan mail king of Universal and the phenomenal young wizard who has been a star twice, to astound Hollywood.

Because from then on in every picture he made—"Private Buckaroo," "Give Out Sisters," "Get Hep to Love," "It Comes Up Love," "Johnny Comes Marching Home"—and even in "Mister Big," Don O'Connor ad libbed more and more, and Charlie Lamont, his prize director, gave him more and more rein, letting Don fool around and rewrite his own lines, slip in his own gags and bits of business that were second nature to a show-kid. In fact, in "Johnny Comes Marching Home," Don got going with that seasoned vaudeville talent of his and hopped up not only his own part but the part of about every other young actor in the picture. And that had a lot to do with the hit it made.

Nobody is a bit surprised any more on a Donald O'Connor set to see a scene about to roll, and then hear Don yell to his director, "Charlie—I've got something! Keep the cameras rolling." What it is Don has no one ever knows—not even his director. Sometimes they can't even see it, but people have learned by now not to be too baffled—when Don says he has something—he's usually not kidding.

The biggest laugh, for instance, in "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" came from a Don O'Connor quick idea that stayed hidden right up to the preview. "I got one for you!" Don had cried, and Charlie Lamont had said, "Okay, we'll keep them running." Don climbed in the taxi set in full dress and top hat surrounded by three beauties, Gloria Jean, Jane Frazee and Peggy Ryan—all in fur coats. There wasn't much to the scene, and when it was over, Lamont asked:

"What was it, Don? I didn't see anything."

"Wait till you see the picture," said Don.

Lamont saw the scene in the rushes. Nothing gave. He was still puzzled. But he'd had too much experience with Don's hunches not to leave it in. And at the preview when the scene came on, there was a titter from the crowd, a growing snicker, some out-and-out laughs and finally a roar. Lamont was still fairly mystified. All there was, was Don slumped down in a frame of fur coats with his top hat tilted square on his head, and looking stupid. But all you could see was that face buried in fur coats, and there was something about it—something very funny

There have been a lot of things responsible for Donald O'Connor's big hit in Hollywood this time—sympathetic directors like Lamont, a fatherly producer like Ken Goldsmith, who died of a heart attack right before "Top Man" and made Don feel as though he had suffered another death in the family. There have been talented girls like Gloria Jean and Peggy Ryan to balance his comedy and plenty of good tunes, dances and production money, too. Every picture Don has made since "Mister Big" has been brought back for scores of added scenes and an almost doubled budget.

But what is really behind his success is the wonderful feel that Don has for audiences. He plays into the camera like he was on a stage. What he's really got is a show business "savvy" that was born with him, grew up and will stay with him all his life.

In other words, what Donald O'Connor has is a feeling for the stage boards that is innate in the O'Connor family.

That's why, even though the act is scattered now, it's still as real to Don as if it were to open next week at the Orpheum. Actually, the last time the O'Connor family —what was left of it—trod the boards was at the Golden Gate Theater in San Francisco. That was right after "What's Cookin'?" was finished, and that was where the agent's wire came, "Universal wants a contract. You're in!"

But all the O'Connors are still all within a nickel phone call of Don. Effie, his mother, lives with him. Jack has just signed a contract at Warner Brothers, and Millie is busy taking care of both her husband and Patsy, a starlet at Universal who can sing, dance and act like a trouper. So while they're not before the footlights, the O'Connor family is still in there—plugging.

Now there's a new member of the O'Connor Family. At first, Don had a heavy case on Gloria Jean, gave her a gold bracelet with "I Love You" engraved inside and everything. But about a year ago that wound up in the "just good friends" state, when Don met a petite 16-year-old named Gwen Carter. Now, a year later, she's his wife.

As Don O'Connor found himself nearing the draft age, he started thinking about what he could do in the Big Scrap. He'd already entertained at camps and hospitals and over the air on benefits and bond drives, and his hobby of tearing down and rebuilding old jaloppies gave Don an idea. Something mechanical was his best bet for defense.

So he started skipping his Saturday night dates with Gwen and traveled 200 miles from Hollywood every Sunday for flying lessons, and every spare hour away from Universal he went to Cal-Aero Tech in nearby Burbank. By now Don knows his airplanes, and Uncle Sam's training him to be a pilot.

Playing the Hitler-Hirohito circuit, Don will be leaving Gwen and the family and Hollywood, too, for the duration. Besides shelving a flock of Universal epics, domestic bliss with Gwen and Mom O'Connor's hot biscuits, Donald will be putting off his dreams of a dozen things he wants to do such as write, direct and produce his own pictures.

What's more, it means that Donald O'Connor, when he returns on that wonderful Day of Victory, will have to make himself another comeback in Hollywood.

It's a large enough order building two starring careers from scratch like Don O'Connor has already done. A three-star movie triumph is not only unheard of so far, it's out of this Hollywood world.

But if any family can produce such a miracle man, I'll bet on the O'Connors. They've got what it takes from away back.

DEAREST MOM

skipped a beat, because—in common with most healthy males—Jack's everyday sentiments on the subject of doctors didn't bear repeating.

The doctor had come and listened with his stethoscope and put it slowly away, while they both waited. "Can you take it, Jack?" he asked.

"Anything you have to tell me."

"Well, you've got a bum ticker. It's wearing itself out."

"Meaning what?"

"Meaning if you sit on your porch and take life easy, you can live your years out."

Nell had wired Des Moines, asking Ronnie if he could get home for a few days. Having the boys around always chirped their dad up. Ronnie laid down the law to him—or tried to. Jack grinned. "Lookahere, young fella, you can't kill an Irishman with an axe. Anyway, I'd rather rush out than rust out."

He'd been pretty good though—for Jack. And out here in California he was like a new man. All his life he'd had to keep his nose close to the grindstone. Now it was as though he were lifting it for the first time. "I never knew there were birds before," he told Nell. "I never knew there was anything so pretty as a flower."

He kind of hankered after a garden. But Nell and Ronnie were of two minds—afraid if he had one, he might try to do too much. Ronnie was living with them now—he'd taken an apartment large enough for all three. He'd begun going out with Jane Wyman—the pretty little girl in "Brother Rat"—but he still took the folks to LaRue's every Sunday night for spaghetti and meatballs.

just like the girl . . .

Nell couldn't help wondering whether Jane and Ronnie were in love. She knew Ronnie's theory about the girl he was going to marry—he'd mentioned it often enough. "Some day she'll come zipping around the corner, and the minute I see her, I'll know she's the one."

He'd never said Jane was the one. "A good scout," he'd called her affectionately. "Loads of fun to be with." Not love talk exactly. It was none of her business, of course, but show her the mother who wouldn't speculate—especially as they seemed to be seeing more and more of each other. All she wanted for Ronnie was a girl who'd love him the way she loved Jack.

She didn't know then what we know—the story Jane's told—how she fell in love first—(Ronnie always contradicts her: "It's just that you found out first")—how she thought he'd never wake up—how the final blow came when she was laid low in the hospital, and his flowers would arrive with some such ardent message as, "Hope you're feeling better. Ronald." Ronald! That was when she swept flowers and card from the bed, turned her face to the wall and gave up.

That was the night Nell heard Ronnie pacing. Up and down, back and forth. She tried to shut it out, she didn't want to butt in, but every time she unplugged her ears, there it was again. At last she slipped into her robe and knocked at his door.

"Come in, Nelly. I've been wanting to talk to you."

He told her that he'd gone to the hospital after work to see Jane. Her sister had come to the door. "Jane doesn't want to see you."

"But that's crazy. Why not?"

Then, the funniest look had come over her face. "If you don't know, Ronnie, it's most certainly not up to me to tell you."

As she closed the door, a door in his mind seemed to open. Could she mean—? Well, what else could she mean?

"I didn't know I loved Jane, Mother. But I just can't see myself going on without her. Do you think that's love?"

"I don't know what else it would be, son."

You'd have thought she'd handed him a million dollars, the way his face lit up. His eyes whirled to the clock. "I suppose it's too late to go down there now!"

"Three o'clock? I doubt if they'd let you in. But I wouldn't waste any time tomorrow."

He had to work next day, too, but he went to the hospital straight from the studio and didn't get home till they'd finished dinner. All you had to do was look at him, agrin from ear to ear. But they pretended not to notice a thing, they let him say it—"Jane and I are going to be married"—before Mom fell on his neck, and Dad pumped his arm off.

When Jane was well again, he brought her over. Nell felt a little shy at first—you know how it is when your son brings his bride home, and you're not really very well acquainted with her. But Jane fixed that. Nell had gone to the bedroom to powder her nose or something and was sitting at the dressing table when Jane walked in. Jane—the wisecracking baby who hates soft-talk—flung herself down beside Ronnie's mother. "Oh, Nelly, Nelly, I love him so. I think I've been waiting for him all my life."

Stroking the soft hair, Nell smiled out into space as if she were thanking someone. "That's all I wanted to know."

As for Jane and Jack, they clicked from the first; they talked the same language. It was Jack who said as he kissed Jane after the wedding: "Don't take Dutch away from us." Coming from Jack, who didn't like to show you his heart, that moved Jane deeply.

"Everything's going to be just the same." And it was.

The wedding was in January. In March Nell and Jack moved into the little house the children bought for them. With Jane and Ronnie, it was never my money or yours, it was always ours. They'd sent Dad scouting around to look for a place. Nell had made only two stipulations. "I want it just big enough for the two of us. And I want a view. There's no sense living in California without a view."

One day he'd come home and said: "I've found it, Nell. Just big enough for the two of us, and on a clear day you can see the ocean."

family rib . . .

They all take comfort in remembering that that last year of his life was absolutely perfect. Maybe he did too much—but that was part of what made it perfect. "If you're going to make me twiddle my thumbs," he'd said, "I'd as lief be dead. While I've got my breath, let me know I'm alive." So they'd let him do as he pleased—within reason.

The garden was his joy. He'd be out in it every morning, and not a shrub or a flower or a little vine pushed up that he didn't reach down and pat. He planted and pruned and fertilized. He built a bird-bath. It got so that, if Nell wanted anything, she found it the better part of wisdom to keep her mouth shut. Like the time she said, "Be nice to have a trellis over there."

"Cost too damn much," Jack growled. Things had cost too damn much for so long, it was hard to get used to spending money.

One day she came home from church to find the trellis built. Of course he shouldn't have done it himself, but she couldn't help being delighted with it. "Dug it right out of your pants pocket for me, didn't you, Dad?"

He grinned a little sheepishly. That was a family rib of long standing. "Think I'm made of money?" he used to growl at the kids when they'd ask for a handout, even while his hand searched in his pocket for the quarter.

the last sweet sleep . . .

There was that marvelous trip to South Bend with Ronnie and the Knute Rockne company. She could see him now, dropping into his big chair by the radio the day he got back. It was the only time he ever alluded of his own accord to what the doctors had told him. "I've had everything now. I've seen Dutch get to be a star. Oh, I know the studio hasn't made him one yet, but the folks back there did. I wish you could have heard the welcome they gave him, Nell. Far as I'm concerned, nothing'll ever top it. I'm ready to go any time now—"

He was like a kid about the property Jane and Ronnie bought up on the hill. Even before it was cleared, he'd drive up every day and try to visualize how it was going to look. The children brought their blueprints to show him, and no man was ever prouder than when Jane said: "You've done such wonders with your own garden, Jack, so Ronnie and I want you to plan our landscaping for us."

Last and best of all, he had Maureen for four months. It was funny about Jack. Before their own children were born, he'd say to Nell: "If it's not a boy, out you go." Yet he wanted his grandchild to be a girl. Ronnie wanted a girl, too, because he'd always hankered after a sister. But he wouldn't tell Jane, because Jane wanted a boy. For Ronnie's sake. She had it fixed in her mind that every man wanted a boy, and that Ronnie was going to be disappointed with a girl. So they got themselves good and mixed up.

When Ronnie came in after the baby was born, first thing Jane did was set up a wail. "Oh, Ronnie, it's a girl, and we wanted a boy, and we haven't even got a name for a girl—"

And Ronnie, racking his brain for comfort, came up with this: "Now, Janey, just think—when she gets to be a young lady and walks up the aisle and I give her away—just think—well, think how lovely she'll look in your wedding gown."

That almost finished Jane, weak as she was. But after a while they got to explaining how they really felt about girls, which was such a load off Jane's mind that she dropped asleep and left Ronnie talking.

Jack had been too busy earning a living to fool around with his own babies. Now he seemed bent on getting out of Maureen all the fun he'd missed. Almost as if he knew it wouldn't be for long.

Every day he'd stop in. "Where's that grandkid of mine?" And he'd sit by the hour with the baby in his arms. He must have had a pull with the nurse—got around her somehow with that blarneying Irish tongue of his.

"Held the baby today," he'd tell Nell.

"Not in that old leather jacket, I hope."

"The same. And without any damn gauze over my face, either."

He died in April. Jane and Ronnie had been called East on business. On their way to the train they'd stopped to say good-by, and Ronnie did something he'd never done before. Nell and Jack had come out to the doorstep to wave them off. Ronnie was about to follow Jane into the car, when suddenly he turned and came back to kiss Mom and shake Dad's hand again. But his last word out of the car window was for Dad. "Remind me to tell you

"when I get back. Don't let me forget—"

Dad never heard the story. He died one night after a day in the garden. Nell had looked out once and seen him standing there, eyes fixed on the horizon. "Tired, Dad?"

He'd turned and smiled. "No. Just enjoying myself."

Neil and Bessie, his wife, were with Nell when the end came. Jane and Ronnie got back just as fast as they could.

The boys hadn't wanted her to stay in the house alone, but she wouldn't have left it for anything in the world. Janey, being a woman, understood. "Here's one time," said Jane, "when nobody's feelings matter except Nell's. If it makes her feel better to stay, that's all there is to it."

She's had people with her from time to time, but to tell the truth, she's just as pleased to see them go. "When I'm alone," she explains to the children, "Dad's right here in his big chair listening to the radio—I can even see the top of his head passing the window." Sometimes she laughs at the look on their faces. "Don't worry. I'll never reach the point where I'm talking to myself. Only please don't take my closeness to Dad away from me."

Jane did the loveliest thing that Christmas. "Jane," says Nell, "never does things by littles, always by bigs." She's got to explain first that, in all the years she lived with Jack, she never chose any of the furniture. He hated feminine doodads around the house. They made him so miserable that Nell found she could stand the kind of furniture he liked better than she could stand his misery. Dark, heavy, substantial stuff with no nonsense about it. Stuff to use, not to touch with kid gloves.

Only once she'd revolted—when he brought home a monstrous bookcase that would have crowded everything else out of her living room. Thought she'd be so pleased with his surprise—got it cheap from a neighbor. She'd wept that time, and Jack had just stood there agape, like a child that's been slapped, heaven knew what for. He got rid of the bookcase, though.

Jane offered to help Nell shop for the new house. Jane has exquisite taste—you have only to look at her own home to realize that. "But it wouldn't be any use, Janey," said Nell. "Jack wouldn't like what we like, and I want him to have this place his way."

Well, the day before Christmas Neil and Bessie got her out on some pretext and kept her out—and when she opened her door late that afternoon, the first thing to catch her eye was the loveliest flowered chair and stool. For a second she thought she was in the wrong place—till Jane's head and Ronnie's popped up from behind a new sofa.

They'd done the whole place over in the cheerful colors she loved. Janey's idea it had been and Janey's work, and—bless her understanding heart—she'd left untouched the one thing Nell would have hated to see touched—Dad's big chair by the radio.

good sport . . .

That was the month of Pearl Harbor. Ronnie was in the cavalry reserve, so they knew he'd be called pretty soon. But knowing it and acually having it happen were somehow two different things. So Nell disgraced herself that day she went out to Warners' to watch him do a scene for "Desperate Journey."

"Look at your son," he said. That's what Ronnie always said when something special happened. "Look at your son—he's going into the Army."

Nell's no weeper, and if she had been, her boys would have cured her. The first time he left home for college, Ronnie wrote: "When I picked Sam and Ed up, their mothers were hollerin' an' bellerin'—and, gosh, I was proud of you, Nell. You sent me off with a smile."

That was her cue. No matter how often she'd felt like crying, she'd pin the smile on her face—anyway, till they'd gone.

But this time—"Oh, no!" said Nell, and down went her face against his arm.

In the dressing room later, he said: "I'm a dope, Nelly. But I thought if I told you in front of all those people, you'd show 'em how brave you are."

"It was just the first shock." She tried to smile. "Want to go out and tell me all over again?"

She knew Ronnie'd make a good soldier, because he hated cruelty which was what the enemy stood for. Even at an age when boys are often thoughtlessly tormenting, Ronnie could never bear to hurt anything. For instance, Neil once learned a trick he thought pretty smart. If you whacked a guy across the muscle of his upper arm, he'd yell blue murder. Nell walked in one day just as he'd tried it on his kid brother. Ronnie stood there, fists clenched, eyes blazing. "Gee whiz, I could kill you!"

"Stay right where you are, Neil," their mother ordered. "Now, Ronnie, you hit him just as hard as he hit you."

As Ronnie advanced, she could see the anger draining out of him. For form's sake, he delivered a tap that wouldn't have bothered a chick, muttered, "Nuts," and went back to his book.

like father like . . .

Maureen's past three now and knows there's sadness in the world and doesn't like it. Nell generally goes up for an hour each morning and often takes care of her on Nanny's day out, when Jane's working. One day she asked Maureen if she might have some of her toys for the little sick children she visits in hospitals.

"Sick in bed?" Nell nodded. Maureen disappeared into her room, returned loaded, dumped the toys into Nell's lap and her head after them and burst into tears.

"Why, darling, what's the matter?"

"Those little sick children. Make them end happy."

No matter how blissfully a story ends, Maureen insists on her own patented windup. To every tale Nell reads her, she's got to add: "And they're all happy." It's generally a duet. "AND—" says Nell—"they're all happy," Maureen chimes in. There's one specially moving saga about some goats who ate the green pasture and were threatened with dispossession, but who were saved in the end. "AND—" prompted Nell—

But this time Maureen was really transported. —"praise the Lord and pass the ammunition," she shouted.

Not long ago Ronnie, on leave, appeared in his mother's doorway. "Gaze upon your son—"

"What's there to gaze upon? You always look nice to me. Is that a new uniform?"

"No, but there's something new on it—" He pointed to an added bar.

"Oh Ronnie, how wonderful! But—forgive me please, I'm such a dummy—does that make you a general?"

"Would you settle for a captain?"

Maureen would settle for a mister. Most girls get a bang out of seeing their guys in uniform. To her, it's a novelty to see her daddy in the civvies he sometimes wears at home when he's off duty.

"You're not Captain Reagan, you're just plain Mister Reagan now," she crows. "I like you to be just plain Mister, Daddy."

Nell thinks her granddaughter has something there. Isn't it what we women are all waiting for—for our captains and privates and generals to win the war and

FARE FOR FRANKIE

Little Nancy always tells Mother that she wants "A great big breakfast, just like Daddy's!" However she couldn't begin to put away a hefty meal like the one to which the slender singer does full justice every morning—consisting of fruit, a large

■ LET'S VISIT THE SINATRAS! We'll get there in no time, for the trip from New York to Hasbrouck Heights, New Jersey, where they live, isn't a long one.

The purpose of our trip out to the Sinatra home? No, not to see Frankie, as you would naturally surmise—because we could do that more easily by catching his new picture, "Manhattan Serenade," at a local movie. Or we could probably see him in person at CBS Studio No. 3 over on Broadway, after one of his Vimms or Hit Parade broadcasts. But what we wanted to do was to have a heart-to-heart talk with Nancy Sinatra, to find out from her all about her husband's favorite foods—which, from advance reports, were well worth looking into and trying out.

We knew that there are literally thousands of you who'd like to know how to prepare the same dishes your favorite singing star enjoys at his own dinner table. First, for the fun of it, of course! But afterwards, as we suspected and were to discover, because these dishes are so practical, economical and all-around delicious that—once you have tried them, as we have—you'll be sure to serve them often.

Then, too, what better way could there be to begin this new series of ours on regional specialties of your favorite stars, than to let the Sinatras start us off on our merry, culinary way.

Because this young couple, in their eating habits, represent a large and interesting cross section of the population in and around New York City—the people of Italian descent who, as recent events have proved, are among the most loyal of our citizens! In numbers well over one million they live in that area which embraces not only New York's five boroughs but spreads out into Westchester and even spills over into Jersey—where Frank and Nancy grew up, met and married. And where, when success gave them her most expansive smile, the Sinatras decided to buy "the home of their dreams."

This, it turns out, is a comfortable red brick house with attached garage, situated on a quiet street where other families live, with whose children Nancy—and eventually Frank, Jr.—can play. It's a real home, this, to which Frank eagerly returned from his Hollywood picture assignment. Not a big place, nor one bit pretentious, with only four bedrooms, which—with the arrival of the new baby—isn't a bit too many. However, there's a brand new room on the second floor, built over the garage, which is all windows and is still in the process of being furnished—a project to which "the head of the family" now intends to give his immediate attention, according to Nancy Sinatra.

In the basement there's another room in which Frank takes great pride—a large, beautifully lighted playroom. It's a sort of miniature night club, with little tables and chairs, a pin-ball machine, dart game and record player. While next door to it, on the strictly utilitarian side, is a completely equipped laundry.

On the main floor you'd find a colorful and comfortable living room, Frank's den, a dining room slightly on the formal side and, back of that, a large, strictly modern kitchen. This has fluorescent lighting, crisp curtains with touches of red, a flat top range in gleaming white and plenty of strategically placed work centers. Separated from the kitchen by cabinets holding glass and china is a cheery little dinette (that's where you see the Sinatras eating breakfast, at the left). It has gay, papered walls, and radio and telephone connections for greater convenience. A "dream" kitchen, indeed, for their "dream home" and a room in which Nancy Sinatra loves to cook, "even as you and I."

Appropriately, it was to this room that we gravitated soo after the sound of door chimes brought Nancy, Sr., and Jr., to greet us. They're a natural, friendly pair, these two! Small wonder, therefore, that you fans have also taken them to your collective heart—along with the smiling singer whose phenomenal success means so much to them! The younger Nancy is an old-fashioned child "going on four," with a sunny disposition and a growing realization that her Daddy is a pretty popular person. While her Mother is a fine and enthusiastic homemaker who still keeps no maid and who really enjoys doing all the cooking for the family. They, in turn, love the meals she prepares.

And what are the delectable dishes that Nancy Sinatra serves most frequently—by popular request—to radio's newest singing sensation? Well, we'll name 'em, and soon you can make 'em! For we took down the directions carefully, just as Frank's wife gave them to us. And these are the very recipes we are offering you this month.

Of course we tried them first, just to make sure that you will understand how to go about preparing these same foods in your own homes.

So, you see, if you send in the coupon promptly, you'll receive tested recipes for the following:

Artichokes Milanaise—a simply super way to prepare this fine-flavored vegetable which too many Americans ignore. Egg Plant Parmesan—another vegetable dish that will richly repay your careful consideration. Meat Balls, which incorporate a little cheese for a welcome change. And a Sponge Cake Dessert which is both dainty and delicious, with its custard filling and unusual flavoring. (Like so many men Frankie's other dessert preferences include Chocolate Cake, Gingerbread—with whipped cream, when available—and Apple Pie with cheese. But we decided to ask for the first named sweet because it doesn't cost a single point.)

The leaflet also contains a simple salad suggestion, of course, since—like most folks with Italian forebears—the Sinatras wouldn't consider a meal complete without plenty of fresh greens. And NATURALLY there's a recipe for Spaghetti—Frank's favorite food.

Fine fare, this—easy to prepare and budget-wise, too. So, how's about using the coupon for your copy of the leaflet!

SOUR PUSS

Dantine on another phase of his Hollywood education. Again Helmut had stumbled into one of those odd American puzzlers he's been running smack up against ever since he skipped a Nazi concentration camp and ended up in—of all places—Hollywood and being—of all things—a motion picture star.

Some day soon Helmut will know all the Hollywood answers, and then this tall, dark, handsome and very courtly young man will be next door to happiness. Privately he's been struggling against the great American sense of humor and the strange customs of Hollywood off and on between pictures ever since he got his first movie break, dubbing Hitler's voice in one of those Nazi thrillers. And on the screen; ever since Helmut threatened Greer Garson with a gun in "Mrs. Miniver," he's been battling for the chance to kiss the girl instead of half kill her, and incidentally, to survive himself through the last reel. When you start out as a heavy in Hollywood and do the job as well as Helmut Dantine has, it's pretty tough to change your spots. After slapping Nancy Coleman around in "Edge of Darkness," scaring Julie Bishop out of her wits in "Northern Pursuit," and generally plotting wickedly against every leading lady he bumps up against, it looked for awhile like they'd never let Helmut Dantine turn on the charm. Happily, however, I can report progress in that department; Warner Brothers have seen the light at last, and Dantine will do his stuff romantically in his very next picture, "Autumn Crocus," and from now on. He hopes also to shake that "foreign actor" tag that bothers him and be the 100 per cent American guy that he legally is, soon as his citizenship papers come through.

But on the private side, Helmut Dantine is still having his troubles with the strange gags and goings-on of the U. S. A.

For instance, a while back Helmut found himself invited to a cocktail party that Annie Sheridan threw. It was one of those informal binges, where everybody arrives straight off the set and steamed up for fun. Well, sometime along in the afternoon, a bunch of Helmut's colleagues decided to hand him the old familiar American rib. So a gang of guys started making disparaging remarks just inside Helmut's earshot. One of them was John Loder, who's an Englishman with an American sense of humor sharpened up to Hollywood style.

"I wonder," mused John, "why Ann has that chap Dantine here? Frightful heel, you know. Nasty Nazi, too. Always going around trying to murder people or throw them into jail."

"Yeah," chimed in someone else. "A strictly wrong guy. Let's throw him out!" And so on and on it went, and all the while Helmut listened, stiffening and getting hot under the collar but controlling himself like the gentleman he is. Not long after that he made his excuses and left the party. He still hadn't met John Loder.

But the next day on the studio lot he passed Loder and then he walked right up to him. "Mister Loder," said Helmut, "my name is Dantine. You insulted me yesterday. I demand an explanation!" And Helmut did almost everything except present his card, strike the dismayed John across the cheek with his glove and challenge him to a duel with rapiers! Of course, Loder tried to explain with much befuddlement because he thought Helmut knew the rib was on and was twice as shocked that Helmut had taken it all seriously. Finally he did succeed in explaining, and then Dantine was more embarrassed than John had been. They're swell friends today, by the way. But it just goes to show what Helmut is always running up against.

Helmut is no Chester the Chump or a feather-head, understand. Nor is he a humorless stuffed shirt, even if it is taking him some time to get on the banter beam in the Land of the Free. Suppose you had been chased out of your homeland, where you were studying to be a future ambassador, by a bunch of Nazi thugs, and found yourself all alone at 20 (he's 25 now) in a country whose language you didn't even speak, let alone understand its slap-happy customs. If you got hep in a hurry, you wouldn't be normal, and nobody would like you. Looking back on his early faux pas, the Americanization of Helmut Dantine seems darned advanced by now. And if I've given the impression that Helmut Dantine has a sense of humor built for a dope, maybe I'd better say that no one likes to laugh at his bulls and boners more than Helmut himself when he sees them for what they are.

He's told me some honeys—all on himself—so I'll just peel off a few, if you don't mind. Like the time Helmut had been studying his English grammar too closely before he made "International Squadron," a good time back. He had a line, "Give them the works!" and he took it home to brood over and translate, and so when the director yelled "Action!" what did Helmut do but yelp, "Let them have the factories!"

english translation . . .

Or the time as late as last year when he got caught on Hollywood Boulevard in his car when it turned New Year's, and all the cars started switching off their ignition and backfiring, and Helmut thought it was a gang war and drove up breathless to a cop. Or the time after a big meal when he ordered sweet potatoes in the Derby, thinking it was a fancy kind of American dessert, and then had to cram down all that pulp because he was afraid the waiter would laugh at him!

You can get Helmut going on embarrassing mistakes of a foreigner and laugh yourself silly, if you want to get that way. But it's not as a chuckle Charlie that I'd like to present Helmut, either. What smacks you right in the face about Helmut Dantine first time you meet him is his solid sincerity and the fact that he's a gentleman through and through, every handsome inch of him. You like him because his hazel eyes are frank, and he talks right up in a deep, rich voice that has nothing phony about it. He makes faces on the screen, but he doesn't off. There's nothing of the wise guy about him, and if he seems naive and a little old-fashioned in his politeness, it's something you like.

I remember one day when I first saw Helmut away from his normal Nazi set characters. We were tossing off some lunch at the Hollywood Brown Derby, where anything is likely to happen. Pretty soon it did. A girl came over with the inevitable menu to autograph and a gush of words. "I'm a landsmann of yours, Mr. Dantine," she said, among other things. (That meant she was his countryman.) Helmut had her sit down, and they talked and talked, although his lunch was getting cold and the girl's conversation wasn't that entrancing. Finally Helmut inquired what part of Austria she came from.

"Philadelphia," said the gal.

I didn't get it, but I suppose somewhere back in her family tree Uncle Oscar had been a Vienna sausage or something. But if Helmut was baffled, he never let on. He still acted like Prince Charming, and the girl went away happy and flushed with pride. That's being a gentleman.

And here's another thing that Helmut did that you don't hear about often around Hollywood. He happened to see Gene Kelly and Judy Garland in "For Me and My Gal," and he thought it was super swell. To Helmut, the groping foreigner trying to get himself Americanized, it seemed like a perfect American picture, full of the bounce and breeze that makes America like that. Well, Helmut was so entertained and grateful that he sat right down and wrote Gene and Judy fan letters! He poured out his sincere admiration just because he wanted them to know how much pleasure they had given him. And, by the way, he's still a fan of Gene Kelley's and by now a friend, too. Helmut persisted until he got a chance to tell Judy Garland to her face how much he liked her work. He met her six months later, and they've been out together some times since then. It started from a gentlemanly gesture of Helmut's that was completely sincere!

Those are the things that characterize Helmut Dantine when you get down to cases. He's a nice guy. You can't boob that. He's the kind of warm-hearted gent who likes to please people and is happy when he sees them glow. At Gary Cooper's not long ago he attended a party and ran into Claudette Colbert. Now it happens that of all the stars in Hollywood, Claudette is the only one that Helmut ever knew before. There have been times—a good many—when he could have sought the influence of someone as great as Claudette in Hollywood to give him a boost. At least he might have tried—anyone but Helmut Dantine, that is. But Helmut never considered looking her up to remind her of an incident that happened a few years ago in the Austrian Tyrol.

Helmut was up in his native Austrian mountains one winter for the skiing. Colbert was there on a European tour, and one evening at the inn there was a dance. The Austrian youths, of course, were dying to dance with Claudette, but they didn't have the nerve. So they got together and drew straws, and Helmut won. He danced a waltz with Claudette. That's the last he ever saw of her.

And so up at Gary's that night he waited until the small orchestra played a waltz. Then he asked Claudette to dance. Only when they were waltzing did he remind her of the Tyrolean meeting. She was thrilled of course, to relive memories of her European vacation, while whirling to a Viennese waltz with a handsome young Austrian here in Hollywood. It gave her a thrill, and that was what pleased Helmut. He always manages to do things graciously and right and always with the object of making somebody else happy.

I'll have to tell, here, though, about one time at least when that very talent of his backfired on Helmut. That was at a cocktail party at Humphrey Bogart's, one of Helmut's good friends. Mary Pickford was there, and to Helmut (like to most of us) Mary loomed as a sort of a Hollywood goddess who signified everything traditional about Hollywood. When he was introduced to her, he was sincerely awed and acted just like the fans who sometimes go overboard about him these days. "Oh, Miss Pickford," gushed Helmut. "I can't tell you how thrilled I am to meet you. Why, when I was only a tiny tot, my mother used to take me to see your pictures!"

They say Mary Pickford turned a shade or two of crimson in front of all those people to be reminded by a handsome grown man of all the years that have flown since her golden curls made her famous. And when Helmut saw that she was embarrassed, he was desolate. But at least he was sincere, which is something in Hollywood.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

One of Nelson Eddy's first concerts after his marriage was given in Indiana. As he made his appearance he pointed to the tan tweed waistcoat that contrasted so strangely with his otherwise correct evening clothes and said: "No, I'm not trying to set a new style! It's just that this time my wife packed my bag!"

It was fully five minutes before either singer or audience stopped roaring.

Ordinarily Helmut Dantine is no party boy. He runs with no clique or social set in Hollywood. In fact, socially, Helmut's almost a mystery man. You'll see him around town occasionally, maybe with Judy Garland or Ida Lupino or Constance Dowling or some Hollywood girl on his arm, or it might be a girl you never saw or heard of before. He's a quiet operator. He doesn't like to dance, and the noisy Hollywood table-hopping heavens bore him. He takes in scads of movies in his off hours and chases around to the houses of his friends, a lot of whom are Americans he has met in his five years here. Many are from Pasadena and have no connection whatever with movies. Others are people whose families he met while a student at U. C. L. A. although how he ever made a circle of friends as a raw young Vienna refugee sometimes amazes Helmut himself.

He remembers when he had been in Los Angeles only a few months, a college chum at U. C. L. A. invited him home to dinner. After a husky meal, the family asked Helmut to have second helpings. "No thanks," he replied, "I'm fed up." He meant, "I'm filled up." A lot of Helmut Dantine's acquaintances, too, are people in whose homes he used to tutor. Because he has had to make his way ever since he landed here, with little more than pocket money after ducking the Nazis. By the way

Speaking of CALF LOVE

What could be neater than a NEET CALF?

In the Spring (or any season), a young man's . . . well, eyes . . . turn to shapely calves. For every male is versed in the art of husbandry . . . and his love of calves has been cultivated since Adam.

Look to your own calves, lady. See that they're "smooth" calves, free from glamour-stealing hair, whether stockinged or fashionably bare. Give your legs that self-assurance that comes with the knowledge that they're perfectly groomed . . . are truly NEET looking!

"Better get NEET today"! This cosmetic hair remover will, in a few moments, literally wash away unsightly hair from legs, arm-pits, and forearms. Leaves the skin silken-smooth and pleasantly scented. No sharp edges or razor stubble when never-failing NEET is used. Nor will NEET encourage hair growth. Buy a tube of NEET today, at drug, department, or ten cent stores.

Helmut was surprised no end when he first arrived to discover the wonders of a checking account. His uncle opened a small balance for him in a California bank and told him how to draw on it. Helmut went up to the window and signed a check shortly after he arrived and almost fell over when they actually handed him his money. "I was in town only five days, and the bank knew who I was," he marveled. Seems like nothing like that ever happens in Europe.

Anyway, to keep his pockets jingling in his early poverty days around Hollywood, Helmut peddled his accent in bits and extra stuff, and from his first job, "International Squadron," he took the $200 salary and rented a gas station. That's when he went to college at U. C. L. A. working around the station after classes and dragging in about 40 bucks a week.

Hiyah Gang:

Thanks for your long, thin envelope postmarked Dec. 14, which arrived along with a bunch of belated Christmas cards that had apparently missed the boat.

The Overseas Edition of Modern Screen, you'll no doubt be delighted to hear, is the only movie mag which reaches us regularly via Special Service. The G.I. joes over here are all-out for your pin-up girls, since so many of them are practically all-out for us. You should see the mad scramble when a new Overseas Edition arrives. It soon looks like something you could play on a player piano, with wide open spaces where the pix were!

The films which Special Service gets for us have included, "Hello, Frisco, Hello," "Coney Island," and more recently, "This Is the Army" and "So Proudly We Hail."

By the way, I think the producers should be told that scenes showing luscious banquets with steaks and such are unpopular with G.I.'s who have become hardened to the "C"-ration—pork sausage—canned meat routine. You asked how last Thanksgiving was—believe it or Ripley, but we had real turkey with all the fix-in's!

Best wishes from some censored place in North Africa.

Buell R. Snyder (Tech. Sgt.)

He might have kept up the business longer—it was doing all right, but college wasn't. Helmut never quite got hep to U. S. A. rah-rah. He thought people went to colleges to study seriously and nothing else but. He had been on the campus but a few days when he saw an admiring crowd around some students. He thought certainly they were giving orations from the classics or something. Instead, he saw a circle of heroes swallowing white mice and eating phonograph records! Remember that screwy era?

I don't mean it was entirely that which banished Dantine from the ivy-clad halls. Rather, a serious streak in Helmut which told him he ought to get a toehold on something to make his living. He thought of stage managing and directing, and somebody sent him to the famous Pasadena Community Playhouse to learn the ins and outs. Everyone at the Playhouse acts in something or other, and Helmut found himself getting interested. Then ex-

Playhouse actors like Vic Mature and Bob Preston and Laird Cregar were still coming over from Hollywood to hang around the little theater. Their successes in the movies gave Helmut advanced ideas, and pretty soon he knew enough about acting himself to leave the Playhouse behind. He's frank about the attractiveness of the money, too. In Pasadena, Helmut earned his cakes and coffee teaching tennis, fencing, German and French to rich young moppets which was okay but hardly held out a rosy future.

Because Helmut Dantine is a thrifty, hard-headed and serious fellow about his dimes and nickels. Now that he's making real folding money every week, you don't catch him tossing any of it away at the folly spots or anywhere else. He still lives in a $50-a-month bachelor apartment on Orchid Avenue in the old part of Hollywood. He bought a shoe shine kit and still polishes his own shoes. He prepares his own breakfast, too, and sometimes dinner. He has a second-hand car like a lot of other people (his pet peeve is parking charges), buys hand-me-down suits (which he wears with such elegant grace that you'd swear they were hand-tailored), and he doesn't own one speck of expensive jewelry or doo-dads.

What money and time he does spend, canny Dantine spends on his own self-improvement. Helmut's ancestry really is Hugenot French (the name originally was D'Antin) and he's practical. For instance, he'll sock his dollars in books, because he's a wolfish reader. And between picture parts right now he's buying Linguaphone records to learn Spanish and Portuguese. When he takes care of those two, he's going on to Russian! That's the kind of guy he is. The mental type—not stuffy, understand—but cerebral. And right in keeping you might know Helmut's favorite diversion would be not gin-rummy, but chess.

He met a fellow chess-nut in Humphrey Bogart, by the way, out at Warners'. Bogie has been pushing pawns and rooks and things around for years between takes. So when he and Helmut discovered each other during "Passage to Marseille," it looked like they'd never finish the picture. Turned out Humphrey and Helmut are just about even in chess skill, which makes for those prolonged porings over the board before either makes a move. They started one game on "Passage to Marseille," and then when Helmut went on to another picture, they kept that game up by telephone. "This is B on Stage 2," the operator would hear, "to D on Stage 21—checkmate!"

Helmut even has a tiny portable chess board he lugs around in the glove compartment of his car, just in case. It has come in handy. A few weeks ago, a certain Hollywood starlet suffered a crush on Helmut, or maybe it was a publicity crush. Anyway, nothing would do but that Helmut take her out on a date. It was practically in the columns already so Helmut had to come through. The girl got all gusseted up for a large evening at the glamour gulches. But when Helmut arrived, he never said a thing about stepping out. Instead he unlimbered the chess board.

"Wh-what's that?" gasped the dismayed girl.

"Chess," repeated Helmut. "I'll teach you how to play. We'll have a wonderful evening." It may have been wonderful to Helmut, but the young star decided she could get along without another one. She hasn't bothered Helmut since.

Helmut is no Hermit, understand. In fact, when he had to have his hair clipped and grow a spiky stubble of whiskers to play a Devil's Island criminal in "Passage to Marseille" which altered his dark beauty considerably, there were feminine wails from one end of Hollywood to the other. But it's true he's never had a serious heart attack since he split up with pretty Gwen Anderson—Helmut and Gwen met at the Pasadena Playhouse as student actors, fell head over heels in love. They were married and lived happily in Hollywood, with not a cloud to mar their happiness—until Gwen's career took her to New York to play in the Broadway show, "Janie," and Helmut's bound him ever closer to Hollywood. Then both revealed what really came first in their lives—their work. But, in facing this problem, Helmut revealed the same level-headed good sense he shows in most everything he does.

"If we must separate," they told each other, "let's do it now. We've been together only about a year. Five years from now the separation will hurt." So they got their divorce and, if you can believe Helmut on that score, they're still great friends, and he thinks she's one of the most wonderful girls in the world.

There's that philosophical twist to Helmut Dantine's outlook that is really amazing in a fellow so young. He keeps calm and collected and honestly fair even when the breaks go against him. They had made him up for a pip of a part at Warners'—"Mask Of Dimitrios," a sympathetic part, by the way, and Helmut at the time was getting sick and tired of his dirty dog days. As anyone can tell from the title, the actor who played the part had to look like a Greek, and for several days the studio thought Helmut was their boy, being dark and with classic features. He was getting congratulations around the lot when the casting director uncovered another actor whom he thought would fit the part like a wet glove. Instead of huffing and puffing jealously about somebody beating him out, Helmut took a look at the newcomer's test and chimed right in with the tentative verdict. "He'll be better than me," he said simply. Turned out he wasn't though, 'cause Helmut got the part after all.

Disappointments just aren't mean enough to ruffle the guy. Take the time a while back when his New York trip got all balled up. Helmut hadn't had enough cash to travel East for some years after he hit California, and being a big city boy and alone in California except for a couple of relatives, Helmut yearned to visit New York.

Finally he saved up enough sugar and had ten days between parts to make it. He knew a train would be too slow so he hopped a plane. Well, the plane sat down for two days in Albuquerque waiting for good weather. He took another and it dallied another 48 hours in Kansas City. He lost another bad flying day in Chicago. And he ended up in New York two days later than the Chief would have arrived. It cut his long cherished trip short, but Helmut stayed happy about the whole thing, not sore a bit. "The other cities were so interesting," he explained, Pollyanna-like—only he really meant it.

Because if there's one thing that has absorbed Helmut Dantine since he hit these shores—and still does—it's America—all of it. He would rather become a regular American Joe than anything he can think of. For a while chewing gum threw him, and a lot of other quaint customs of Uncle Sam's nephews. But now he knows all about apple pie and cokes and jitterbugs and such. He still prefers wine with his meals, but he can down an American cocktail and wade into mashed potatoes, corn bread and gravy, and really like it. If you knew how Helmut likes to eat, you'd appreciate his sacrifices for his art that got him his first crack at movie fame.

That when he made the kitchen scene in "Mrs. Miniver" where he stumbled in half starved and ravenously wolfed some ham and milk that Greer Garson slipped him. They scheduled that take one day when Helmut made the mistake of stoking up on a large lunch. And he was very realistic, practically toying with his food. So they took it again. It was still only fair, so Helmut decided to get realistic in a big way. He didn't eat any dinner that night, no breakfast the next day and no lunch. When his scene came on again in the afternoon, he almost chewed off his own fingers.

He smoked a rugged pipe when he first came over and still does every now and then, but by now American cigarettes have him in their clutches. He's a sucker, too, for the American funnies—partly because Helmut thinks he can pick up more Americanism there than he'll ever find anywhere else in a month of Sunday supplements. Yep, "Lil Abner" is one of his favorites. Another course in Americana is the radio. He can really laugh now at Hope, Allen, and McCarthy. For a long, long time, though, Helmut just didn't get the gags.

Helmut wrote out his first citizenship papers three years ago, and he has just applied for the final tickets to Independence. When that happens—or maybe before, if Uncle Sam says so—Helmut Dantine will probably be trading those costumes of his for the real thing, U. S. A. design and model, government issue. Because he's healthy as a young goat. Helmut has always kept fit with regular exercise of some sort, horseback riding or tennis or boxing.

His major personal ambition is to rescue his family, still penned up in Naziland. He hears from them only through the Red Cross at the chatty rate of 25 words a month, and if there is anything that will ruffle his Continental calm it is thoughts of what is happening there. And things are always happening, it seems, to remind him of the past.

When Helmut made "Northern Pursuit" he came on the set one day to find a bit actor playing a German colonel in the Canadian concentration camp that featured part of that picture. Helmut thought the actor's face was familiar. Then he caught the guy's eye, and they both almost jumped out of their skins. Last time they'd seen each other was in a concentration camp in Austria before they'd escaped—and that wasn't acting—no indeed!

There was a time when his set life, being generally draped with all the trappings of Hitler's horrors, gave Helmut a turn in the tummy that made his work—well, not exactly a picnic. But he's got over that. In fact, the other day in "Passage to Marseille" he saw a prop work sheet pasted up on the set. It read, "Need two dozen helmuts." That's the way it was spelled, "helmuts"—but it meant those coal-scuttle things the Nazis wear.

Helmut ripped off the mis-spelled prop sheet, walked innocently up to Humphrey Bogart and waved the sheet.

"Don't you think one Helmut is enough for this picture?" he asked.

They chased him off the set after that one.

But it proves one thing: Helmut Dantine has been around America long enough by now to shake the Vienna Blues.

Any day now he'll be hep to Hollywood

"Does it mean she's smart?"

"Of course—in the back and legs."

"In the head, too," crowed her ma. "Else how would she know about hanging on to the bars?"

Lana's got a long and exacting part to play in "Marriage Is a Private Affair." There's hardly a scene that doesn't require her presence. She's had no time off. So Nana and her mother hoard up the baby's doings and spread them out for her at night like so many jewels. She's inordinately grateful. Because suppose when she came home, hungry to hear about Cheryl, they were the kind who'd say: "Oh, she's fine. Period." Thank heaven they're not like that. Thank heaven they help her keep close to the baby.

Every day some new little something happens. It's like planting a tree—you know how you keep running out in the spring to watch the buds and the shoots and the leaves, and you hate to miss a day, because every day they look so different. This is the same, only so much more exciting. Of course they're all little things, even silly, maybe, to some people, but only to people who've never had a baby. Mothers, says Lana, will know exactly what she means—

Before starting work on the new picture, she'd been with Cheryl constantly. It was hard to break away. But when she got home that night, they had the most wonderful things to tell her.

Over the fireplace hangs a pastel of Lana, a gift from her fans. On a bond tour that took her to Seattle she'd met the girl who made it. Only 17 the girl was, and she'd done it from a black-and-white. But it looked as though Lana had sat for her for days.

Well, after she'd left that morning, her mother said to the baby: "Cheryl, where's Mommy?" And the baby looked around, kind of lost at first, then suddenly she was staring at the picture. She didn't do anything, didn't reach out or cry, just looked at it, then back again at her grandmother. Thinking maybe she was imagining things, Mrs. Turner asked her again: "Where's Mommy?" And the baby did exactly the same thing again, so it wasn't an accident. Now, even when Lana's holding her and they ask: "Where's Mommy?"—half the time she'll turn to look at the picture, before ducking her head into her Mommy's neck.

Parting is such sweet sorrow that Lana bids her daughter good-by 19 times each morning. The final good-by is a kiss blown from her palm. Nana used to lift Cheryl's palm to her mouth in return. Till that miraculous morning when the baby got ahead of her. Up went the little hand under its own steam and flattened itself against her face. Lana went out of her mind. She got to the studio late that morning.

On Sundays you couldn't pry her loose from the house, and her high holiday is Nana's Sunday off. Nothing to do but take care of her darling. Nana leaves about nine while Cheryl—who's been up since 6:15—is taking her nap. She's asleep when Lana tiptoes into her room.

There's no inch of that room that Lana doesn't know by heart and love. She and Steve started planning it as soon as they knew for sure that the baby was coming.

"I want it as feminine as possible—"

"But suppose it's a boy—"

"Well—he'll still be a baby, Steve, so he won't mind. And later, we can fix it

NO GREATER Loneliness

To live in the same house with the man you love . . . and yet be miles apart! That is the greatest loneliness! A revealing story every wife should read!

THE silence in the living room was so deep that the ticking of the small desk clock sounded loud and sharp . . . the way it does in the middle of a sleepless night. That—and the rustle of Rod's newspaper were the only sounds in the room since dinner.

Bitterly, Enid remembered the happy evenings they once had shared. Now they shared nothing but the same roof . . . What had come between them?

DOCTORS KNOW that too many women still do not have up-to-date information about certain physical facts. And too many, who think they know, have only half-knowledge. So they still rely on ineffective or dangerous preparations.

You have a right to know about the important medical advances made during recent years in connection with this intimate problem. They affect every woman's health and happiness.

And so, with the cooperation of doctors who specialize in women's medical problems, the makers of Zonite have just published an authoritative new book, which clearly explains the facts. (See free book offer below.)

YOU SHOULD, however, be warned here about two definite threats to happiness. First, the danger of infection present every day in every woman's life. Second, the most serious deodorization problem any woman has . . . one which you may not suspect. And what to use is so important. That's why you ought to know about Zonite Antiseptic.

USED IN THE DOUCHE (as well as for a simple every-day routine of external protection) Zonite is both antiseptic and deodorant. Zonite deodorizes, not by just masking, but by actually destroying odors. Leaves no lasting odor of its own.

Zonite also kills immediately all germs and bacteria on contact. Yet contains no poisons or acids. No other type of liquid antiseptic-germicide is more powerful, yet so safe. Your druggist has Zonite.

up with sort of boy cut-outs—airplanes and cowboys and stuff."

Its wide windows, curtained in billowing white organdy, look out on terrace and lawn. The floor is blue congoleum, and before Cheryl came, the dimpled pink cherubs on the pale blue walls were all Lana's babies. She'd sit gazing at them—their small chubby backs, tipped with little-bitty gold wings, their adorable antics—one on his back, pushing hard with his foot against a fleecy cloud, one tugging manfully at the other end, two lazy rascals looking down from a cloud above, watching the other fellow sweat. She'd sit there, dreaming of the day when they'd bring delight to a real baby. She'd go over and touch the crib with its frisking lambs and bunnies and dream of a baby lying there who'd never be afraid of the dark, because if she woke at night—it was always "she" with Lana—little phosphorescent stars would twinkle down from the ceiling to keep her company. . . .

Now the dream's reality. There she lies in her crib, waking up. The auburn head stirs—it's auburn now, Lana's natural color, but it's coming in blonde. The fingers uncurl—they're slender and tapering. The dark brown lashes—thicker than they are long—lift over the smoke-blue eyes. Steve's eyes are brown, Lana's blue, so Cheryl compromised on dark blue. She took her nose and mouth, her transparent skin and the shape of her face from Lana. Her brows are Steve's—tilted just enough to be piquant. And she has his forehead. As a kid, Lana used to sit and push her hair back.

"What for?" Mrs. Turner would ask.

brow-beater . . .

"Oh, a woman looks so wonderful with a brow. But I might as well quit. All that happens is, my hair grows lower."

She still thinks a woman looks wonderful with a brow. Merle Oberon's fascinates her.

It's about 10:30 when the baby wakes up. Lana's first job—pleasure, to be more accurate—is to bathe her. She was scared the first time. Wouldn't have believed a child could be so slippery. Now she's a veteran.

"Wait till she gets too big for the bathinette and you have to stick her in a tub," warned a friend who has two. "There's a back-breaking job."

Lana smiled at the vision of Cheryl in a tub. "I don't know a nicer way to break one's back," she murmured.

Tub-time's followed by playtime. She's put into her little blue rocker that plays tunes, and she rocks away like mad. Music's already an important part of her life. For a while they had "Silent Night" coming out of their ears. Nancy Sinatra sent her a fuzzy white horse with a blue mane and tail and a red tongue. She loved him at sight, because the tongue stuck out and she could pull it. But not till she found he could sing "Silent Night" did the grand passion blaze. She fell asleep and woke up with him, stuck him under your nose 20 times a day and went "Nnnnn—" Meaning, "Wind him up, please."

Lately, she's taken to making her own music, though only a mother could call it that. Sits at the piano and pounds. Thinks she's a genius. Turns and throws you this broad smile, this silly adorable grin. Lana's always torn between the enchantment of that grin and the fear that she'll hurt her pink, unbelievably fragile, doll hands.

At 12:30 comes the business of "Eat your mush, darling." (To Lana, born in Idaho, hot cereal will always be mush.) Cheryl prefers her bottle. She waves the mush aside and makes a grab for the milk. But Lana's always firm. She doesn't want her Cheryl to be spoiled, and she is very conscious of the fact that love and over-indulgence are two different things. So Miss Crane doesn't get her bottle till the mush disappears.

A nap till 2:30, a bottle at 3. (Lana can rattle the time-table off in her sleep.) Then, if the weather's nice, an outing in her carriage. Of all the lovely dresses that hang in her wardrobe, she's never worn one. "If you want her to look just darling," the doctor said, "put her in dresses. If you want her to be comfortable, keep her out of them." So she wears little silk or challis sacques over her shirt, and soakers over her diapers. Mrs. Turner knits the soakers, with sweaters to match, for cold weather. Of course she looks just darling in anything—or nothing—but extra-darling in blue. It brings out the transparency of her skin. Of course yellow is lovely, too. And in white she's gorgeous.

Born in California, she's no true daughter of the Chamber of Commerce. Wrinkles her eyes against the sun. The breeze is her baby. She gurgles at the movement it makes in the willows and the way it drops olives off the olive-tree. She should worry if the gardener has to spend half his time sweeping them off the lawn.

Back in the house she's ready to be entertained, and she does mean entertained. Gone are the days when you could just wave a toy at her. Now you have to work. Many's the time Lana's clapped her hands red, playing pattycake. But even that's high adventure. Because at first Cheryl's hands would cling to her as she clapped, then suddenly one day she started clapping all by herself. . . .

When things like that happen, Lana's squeals can be heard all over the house. Everyone comes running and the excitement's good for half an hour.

"You're my wonderful baby. Do you know how wonderful you are?"

By which time Cheryl's blowing bubbles or going after the phone. If you call Lana's house and the line's busy, it's likely to be Cheryl on the phone. She's modern that way. Doesn't make dates yet, just crazy to take the receiver off the hook. You let her take it off once, then try to sneak her attention into other channels. "Nnnnn," she says firmly. So you put it back on—and she takes it off again. This goes on till one of you's had enough, and it isn't Cheryl.

At 7 she's fed and sponged and oiled and put to bed with the lambs and the bunnies. Lana gives her the smooth blue rattle she likes best because she can't get her mouth around it, but some day she will, by golly, if persistence counts. The lights are turned out, and the stars in Cheryl's ceiling began to twinkle, and a soft kiss is dropped on the brow that a woman looks so wonderful with. And two minutes later

Pvt. Francis Haverty, Carlisle Barracks, Carlisle, Pa., is an autograph hound extraordinary!

Recently, when Judy Garland appeared at the post, Haverty, 5 ft., 3 inches tall, approached Judy as she was busily engaged in conversation with a brigadier-general and two colonels.

Drawing himself up to his full height, he saluted smartly, asked for Judy's autograph, received it, saluted again, executed a snappy about-face and made his exit.

What a man Haverty—performing such a maneuver in the face of so much rank!

MEN and women all over this country are reporting remarkable results in losing weight easily. Many lost 20 pounds a month and more. They are following the Easy Reducing Plan of Dr. Edward Parrish, well-known physician and editor, former chief of a U. S. military hospital and a state public health officer.

Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan makes reducing a pleasure because it has NO STRICT DIETS, requires no exercises. HARMLESS, too, because it calls for no reducing drugs.

Here is Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan EXACTLY as given over the air to millions: For lunch take 2 teaspoonfuls of CAL-PAR in a glass of juice, water or any beverage. Take nothing else for lunch except a cup of coffee, if desired. For breakfast and dinner EAT AS YOU USUALLY DO, but eat sensibly. Don't cut out fatty, starchy foods—just cut down on them. By following Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan, you cut down your daily calorie intake, thus losing weight naturally. You needn't suffer a single hungry moment. CAL-PAR is not a harmful reducing drug. It is a special dietary product, fortifying your diet with certain essential minerals and vitamins. Most overweight people are helped by Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan. Try it and you and your friends will marvel at the vast improvement in your figure.

- NO EXERCISE!
- NO REDUCING DRUGS!
- ABSOLUTELY HARMLESS!

If your dealer hasn't CAL-PAR a special can containing 18 DAYS' SUPPLY will be sent you postpaid, for only $1.00. This $1.00 can is not sold at stores. Money back if not satisfied. Fill out coupon, pin a dollar bill to it and mail today. We will also send you FREE, Dr. Parrish's booklet on reducing containing important facts you ought to know including weight tables and charts of food values.

the woman's sound asleep for the night.

Lana wouldn't kid herself—won't say she's been called mamma and won't say she hasn't. Sometimes Cheryl goes, "Mmmm-ah." Sometimes she does it twice in succession. If you want to put them together, it might be mamma, or it might be teething. She's got two downstairs and two coming in above, and she cuts them on zwiebach. Once she got hold of her hairbrush and bit into it. That makes it practically a museum piece with Lana. "Look, Mother, it's marked."

"Always has been. CCC—"

"No, look here—" Her voice drops to a cathedral hush, "—little bitty toothmarks."

She'll doubtless be called Mommy to avoid confusion, since she calls Mrs. Turner mother or mamma.

Lana never peers into the future. She doesn't wonder what their daughter will be like at two or ten or eighteen. She's in no hurry at all. On the contrary. Each day is so rich and full that each day is enough—tomorrow will be another day with Cheryl in it. If she's asleep, you can always open the drawers of her chest and look at the pretty things people have sent her. And going through the little jewel-box is such fun.

There's the tiny St. Christopher from a dear friend of Lana's whose own little two-year-old boy has one just like it, both blessed by the Pope. There's Cheryl's first cross from grandmother Turner, set with rubies, her birthstone. And there's Lana's own baby ring—a dark brown cameo from her father—her chocolate ring, she used to call it. She can't help smiling, looking at it now, thinking of the baby who grew up to become the mother of baby Cheryl.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

One Sunday evening six years ago my phone rang. "Los Angeles calling," said the operator. A second later a deep voice said, "Mrs. Baldwin? This is Brian Donlevy." I grabbed the phone and hung on for support.

I had seen all of Brian's movies from his first, "Barbary Coast," and after each I wrote him my reactions, notes which he always answered promptly.

During our conversation (or should I say his conversation—my voice had disappeared along with my wits) he told me how thrilled he'd been over my interest, especially since his morale had badly needed a good boost during those early years. He said, "Your letters were amusing and different, yes, but the important thing was that I knew that at least somebody took the trouble to find out who I was."

Maybe he was being kind, maybe that's just the kind of a regular guy he is, but anyway we had a good laugh; and then his voice changed and he grew serious. He wanted to ask a favor of me. It seems that one of his fans was in a tuberculosis sanitarium, and he hoped that I would write and cheer her up the way I had him. I was only too glad to oblige, of course. Through her I learned of his thoughtfulness, of how, though he had never met her, he used to send her magazines and chatty notes.

I've outgrown fan-letter writing, but the one thing I shall never forget is the gentleness and kindness of one of Hollywood's really great gentlemen.

complexion's all glowing. Otherwise, skip it this Summer.

Now I'm not pretending that I discovered cotton shirt frocks—you've been wearing them for years. If the jobs in your closet right now are up to a return engagement—good girl! But if you've got your eye out for a new one, here's a tip. Choose it the way a fussy man does his shirts. Examine the cut and workmanship of lapels, how the shoulders set, how the seams are finished. And make sure, above all, the fabric's durable and tubbable. If you want to ring in a new trick—Starspun, one of the "famous name" ginghams, is the finest I've ever seen. This you can throw into the electric washer without a worry. Buttons all the way up the side for smartness—which means it unbuttons as well for easy ironing. (See how I watch out for you?)

Grand climax—balloon cloth! Don't look dead pan about it. The government recently released 4,000,000 yards of it for us "civvies" and what a fashion windfall that was! You can imagine how strong and wash-proof it is, when it was originally loomed for barrage balloons. Still, it's the softest, finest, most "lady-like" cotton I've seen since the fine Swiss imports we used to get (way before your time).

You'll have balloon cloth in one form or another before the Summer's out. But I'd like to see you wearing it in a soft date frock. Like the square-neck dirndl sketched. Comes in all the pretty candy pastels, but if your coloring can take it, take it in dove grey. Looks so-o-o suave and know-it-all that way.

Yep, this last also buttons straight up the back for easy you-know-what. Frankly, I'm cracked on the subject. But if your ironing board's like mine, with a leg that does interference smack in the middle, you ought to thank me for it.

Which reminds me—I've a little ironing to do myself right now. So g'bye. Write me (Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, New York), if you want to know where these sudsable duds are to be found—or if you've a clothes problem you'd like me to take over for you. MB

Which Deodorant wins your vote?

☐ CREAM? ☐ POWDER? ☐ LIQUID?

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

. . . created especially for this purpose —QUEST* POWDER—soft, soothing, safe. It's the Kotex* Deodorant, approved by the Kotex laboratories. Being unscented, it doesn't merely cover up one odor with another. Quest Powder destroys napkin odor completely. It's your sure way to avoid offending.

good food in restaurants, hearing people talk of a distant war instead of one just over the hill. Seeing guys walking around in sport clothes instead of mud-streaked O.D. Seeing women night clubbing in silks and satins instead of bandaging wounded soldiers all night in evacuation hospitals while the earth shook.

Yep, it was strange. Because for the three months before that Humphrey Bogart and his wife and a couple of other guys had traveled 35,000 miles in planes, trains, boats, jeeps, trucks and what have you up around where the going was rugged, to hand Uncle Sam's soldiers a laugh or two and maybe a nostalgic whiff of that good old U. S. A. which they longed for plenty, each after his own fashion—like the G. I. at the Volturno river bridge—a whiff of home . . .

He was jammed in an Army traffic squeeze stretching for miles back of this bridge, the only one Jerry had missed blowing sky-high in his retreat up Italy. It was gray dawn, but his sharp eyes recognized the guy huddled in the open command car while the bucketing rain bounced off his helmet. He leaned out of the cab of his truck and tilted back his own helmet to reveal the map of a typical U. S., city-raised, down-by-the-gas-works hard cookie.

"Hey!" he yelled to the command car. "Ain't you Humphrey Bogart?"

"You've got me, Pal!" admitted Bogie.

"Well, whaddya know! One of the boys—and way out here in Italy! Say, whatta you hear from the mob, Bogie? How's Rosetti? Can he beat da rap?" His face was anxious.

Bogie caught the act like a shortstop grabs a bounder. He put on his best gangster face and growled,

"If he don't sing, he's a cinch!"

"And what about Lousy Louie, an' Willie the Rat an' Lepke—say, what about Lepke?"

"Oh," barked Bogie, "he'll burn. He'll burn!"

"Just what I t'ought! Cheez, it's great to get news from the good old U. S. A.!" Just then the whistles blew, engines raced and gears clashed. Tires spun in the mud, and the driver had to move on. "So long, Bo!" he yelled happily over the din; "—and t'anks!"

"Okay, Kid," shouted Bogie. "Take it easy!"

That was a memory. Then there was the soldier in the hospital in Naples. A young kid like the one who lives next door with a boyish face and fair skin that might have been rosy once but was gray now and lined with worry. He was trying to tell a nurse writing a letter for him what to say to the girl he was supposed to marry when he got back home.

"What I can't figure out," he was saying to the nurse when Bogie and Mayo passed by, "is how to tell her." How to tell her that both his legs were gone and an arm, too.

Or the doughboy right up behind the lines sitting in a tent bawling like a baby when Bogie ducked in. A big man he was, built like a varsity tackle.

"Don't know why I'm bawling," sobbed the soldier, "but I just can't help it!" He'd just come from 3 days' fighting. Bogie stayed with him until he slept before he dragged out his own handkerchief.

And the other memories. The Arab went "B-r-r-r-r-r!" like a machine gun when they saw him. The German prisoners who said, "Ach—Cinema, cinema!" The soldiers who sighed, "Do you really know Betty Grable?" The ones who came bashfully up to present Mayo with their treasures, battle souvenirs, keepsakes that she didn't have the heart to refuse. Funny ones like the Fascists big-shot's silk sash with the tassels that the guys made Bogie wear so they could howl at him—and the Mussolini maternity medal with 12 stars for 12 babies they handed Bogie for a gag!

And the soldiers who were anxious about how things were back home—when there they were ready to catch a bullet the next day. "How are things back in the States? Are the home folks backing us up?" And, "Think they'll try to sneak over Prohibition while we're away?"

Yep, a movie star who has been over there where it's going on comes back with a lot of memories—funny ones, sad ones. He sees sights he'll never forget, and when he comes home, he gets surprised all over again—but in a different way. He sees a garbage truck rolling down the avenue, for instance, loaded with waste food (like Humphrey did the first day he hit Hollywood), and he shakes his head and asks his wife, "Can you imagine what would happen to that truck in Naples?" It would be stripped in a few minutes—eaten up by hungry Italians, that's what.

But Humphrey Bogart didn't go overseas with any message for the soldiers. He made a point not to. And he makes a point that he hasn't come back with any message for the home folks, except for a Red Cross fund-raising short. All I want to tell is about a trip that happens to a Hollywood star once in a lifetime, although Bogie would like it to happen again soon. It was a trip that cost Bogie ten pounds of the flesh he hasn't much of and countless hours of sleep, countless units of energy, discomforts a movie star seldom runs into—but which paid dividends in heart tugs, memories and satisfactions that all the gold in Hollywood couldn't buy, if you could sell things like that.

They called themselves "The Filthy Four," and they weren't kidding, because they carried lice powder and used it. They went for days without a bath or a shave or clean underwear. They traveled in jeeps and command cars without springs, over shell-pocked roads when they were up front and had their teeth shaken loose, and they hitch-hiked rides in fighter planes and bombers to get from sector to sector. They traveled with full equipment—helmets, raincoats, galoshes, blankets, dufflebags, flashlights and water canteens. The ate C-rations and K-rations and Spam and Vienna sausages and powdered eggs until a leaf of lettuce, a hamburger and a cup of good coffee loomed like caviar and champagne. They slept on coats over mud in tents or on straw pallets in abandoned Italian villas, and they rustled for cold hotel rooms when they hit a town. And at that they felt pampered because the soldiers had it easily ten times as rough.

That was the style of the "Filthy Four" —Humphrey Bogart, Mayo Methot, his wife and two New York entertainers, Don Cumming and Ralph Hark—all the way on the 35,000 mile trip. Mayo and Bogie had volunteered through the Hollywood Victory Committee for the USO-Camp Shows tour, of course, and when the going got particularly rugged, when, for instance, they woke up in the icy dawn to face a rainy day bumping over cavernous roads with only cold Spam in their tummies, or something equally bleak, Bogie would hang up a gag sign in the tent, one he'd printed for just such occasions . . . "Idle Talk Caused This!" There was another sign Bogie made up, too. He used it as a gag with the G.I.'s to apologize for a not very glamorous backdrop for the entertainment, like—say, the back end of a truck for a stage, "If you Think This Trick Stinks—Applaud Anyway!" it suggested.

The Filthy Four got together in New York, where Bogie and Mayo flew right after "Passage to Marseille" had wound up at Warners'. They made their first ocean hop—29 hours—in a big Army Transport Command plane to Natal, West Africa, and that was when Bogie first realized he was in for some new experiences.

They'd barely left Miami before one of the passengers, a young Army officer, came up to Bogie.

"Are you," he asked, "a short-snorter?"

"Why, no," replied Bogie pleasantly. He'd heard vaguely about short-snorters but he wasn't exactly clear just what they were. He found out on the spot.

"Hand over one buck!" demanded the officer. Bogie did, and as there were 31 short-snorters aboard, he handed over 31 bucks. Then Mayo got the same treatment, so that in a few minutes the Bogarts were out $62! Sadder but wiser, from then on they kept their own short-snorter bills within quick and easy reach, even took them to bed with them—when they could find a bed.

The Bogies discovered something else, too, on that first hop—that ocean hops in these Army days aren't exactly joyrides. First time Bogie pulled out a cigarette—and he's a steady smoker—there was that sign: "No Smoking!" When he went into the lavatory to scrub his teeth, the plane decided to drop 700 feet in a pocket, and he practically bit his hand off. And when he first tried to eat—well, his stomach wasn't having any.

But Humphrey's air discomforts were as nothing compared to Mayo's. Bogie has flown here and there at times, but Mayo has always looked on planes with rank suspicion, to put it mildly. In fact, they scare her to death, and she makes no bones about it. Mental sufferings are always the worst, and it's to Mayo's credit that she lived in and out of planes for three months and survived without a nervous breakdown. Because one worry piled on another.

First off, she noticed the pilot of the big transport plane fingertipping the controls, leaning back now and then, and talking with the crew and not getting a bit hot and bothered about herding the big crate. The only piloting Mayo had ever seen up close was her husband, Bogie, or some other camera sky-hawk, wrestling in a desperate Dick Dauntless fashion with the controls, tugging around and knocking himself out in some desperate scenario situation. "Do you think he's flying it all right?" she would ask Bogie. "Look—he isn't even steering!" "I'll show him how," Bogie would crack.

The Bogarts, especially Mayo, never got entirely plane happy, in the literal sense of that word, although if they weren't climbing in one plane they were tumbling out of another, it seemed. From Natal to Dakar, to Marrakeech to Algiers to Casablanca to Naples to here and to there. They had plenty of wild rides, but the wildest took place one late afternoon from Naples to Foggia. That is, wild in Mayo's vivid imagination.

That day they were supposed to ride in a B-17, but something went wrong with the schedules. (Something often goes wrong with schedules when you're up near where the bullets fly.) Their only chance to make it to Foggia in time to throw a show for the boys was to "sweat out a ride" on a B-25 medium bomber. In Italy you "sweat out" everything you do; it's one of those Army expressions. But this time nobody was fooling. At least in Mrs. Bogart's mind.

First something went wrong with the communication system, and the pilot worked out some signals to the crewman in the rear. He told Mayo, "When I touch you, you touch Humphrey, then have him touch So-and-so" to communicate the signal. Mayo was so anxious to do it right that when she got touched, she whammed Bogie and knocked the wind out of him!

They flew over Pompeii, the ancient Roman city of ruins. But Bogie didn't get a good gander. So he asked, "Can you fly a little nearer? I didn't get a good look." That was all the pilot needed. He dropped a few hundred feet on a 50-degree bank, and Mayo's heart stuck in her throat. She could see herself landing on a marble pillar with Roman ruins wrapped around her neck. But the worst moment came when they started to land. There above the Foggia field their pilot circled around a pattern of P-38's in formation, which is something like playing tag with a swarm of bees. And Mayo heard the soldier on the radiophone signal to the field. "We're out of gas . . . out of gas . . . out of gas."

It was only after she had staggered weakly out on the air field that Mayo had strength to remark, "Lucky we made it—with you being out of gas. I thought we'd crash for sure."

"Oh that," said the soldier with the earphones. "We had plenty of gas, Mrs. Bogart. I just didn't want to wait around up there for a landing signal. When you're out of gas, they let you come right in." Mayo almost swooned.

There was never a dull moment for the Bogies with thrills packed into every day. Thrills like staying at the Anfa Hotel in Casablanca, where Churchill and Roosevelt met. Or like going down into the wicked Kasbah at Algiers with an Army provost marshal and two MP's. (They never saw Hedy Lamarr or Charles Boyer anywhere!) And the thrill of watching a couple of plain, unheroic looking muddy little Yanks drawn up in battlefield review to receive citations for outstanding heroism under fire. A million thrills like that every minute.

But the greatest thrills of all to Humphrey Bogart and his crew were the kicks they got every time they put a show on for the Yanks—whether it was in a big barracks or at a dinky battle outpost set up in the Italian mud. Those were the times Bogie got paid off with genuine appreciation—the stuff money can't ever get you—and in person.

It wasn't a polished, slick act the Filthy Four gave the boys. There were lots of comic cut-ups with Don Cumming, and Ralph Hark joked and squeezed his accordion and Mayo sang a bunch of songs she used to sing on Broadway, and Bogie tried card tricks that flopped crazily and the boys socked each other around the stage. But mostly it was just Bogie standing up there and ribbing himself and letting the G.I.'s rib him too—seeing if he could come back with some fast answers that would hand them laughs. He usually started out with "Duke Mantee's" tough speech from "The Petrified Forest," Bogie's first Hollywood hit.

"Now everybody stay where you are, see?" he'd snarl.

"We'll have a little music—see?—and some laughs . . ." and so on. Then Bogie started kidding his own killer reputation. "What I'm really over here for," he'd tell them, "is to get me a new mob. The draft took all my best rod-men. Anybody want to get in on the racket?" There'd be yells at this and ribbing. One kid piped up, "Say—there's something I'd like to know. How in h—— can you shoot an automatic pistol for thirty shots in one of those movie gun fights and never reload?"

kicking the gag around . . .

"S-h-h-" Bogie'd reply. "That's it, kid—that's my secret weapon. It's gonna win the war!"

Or he'd be confidential. "Now listen, guys. I'm gonna let you in on the real, inside dope. I got secret information. You want to know where you're going next?" Sure they wanted to know where they were going. Rumors buzzed around like flies all the time. There'd be a hush in the audience then. "Well," stage-whispered Bogie, "I gotta be cagey about this. But you remember I made a picture called 'Casablanca'? And where did you guys go right after that? Uh-huh! Well, I just finished one called 'Passage to Marseille.' Get it? But don't tell anybody!" There'd be roars at this.

rick's bar . . .

They had most all seen Bogie's pictures, and they had questions: "Say, did you run across Rick's Bar when you were in Casablanca?" Matter of fact, Bogie did—although it was a far cry from the glamorous den of his Academy Award picture. Bogie's pilot dropped down on the Casablanca airport one night to fill up with gas. "Just got fifteen minutes here," he told Bogie. "But how about a drink at Rick's Bar?" They walked to a tiny shack where an officer was tending bar, such as it was—a plank across a couple of stools. "The flyers fixed this up," he said "and called it 'Rick's Bar' for some reason or other." He didn't know. He wasn't a movie fan. Bogie didn't say anything.

But maybe the biggest kick concerned with his Hollywood screen killer past was the nightly broadcast from Berlin. Herr Goebbels took Bogie's tour seriously and Sally, "the B—— of Berlin," as the G.I.'s called her, took him up as a pet propaganda subject. Sally is a German gal with an American accent who plays the piano and then launches into a program intended to simply devastate Uncle Sam's troops. They tune in on Sally for the belly laughs she hands them trying to be a poison voice when she's only absurd. Anyway, Sally chirped out one night after her usual "Hello, Suckers! And now what do you red-blooded Yanks think," cracked Sally, "about Hollywood sending over a phoney movie gangster killer to show you guys how to be tough? How do you like that? Ha-ha-ha!" The same line was dished out in Jerry's army magazine (comparable to our "Stars and Stripes") so Bogie knew it was official from Goebbels' headquarters. To be honored as a Public Enemy of Hitler's Gang, he considered a high distinction indeed.

If I went into where all Bogie, Mayo and the Filthy Four went and what they did, I'd have to write a book. And besides maybe some of it's a military secret. But they did get up to where they could hear the shells whanging and through glasses see the tanks shooting it out. They met that famous Italian guy, "Al Recovero," but the meeting was social, not business. "Al Recovero" is really quite a character in Italy, Bogie discovered. All the G.I.'s know him. He means something like "Bomb Shelter" in our lingo. But the boys have long ago made a gent out of him. They write after the signs: "Al Recovero for Mayor!" and "How you doin', Al?"

Once "Al Recovero," for Bogie and his comedy crew, was a villa up where the shooting was hot and heavy. They put on a show there one afternoon, the day after shells had knocked out all the windows, and the day after they left, more Jerry shells made powder out of the place for keeps. That was as close as they came to being under fire. They never got bombed, although escorting officers kept cracking, "Bear with us, please. We'll get you bombed yet!"

"Wish you'd arrange it, boys," Bogie would crack. "How can I go back to Hollywood without being bombed just once. I'll never be able to face the mob!"

icing meringue and bayonets . . .

Fact was, about the greatest personal danger Bogie encountered on the trip was last Christmas night. Christmas is Humphrey's birthday, and Mayo happened to make a crack in an afternoon show that "it was the first birthday of Bogie's I haven't baked him a cake!" Well, that night right in the middle of the act, an Army cook and his helpers marched up the aisle with the biggest block-buster cake you ever saw, with the works—icing, meringue, even "Happy Birthday" all over it. Bogie was really touched. He couldn't say anything for a minute. Then he made his big mistake.

"Any of you guys got a bayonet or knife or something to cut this with?" he yelled. "Bring me one and then come and get your piece of cake!"

Well, a couple of hundred bayonets and trench knives bore down on Bogie in no time flat along with a few hundred cake-hungry soldiers, and Mayo thought it was all over for Bogie. The last she saw of him he was being swept down the field, cake and all, with steel sticking all around him! But he survived. Maybe because he's so tough—the softie!

In fact, by that time Bogie and all the F.F. were pretty rugged in spite of no green goods, fresh fruits or meat and the killer-diller tour schedule. Most of their shows were set up any old place, with a couple of G.I. trucks backed together for a stage, and they kept physically fit setting up the props and mentally alert figuring up in lire and other foreign dough their U.S.O. expenses; "worrying," as Bogie recalled, "far into the very night over what happened to five bucks!"

Maybe the oddest stage they ever did their stuff on was in the harbor at Dakar. There, after a diet of C-rations, Mayo rashly stated she'd give an extra show for a steak. The naval officers at the station came through, so that night three destroyers anchored together and gobs hung off the rigging while the Filthy Four put on the longest show of the tour. It was there, too (but on the way to Italy), that Bogie got his present official service rating—"Second Class Seaman." In the last war, Humphrey was a real Navy Seaman, First Class. The sailors knew this, so to make him more matey they demoted him a stripe. Then they stencilled his rank all over his luggage, so that from then on, wandering around Army outfits, Bogie drew baffled looks from Yanks with that "Humphrey Bogart, Seaman Second Class" label.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Among the few sailing from Cannes, late summer of '38, were Don and Honore Ameche. We were ferried out to the Rex in a small launch, and all of us were parcel-free . . . that is, all except Don. He took the gangplank ahead of me and could manage neither his hat nor his bundles because of the swaying, to say nothing of his feet. By the time he'd reached the elevator in the ship's foyer, he had lost not only his self-composure, but what was worse, his wife. And as the elevator door clamped shut, he wailed, "My wife . . . where's my wife? I don't know what I'm supposed to do or where I'm supposed to do it!" And then, with his load threatening to follow the course of gravity, he moaned, "Damn it! Where is my wife!"

Mrs. Eleanor Thoresen,
Providence, R. I.

Luggage, by the way, was almost as much of a problem as those tricky expense accounts in Italian lira. When they flew (which was practically always), the baggage limit was 55 pounds. The bags were almost always getting lost, too, in the shuffle, and that was tragic, because they carried only absolute necessities. One necessity to Mayo was, believe it or not, snoods, and I'll have to tell a story on Bogie about that:

When they were packing for the tour, Bogie saw Mayo putting some fancy snoods in her bag. He blew up. "If there's anything more God-awful on a woman than a snood, I don't know what it is!" he yelped. He went pretty thoroughly into the horrors of snoods in general and practically promised Mayo he'd sue for divorce if he ever caught her in one. Just the same, when he wasn't looking, Mayo slipped in the snoods.

Well, one evening in a tent in Italy, as good as a million miles from a beauty shop, Mayo had to make herself as pretty as a lady can who has to wear long underwear to keep warm. The immediate problem was her hair. "There's no one else to do it," she told Bogie. "You'll have to."

"Me," shouted Bogie. "Me—do your hair—are you nuts?"

But Mayo was right. He had to do it, else she'd look like the Medusa or something with the rain and the mud and the marks of a helmet pressed down all day. It took a full hour of sweating misery for Bogie to play a grudging Guilaroff, and at the end he was a whipped spouse. "Why in the world didn't you bring along those snoods!" he yelped. You could see the guy was desperate.

"I thought you couldn't stand snoods."

"Snoods? Why, if they'll get me off this job, I'm crazy about snoods. I'm in love with snoods. They're my favorite articles!" Almost raving he was, so Mayo dug in her bag and brought them out. And she wore them all the rest of the time without a peep from Bogie.

But around camp shows, Mayo never let a snood or anything else hide her blond hair because she discovered that the mere sight of a blond female head was enough to make Yanks in Latinland swoon. "Mi-gosh!" they'd cry. "A white woman! A real, American blonde!" It was that way at the hospital, too, where it was hardest to act like a gay American blonde or anything else—where Humphrey Bogart had to be twice as gruff and hard-boiled to kid himself because that's the way a hard guy who is soft underneath always acts when he would like to bawl.

But inside the hospitals you'd never have guessed Bogart was a softie. In fact, those were the places where he wisecracked and kidded most. Nobody squirms under sympathy more than a soldier casualty, and Bogie knew that. He'd come up to a patient with his legs in a cast—hoisted up in pulleys.

"What you got there, soldier—a Rube Goldberg? Where does the mouse come out and ring the bell?" he'd crack. Or he'd see a Yank with a badly burned leg. "What's that—a new kind of hotfoot?" "Doc" Bogart they began calling him, the morale medic.

Well—I could go on and on. But I guess the best way to wind this up is to say that it was with a flock of memories that will never fade that the Filthy Four finally climbed aboard a plane in West Africa for the hop to America. All the Hollywood people they'd met overseas, Joe E. Brown, Captain John Huston, Lieutenant John Carroll and the other entertainers whose paths crossed theirs envied them, sighed wistfully and told Bogie and Mayo what to tell whom back home. And the G.I.'s, too, had a thousand messages to be delivered to a thousand scattered moms and sweethearts and pals.

Yep, it was a thrill at last to be heading home. The Army officers tossed a farewell dinner for Bogie and his troupe, and they had a big evening.

But when the plane took off, Bogie felt as depressed and low as a snake in a swamp, and he couldn't tell exactly why. Except that he felt somehow like he was leaving his best pals behind. He perked up when he saw the lights of New York, and it was swell to tear into a real American steak again.

And when he was back aboard the "Sluggy" at Balboa in California, resting up, he remembered something he'd read by William Faulkner about the horrors of a nation "playing host to a war," and he remembered, too, the Army kid overseas, who said, "The one thing I'm glad about this war is that we're fighting it over here and not at home!"

"You can say that again!" Bogie had replied. And now that he's back home, he realizes more than ever what true talk that was.

But while Humphrey Bogart is glad to be back on the job, he has a craving to get going again, too—that's what a trip like his does to a movie star or to anyone else. When you see it with your own eyes, you want to be a part of it, every way you can, or you don't rest easy.

So if Bogie starts packing again one of these days, don't say I didn't tell you. But he'll have to make a couple of pictures first. Just so he won't forget how.

applied while the first is still wet. Lucille (the impatient type) fixes herself up by applying one coat at night, the other next morning. She adds a third coat a day or two later. Not only does this glorify nails . . . but it reinforces them, makes them more shock-proof. Your choice is apt to go to bright, clear reds in polishes, but if you prefer a deeper shade, nothing should keep you from it. With a good topcoat, the manicure will last and last.

It's an artistic thought to team your nail polish and lipstick. And, listen, you don't have to be a Michaelangelo to do this. A bright manufacturer has done it for you. The set is housed in a gay green and rose-bedecked box, a real tournament of roses. It holds lipstick, polish, a base coat for nails . . . and, what's more, a wind-milled, blending face powder.

Polish Pointers. Conservation, you say? Well, suggests Bonita Granville, a slick idea to keep costume jewelry from tarnishing is to coat it with colorless nail polish. She adds that you should wash the pieces thoroughly before painting them with the polish. Protection is practically absolute. An excellent hint, what? Another brightie: Lacquer the tortoise-shell or plastic frames on your specs and sun glasses to match your fingertips. Polish doesn't harm the frames, and shades may be changed at your slightest whim with a dab of remover.

Hand Talk. For 1944 it's good-by to clutching claws, slithery nail-do's, hands flabby as goldfish tails or so stiff they resemble Charley McCarthy's. Hands aren't just tongs and prongs to work with. Don't be jittery, don't bite your nails. Use a dash of psychology on yourself. Treat yourself to a handsome manicure . . . you'll be less apt to gnaw at it. Perspiring hands often come from nervousness, of course, but you might try a little antiperspirant by way of local first-aid. When you want to pretty your hands for dress parade, try this fool-the-eye trick. Wear a little foundation cream or tinted powder base such as you use before powdering your face.

Conservative You. Six final pointers to save your precious manicure fixin's: (1) Keep bottles upright so polish won't leak out. (2) Find a cool spot to keep them in—the stuff will be good to the last precious drop. (3) Drain brush against neck of bottle before using, to guard against waste. (4) Wipe outside neck of bottle with tissue before screwing the cap on. If neck is clogged, the cap will not screw on tightly . . . polish will evaporate. (5) Use a colorless polish-shield on your nails to prolong wear. (6) To conserve polish remover: saturate cotton and press it against the nail for several minutes. Do this with each nail, before you begin the actual job of removing. Three "dips" of the remover should be enough to do a complete job.

Hand-some Ending. Follow these rules and you'll win, hands down, in romance. If there's any particular digit-problem or beauty puzzler that's fretting you, just scrawl off a missive with your neatly manicured hands . . . the solution's practically in the mail Address it: Carol Carter, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y. Good-by now, we've just discovered a chip in our own nail polish that calls for immediate action soldiers on motorcycles were drawing inevitably closer.

(STORY)

The wagon jarred over a dip, swept into the narrow neck of land that lay between the two wings of the forest and then curved sharply to the right. The sound of the motorcycles grew loud as they approached the forest-guarded bottleneck; then over the roar of the machines came the crack of rifle shot. One of the motorcycles careened crazily, its rider slumped forward over the handlebars and then slipped sprawling to the earth in the unmistakable, sack-like posture of the dead. Another shot followed rapidly; a third. The second rider seemed to stiffen in his seat; for a moment he raised his hands in terrible surprise to his blood-spattered face, and then, with a queer, jerking, convulsive movement, he fell, tumbling forward, rolling in a misshapen heap in the rutted dirt road. Finally, he lay still; still as the first, still as the dead.

A figure rose from the dark shaded forest. The dim light held and glinted very softly on the barrel of a rifle. A hand rose and waved and then paused to slip back the hood of the camouflage cape. Blonde hair tumbled free. The hand waved again; slim-fingered, feminine. A girl. . . .

Guerrillas!

Headquarters was the ruins of what once had been an ancient cloister. Here in the tumbled slabs, they lived and worked, killed and hoped . . . and waited. Underground, under the ruined building, the tiny rooms that had been the cells of the long dead monks, held strange company.

"Two Germans?" Semyon asked.

Sasha said excitedly: "Yes. I saw it. You should have seen them tumble to the ground like sacks of straw. She's deadly, our Yelena, she . . ."

The girl Yelena nodded wearily: "Yes, two. Two less now. Is Vladimir back yet?"

Something stirred at the doorway. They all turned tensely. Sasha was reaching for one of the guns stacked against the wall. Then the door opened, and the man stood revealed in the flood of light. He was tall, but he was built so broad in the shoulders that he appeared almost stocky. He was young, but his eyes were old, tired now and always watchful.

"Vladimir!" Semyon cried.

They sprang around him, and you could see it in their faces: the trust, the love and respect they had for him. They flung questions at him: ". . . what did they say at headquarters . . ." ". . . can we expect an attack soon . . ." ". . . what did they think of how we blew the bridge . . ." ". . . Yelena killed two today . . ." ". . . did you have trouble getting through the lines . . ."

The girl Yelena whispered softly: "I'm glad you're safe, Vladimir."

He didn't notice the presence of the strangers until later. One was the wagon driver, Dimitri, and he was simply accounted for: He wanted to join the guerrillas. But the other . . . Fedor the Blacksmith had found her slumped in exhaustion at the edge of the marshes, and he had slung her over his shoulders like a young deer and carried her back to the hideaway.

was propped up on the rude bed, and in the warmth of the fire, with the food and tea in her, the color had come back to her cheeks. She was a slim girl, somehow graceful even in repose; and beautiful.

"Your name?" Vladimir asked.

"My name?" she repeated. "Nina Ivanovna."

"Birthplace?"

"Tiflis."

"What are you doing here?"

"I lived in Moscow."

"Moscow is a long way from Tiflis . . . and from here also."

The girl said slowly: "I am a dancer, Comrade-Commander . . . We, too, tried to help in the struggle. I was with a troupe entertaining troops at the front. We were attacked . . . and in the battle I found myself cut off. I tried to make my way to Tula . . . but I got lost in the woods . . ."

"You don't belong here," Vladimir said sharply. "What can you do? Can you kill?"

"Kill? I have never—"

"Can you shoot a gun?"

"No."

"Can you cook? Can you scrub?"

"I am a dancer," Nina said.

"Unfortunately," Vladimir retorted, "we have no use for dancers."

"I'm sorry," the girl murmured. "If you want me to go—"

"Stay, then," Vladimir said. "At least until you are well."

So she stayed. And Mitya, who was only a boy, only 15, found himself suddenly, for the first time, in love. Semyon, who had been a professor in the days of peace, recited Pushkin. Sasha, Fedor, Dimitri, even Petrov, the silent one, followed her with their eyes. Only Yelena remained cool to her. Yelena and Vladimir. Vladimir rarely spoke to her; his dark troubled eyes were always distant. This was no place for a dancer, not here in the midst of war and death. And then the German soldier tried to escape.

They had captured the German and it was Semyon's idea that as long as he was still alive, to bring him to trial. "For the sake of all the dead," Semyon said, "for the sake of all the dead and living, too. Because he and his kind must answer for the miles of blackened earth, for the weeping mothers and the orphaned children and the children who will never know youth . . ." So they placed the German in one of the cells, awaiting trial.

Nina was alone in the kitchen when she saw the boots, edging forward slowly as a man in fear and caution walks. She watched stunned, stupefied until the German was in the room. He saw her and his huge, brute face contorted into a cold mask. He saw she was afraid. He came forward steadily, watching her, and she backed away from him until her back was against the wall. She was only a dancer. What did she know of how to stop an escaped prisoner? The German spoke in a low, tense voice. She couldn't understand the words, but the meaning was plain. He was threatening her, demanding that she make no sound. His great ham of a hand reached out suddenly and snatched a gun from the rack on the wall. Holding it, his face suddenly became arrogant. He gestured with the gun. Nina shrunk back against the wall.

Slowly the soldier began to mount the steps toward the exit. He climbed the steps backward, holding the gun aimed at Nina. Outside a voice called. Who was it? Semyon? Vladimir? The German froze on the steps listening waiting

MORNING FRESHNESS
Try This Tonight

IF YOU wake up tired and listless—if your freshness and "sparkle" are slipping away in the stress of these strenuous times—you should know this!

Thousands are drinking a cup of Ovaltine night and morning—for radiant morning freshness and vigorous days.

For Ovaltine is a scientific food-concentrate designed to do two important things.

First, taken warm at bedtime, it fosters sound sleep, without drugs. Second, it helps to build you up while you sleep. According to experts, two glasses daily, made with milk as directed, supply all the extra vitamins and minerals you need for utmost vitality—provided you just eat 3 average-good meals a day, including citrus fruit or tomatoes. In addition Ovaltine also provides the basic food elements absolutely necessary to rebuild muscle, nerve and body cells, and for vitality and endurance.

So why not turn to Ovaltine tonight, for better sleep and for morning freshness?

they weren't coming in. The gun in his hand held steady on the target of her body. If she called now . . . if she shouted . . . There was the sound of footsteps suddenly loud outside the door, and then softer and softer as they moved away. The German was motionless. When it was quiet again he moved up the steps. Reaching behind him, he pushed softly against the door.

Against the wall, her hands pressed tight against the stone, Nina felt something. Her fingers explored. A long thin barrel. A pistol. On the top step the German gestured with the rifle once. He had to turn to go out. Below him there was only a slip of a girl frightened out of her wits.

He turned . . .

She brought the pistol forward, squinting along the strangeness of it. The German was a huge, menacing danger. She brought the pistol level. And then suddenly in the moment when the door flung open and the sunshine poured into the room like a wave of light, she fired and the sound was enormous in the quiet room. The German half turned on the top step, the rifle swung in an arc, and then he fell forward, half out of the door, with the sunlight on his twisted face.

They came running, then, Semyon and Mitya. They saw the German and Nina in the room below still holding the pistol poised in front of her. It must have been Semyon who told Vladimir. For he came to her later that day. . . .

"I came to thank you," he said gravely. "It might have meant the end of us all if the German escaped."

"Thank me for what?" she said. "For doing what any one of you would have done in my place?"

"I know it must have been hard for you," he said softly. "It's not an easy business. Killing. Not even Germans. For some one like you."

She cried out suddenly, harshly: "I don't know. All I know is that I wasn't made for death. Whatever I did in the past I did for beauty, for life. And now—"

"Not you alone, Nina," Vladimir answered. "We none of us asked to learn this business of death. Meanwhile, as long as it is our business, we must learn to do it well. So for all of us I thank you again."

"Then I'm one of you now," she said.

He looked at her gravely: "You're one of us, Nina."

"And where you go, I go, too?"

"Where we go, you go."

"On the next raid?"

"Sometimes," he said slowly, "it's not only Germans who die. It's a dangerous calling, partisans . . ."

"On the next raid?"

For a moment he was quiet; and then he said abruptly: "Yes, on the next raid."

Easy Way to Ease Itch of ECZEMA
Due to External Causes

Here are 3 simple steps to take. 1. Don't scratch. 2. Apply Sayman Salve directly on affected areas. 3. Bandage lightly. That's all! See if this grand medicated ointment doesn't bring you the comforting relief thousands of others say it has brought them. Wonderful also for rough, red, chapped or cracked skin, minor burns, other skin irritations. Big 4-oz. Economy Size only 60c; regular 1½-oz. size 25c. All druggists.

of the automatic signal tower. Far off where the city was besieged, artillery flares burst against the dark night sky. But here it was peaceful; the peace of desolation. The Germans had passed through.

At the edge of the woods they paused, and Vladimir scouted the empty vistas of the single track. They were all quiet, waiting for his words. Nina lay flat at his side trying to peer over the edge of the sharp embankment.

"Yelena," Vladimir said, "the signal tower. You know what to do?"

"Let the guard train pass on the green. Stop the ammunition train on the red until the fuses are set. Then signal green."

"Right. Sasha, Petrov—guard. Semyon, Mitya—help me with the charges."

"And I?" Nina questioned.

"Watch and learn," Vladimir said. "That will be enough."

They set off quickly about their jobs. Vladimir worked hurriedly setting the charges under the ties. The night wind was sharp, cold, whistling oddly as it whipped the swaying tree-tops. Far off, dimly, they heard the sound of the trains, a steady clack on the rails, growing louder. They moved back toward the forest.

The armored train came first, and it swung down the track, traveling at a steady, swift pace. The headlight bore through the dark, picked up the signal on the tower, moved past into darkness again. Then behind, more slowly, the ammunition train pulled into the section of track. From the forest they watched the signal tower. The light blinked, flashed red. For a moment no one said anything, watching the train. Then they heard the sigh of the air brakes. The train ground slowly to a stop.

They worked swiftly then in the edge of the forest, setting the detonator. Let the guard train pass, they wanted the ammunition. Vladimir worked in silent, furious haste. Then from the left, somewhere in the depths of the forest, a volley of shots broke the stillness.

Without looking up, Vladimir said softly: "The light, Yelena, the light . . ."

Semyon said: "Bad luck—"

"There's still time . . . the light now?"

Semyon said: "Green. You can depend on Yelena."

The ammunition train dragged down the track, still innocent, still unaware. The sound of firing from the forest was moving closer. Vladimir wiped his brow viciously. Over all the rest now, they could hear the screaming whistle of the guard train as, suspicious, it began to back down the track. The ammunition train lumbered forward slowly.

"The engine's over," Semyon said.

They waited, breathless.

"Coal car . . ."

Then a moment of eternity.

"Now!"

Vladimir pressed the plunger home. Almost at the same moment they were up running to the saving dark. Dwarfing all the sounds, arching in a thick red blast against the sky, the charge went off; and then a moment later with all the sounds of creation, the ammunition cars blew.

In the forest the sound of firing was steady now. Sasha burst through. "Patrol . . ." he said. Vladimir spoke swiftly: "Separate, meet back at the hideaway." He took Nina's arm, his grasp rough: "Here, little dancer," he said. "You stay with me."

They twisted through the forest and burst back out onto the track behind the flaming wreckage of the ammunition train. Down the track now they could hear the hoarse shouts of a German patrol moving up. Vladimir flung Nina across

VITAL FACTS TO REMEMBER—
When Your Child Needs a Laxative!

Some Laxatives are Too Strong—

Forcing a child to take a harsh, bad-tasting laxative is such needless, old-fashioned punishment! A medicine that's too strong will often leave a child feeling worse than before!

Others are Too Mild—

A laxative that's too mild to give proper relief is just as unsatisfactory as none at all. A good laxative should work thoroughly, yet be kind and gentle!

But— EX-LAX is the Happy Medium!

Treat the Children to the
"HAPPY MEDIUM" LAXATIVE

Ex-Lax gives a thorough action. But Ex-Lax is gentle, too! It works easily and effectively at the same time. And remember, Ex-Lax tastes good—just like fine chocolate! It's America's favorite laxative, as good for grown-ups as it is for children. 10c and 25c at all drug stores.

A MOTHER'S DAY GIFT THAT SINGS...

Give a Canary
"The Perfect Gift"

She'll be delighted with one of these little songsters. So perky and cheerful, a canary is truly the living gift that keeps on giving . . . keeps on singing to brighten her hours. So, this Mother's Day, give her a canary, the only pet that sings.

THE LARGEST SELLING BIRD SEED IN U.S. ☛

ment rose sharply. Half dragging the girl, Vladimir clawed to the top, and then the two of them rolled down. They lay there breathless, silent, not daring to move. The patrol clanked past them: a voice rasped a hoarse command. They moved on. Vladimir's silencing hand was still over Nina. It was an eon before they moved.

"Safe now," Vladimir whispered.

She said nothing, but pressed against him, suddenly breathless. He looked down at her, smiling. He saw her eyes, caught in the moonlight. Then wordlessly, he drew her into his arms and lifted her face to his.

"You know now," she said fiercely. "You know now why I stayed?"

"I know now," he repeated.

"And you're glad?"

"Yes, I'm glad."

"And you won't send me away? Ever?"

Tenderly, touching the soft curve of her cheek as if it were some strange wonderful flower he said: "Never. Never . . . until the day I die . . ."

The blowing of the ammunition train was a turning point. You could feel in the heavy, storm-laden air the growing tension, the final breathless wait. So none of them were surprised when Vladimir told them it was only a matter of a short time before the real thing came to pass. A messenger was needed to slip through the lines to report back to Army Headquarters that everything was ready. Yelena went, because a woman would rouse less suspicion and would have a better chance of getting through.

She went, riding the piebald horse, waving cheerily to them as she started off down the road. But only a little later the horse, alone, came running back down the same path, and the saddle was tinged with blood. They waited desperately, cursing their helpless hands, until Yelena came staggering out of the woods.

Fedor doctored the wound. But they all knew. Even Yelena knew. She looked around at them, gathered about the rude bed in the ruined hideaway, and she said simply: "No grief, comrades. Revenge. We revenge death in Russia."

Nina stayed with her that night in the quiet cell-like room. But her life was passing as surely as the hours crept slowly around the face of the clock. She made no sound. Only now and then her eyes moved toward Nina, and Nina bent to wipe gently her parched lips with a water dipped bandage roll. With the hint of dawn in the sky, Yelena said softly:

"You will take good care of him . . ." she said. "Listen to me: he never knew my love. But I know he loves you. And that's a good thing. There is so much hate and death with us now that we forget how beautiful it is to love. Don't let him forget. Take care of him . . ."

"Yelena . . . Yelena . . . you will be well yet . . ."

"Listen again: he will need someone to take the message through. Do you know it? Say it after me now: Red 152, White 3, Yellow 57, Stop, Green 1,000 . . . Purple 55, Blue unnumbered . . ."

"Red 152," Nina said. "White 3 . . . Yellow 57. You will see, Yelena, Fedor says you will be well—"

"The message . . ."

"Green 1,000, Purple 55 . . . Yelena!"

But the girl on the bed who was too young to die didn't hear. She would never be tired again or in pain or in love . . .

Nina got through. She and Mitya made the dangerous trip through the enemy lines and back again to the hideaway where Vladimir and the others waited.

Vladimir said tensely: "What did they say at Headquarters?"

"I was to report to the Comrade Commander that the snow will fall tomorrow."

Vladimir said slowly: "Then it begins . . ."

They all knew what it meant. The long awaited advance of the Red Army was to begin. Their own attack must be coordinated with the attack of the troops. No more silent raids or sorties, no more hiding. Out into the open now, attacking with whatever force they had available. Vladimir spoke swift orders.

They were to engage the enemy in the open, make him believe that the full force of attack was coming from their direction. Then when they were overwhelmed, as they had to be since they were outnumbered, they were to fall back to the hideaway and make their stand there, holding the Germans as long as possible. Under cover of their flank attack, the main Red Army troops would be able to envelope the rear of the German troops.

And it happened that way . . .

With the dawn they crept out, and in the dim light the first guns spoke until the whole area was a mass of flame and fire. They fell back slowly. Petrov fell . . . Sasha . . . Fedor . . . Dimitri . . . Until huddled in the ruins of the hideaway there were only Semyon, Vladimir, Nina . . .

Outside the Germans were massing for a final attack. The grey clanking monsters of their tanks were drawing up. They still believed that they were facing a large force. They were moving cautiously. In the ruins of the ancient cloister the three of them worked feverishly piling their grenades, checking their guns until there was nothing to do but wait . . .

"Are you afraid?" Vladimir said softly to Nina.

"A little . . . I think . . ."

"There is still time to slip to safety. Semyon and I can hold here. One more or less would make no difference . . ."

"No," Nina said.

He touched the soft curve of her face: "So I have brought you finally nothing but death . . ."

"No," she said vehemently, "No. Not death. You've brought me life. What else can love be but life? And beauty? And all that is good? I'm happy now. Happier than I have ever been. If I die, I think I will die of happiness and not because of their bullets or their tanks . . ."

The heavy tanks were moving now. Semyon cursed and moved up toward the parapet that faced the enemy. They took their places beside him. It was only a little while longer now. From the East a flight of planes was polka-dotting the sky. It was going according to plan, then. They would come dropping out, the Red Army paratroops, but meanwhile . . .

For a moment Vladimir's hand closed on Nina's.

Semyon recited softly:

"The heavy hanging chains will fall
The walls will crumble at a word,
And freedom greets you in the light,
And brothers give you back the sword . . ."

The morning sun broke through the overcast of clouds, and for the first time, then, in all that bitter winter and early spring, the sky was full of light . . .

accompanying letter asked for suggestions, told them he'd like the names of any promising actors who resembled the types pictured in the drawings.

24,000 letters rolled in; Mr. R. had to retire for a week and look through all of them.

For the leading roles, he finally chose Tamara Toumanova and Gregory Peck. Toumanova, world-famous ballerina, former première danseuse with the Ballet Russe, literally let her hair down, went without make-up and played her entire role without once pirouetting on those million-dollar toes.

Gregory Peck is a recruit from Broadway, having served his apprenticeship in summer stock in Virginia before appearing with Katharine Cornell in "The Doctor's Dilemma" and Gladys Cooper in "The Morning Star." Tall, whip-lean, ruggedly handsome, he has a magnetic voice guaranteed to send shivers up and down feminine spines.

Entire cast and crew went on location to Utah, to a spot near Firken 40 miles up into the mountains above Cedar City. Producer Robinson sent the company there because the terrain and surrounding foliage most nearly resembled the Russian country south of Moscow.

An abandoned resort near the spot chosen had to be opened so the troupe would have a place to eat and sleep. No help was available, of course, so the 65 players and technicians had to take turns working as cooks, waitresses, etc. Supplies for the food department were mainly unrationed items—poultry and fresh vegetables—and were rounded up from nearby farms. On the train en route, the folks ate box lunches and drank coffee from thermos jugs, all foresightedly prepared by the studio so there would be plenty of food available to members of our fighting forces traveling the same time.

In one of the most moving scenes in the picture, Toumanova (accent on the second syllable, please) reads poetry aloud to a group of guerrilla fighters whom she has joined. Every man present falls in love with her, so eloquently does she recite the words; the poem is a selection from the work of the great Pushkin.

Word got around so fast that Gregory Peck was motion picture dynamite, producers from every studio were eagerly bidding for his services long before the picture was released. 20th Century-Fox won out and immediately cast him in one of the top roles of 1944, the part of Father Chisholm in "Keys of the Kingdom."

Another newcomer to pictures is Alan Reed, who is best known to America's radio audience as Falstaff "You Can Call Mother a Plant Tonight, She's Potted" Openshaw, the Bowery Bard of the Fred Allen show. Reed is one of the most versatile actors in the entertainment world today, was working for Alfred Lunt in "The Pirate" when the offer came for the part of the Russian Sasha. Lunt not only released him from his contract but made a screen test with him that executives describe inadequately as a "knockout."

ADD LINES: Toumanova was dubbed "Tee Tee" and called that by everyone on the set during production . . . Known to balletomanes as "The Black Pearl" because of her coal-black hair and olive skin, she is not particularly exotic in her personal tastes, doesn't know the meaning of temperament. Collects books on the ballet, some of which are written about her. Confessed the reference to her that was most thrilling was the chapter devoted to her by H. Allen Smith in "Life in a Putty Knife Factory." Almost never goes to a beauty parlor, does her own nails and hair.

Gregory Peck is a native Californian, went to school at La Jolla, attended college at the University of California. It was there while he was rowing for the crew of 1938, that he received a spinal injury that has kept him out of every branch of Uncle Sam's armed forces. Married, he is about to become a papa for the first time. Worries most about that and his Victory Garden which he inspects by flashlight each night when he comes home late from work.

VICTORIA THE QUEEN

late, on the afternoon of Thursday, March 2, Harry James walked in—a set of fine strain lines upon his forehead, a worried pallor across his cheeks. "Well?" said the pianist.

"She's gone to the hospital," Harry said briefly. "Let's get busy." He didn't add, "So that I can get out of here and get back to the waiting room," but that compulsion was in every move of his shoulders, every preliminary note from the trumpet.

It had started at noon. Betty had just finished unpacking the last coverlet for the cradle and had looked around. The nursery suite was a masterpiece. The walls of the main room were pale, pale blue, the color of spring robin's eggs, the blue of April skies. The baby was due sometime in April.

Set back from the main room was an alcove in which the nurse—just employed by Betty—was to sleep. That room was prepared with a moisture-proof panorama of bunnies, pink and blue kittens, pink and blue pups, and the bathroom was done in the same fashion.

The cradle was a handsome antique, an item for which Betty had shopped tirelessly for months. She had told her mother that it was a shame to cover so beautiful an article's intrinsic wood with a coating of white paint, but the doctor had recommended such a plan for sanitary purposes. Also (and they certainly think of everything these days) the paint selected was made of a vegetable compound which wouldn't turn the stomach of a young citizen who tried out sharp junior incisors on it.

The decorator, when planning the furniture, had joined all of Betty's friends in asking, "What do you want, a boy or a girl?" And Betty had smiled and answered, "I just want a healthy baby."

Yet when she and her mother had been shopping one day, they had seen an adorable, fluffy dress with a skirt all of six inches long and a chi-chi embroidered yoke. "Little girl's things are so wonderful," Betty sighed. "And I've always thought those mother-daughter outfits were the cutest things in the world."

When Harry and Betty talked about names, Harry insisted that—if the newcomer should be a daughter—he wanted to name her Betty. "No. One in the family is enough," declared the mother-to-be. "First thing you know it would be Little Betty and Big Betty. I think a child should have a name all its own."

Actually, Betty's name is Elizabeth Ruth, so a compromise was effected: The daughter would be called Elizabeth, but in second place. Her first name was strictly her daddy's suggestion. When Harry first grew to know La Petite Grable, the friendship had ripened on the set of "Springtime in the Rockies." In that picture, Betty's nom de cinema was "Vicki."

So they decided that Victoria Elizabeth would be a sentimental name for a young lady. Only by accident did the name happen to belong to two celebrated queens, and also only by accident did "Victoria" stem from the word Victory. As soon as the decision was published in columns—some time before the birth of the James junior—hundreds of eager fans wrote to the studio saying that the arrival of Victoria in 1944 might have psychic significance. It might mean that V day was due the same year.

But on March 2, Betty Grable James was only surveying the completed nursery and thinking that her new houseboy should be instructed to take the stack of boxes and tissue paper out to the trash-pick-up department. And she was wondering what on earth had become of the beautiful carrying pillow that had been one of the gifts received at a shower given for the baby-to-come.

The carrying pillow was to be used to transport the baby home from the hospital; it was to be used by the nurse in transporting the baby around the room during its early and fragile months. That carrying pillow was a very important item. And Betty couldn't find it.

She telephoned her mother. She said, "I can't find . . . Mother, I feel kind of funny."

"False alarm," said Mrs. Grable in comforting tones. "You've been working too hard on that nursery. You lie down and rest."

Betty tried to rest, but she had the distinct impression that large white wings were beating the air. She telephoned the doctor and described her sensations. "I'll be right there," he said. "And I'm sending the ambulance. Call your mother."

Mrs. Grable had been driving Betty's Cadillac convertible, so she gave the little grey car a quick ride from one canyon in Bel Air to another. By the time she arrived, Harry had also swooped in from the studio. Betty was loaded into the ambulance, the doctor and Mrs. Grable climbed in beside her, and Harry followed in the station wagon.

Mrs. Grable patted her daughter's hand. "We'll only be at the hospital a few hours, or overnight at most, then you'll feel wonderful, and you'll want to go home in another month or perhaps even six weeks," she said in the authoritative tone of one who has successfully produced two pretty daughters.

Betty didn't say much. She was too occu-

SUCCESS STUDIOS • BALTO., MD., BOX 895

They reached the hospital at two o'clock in the afternoon. The hands of the clock spread wide, only to tighten in a slipknot on another hour. Three. The noose loosened, then grew taut to snare another hour. Four. Harry had to leave for the studio. He hurried down. He hurried back. On the return trip he stopped at a florist's and ordered a bouquet, and his selection marks the thoughtful depth of the man. He didn't buy a boatload of roses or any showy blur of great flowers; he ordered a little old-fashioned bouquet set on a lacy paper doily and equipped with a sturdy handle. It was an offering of flowers that a girl could grip in her hand; something explicit of solicitude, something positive with devotion.

What thoughts flash through the mind of a near mother?

She might have remembered the baby shower given for her by Mrs. Zanuck—a shower to enrapture any girl. That day Betty had worn her favorite maternity dress—a blue gabardine made butcher-boy style with a starched overblouse. In it Betty looked like a plump cherub in search of a pink cloud in which to go wading. She was wearing her hair long, pushed back and perfectly plain. No ribbons, no bows, because that is the way Harry likes it best. Before she married, Betty had been wearing the high pompadour so becoming to most girls, but Harry—noting her rats one night—quietly threw them away. "Your hair is pretty enough without any additions," he said.

Mrs. Zanuck had planned a lovely table. The centerpiece was a cradle that, when pushed gently so that it rocked back and forth, played a series of nursery tunes. The guests took turns giving the music box a one-finger shove to keep the songs repeating. Above this cradle, on invisible wire, floated a flight of storks in bomber formation.

In the living room there was a huge, inverted pink umbrella—just the right thing to place over a baby's play pen on a summer day. Within this pink canvas bowl were piled such an array of presents that a casual observer would have said Canadian history was expected to be challenged in California. Mrs. Zanuck's gift was a baby set of bathroom bottles in crystal and a mother-baby set of bed jackets. Alice Faye welcomed the newcomer—who might well marry her baby one day, provided the sexes were properly arranged—with a high chair. Ann Warner's present was a sterling silver comb and brush set. Lynn Bari had hunted high and low for the play pen. And just to provide a brilliant divergence from the pink and blue of the party, Eve Wynn's gift was a pair of red suede booties.

While remembering these things, Betty undoubtedly thought of the kindly fan in New York who had sent two pairs (one pink, one blue) of bedroom slippers, two pairs of booties, two wrappers and two crib robes. Another fan had sent half a dozen hand-knitted soppers, and still another had sent a beautiful baby book.

During the months of her pregnancy, Betty's fan mail had gradually increased; much of it was from servicemen who congratulated her in one paragraph and told her in detail in the next about their own youngsters. In February, Betty received 90,000 letters—a little more than three thousand a day. This fact should eliminate forever the cherished Hollywood bugaboo that motherhood will ruin a star's career.

Like the wife of any serviceman who is expecting her first baby, Betty had continued to work until the end of her fourth month of pregnancy—in November. And she had gained weight—quite a lot for Betty. From a constant weight of 114

she advanced to the lush contours of 148 pounds. The doctor suggested mildly that she diet. Betty shook her head. "No—I'm hungry, and for once in my life I'm going to eat everything I want."

Betty has never had to diet, but she has always been sensible about what she ate—quantities of vegetables, much fruit, lean meat, very few carbohydrates. And with her approaching motherhood, she developed a terrific yen for waffles dappled with butter and afloat in syrup. She could eat them at any hour of the day or night.

But the night of March 2, she admitted that—for the first time in months—she was faintly curdled by the thought of waffles. Her mind did go back to the puzzle she had been working on just before she left for the hospital. "I wonder what on earth became of that carrying pillow," she murmured.

The time went by. Midnight. One o'clock of March 3. Two o'clock. Three o'clock. The doctor beckoned Mrs. Grable and Harry into an anteroom, "We'll have to perform a Caesarian section," he explained. "The baby's heart beat is growing weaker, and I don't think we should take a chance."

Like any mother, Mrs. Grable hesitated. She looked from the doctor to Harry. "I'm sure she'll be all right," she insisted. "She's so well and strong." But at the end of another hour, she gave in. She had a friend in the hospital, an anesthetist who had originally planned to take care of Betty when her time came, but Betty—having rushed matters—was deprived of his professional attention because he was busy looking after three other prospective mothers. Still, he did what he could. First, he reassured Mrs. Grable. "Your doctor is wonderful; he'll do a beautiful section."

He hurried away, then returned to glance from Harry's drawn face to Mrs. Grable's apprehensive eyes. "They've taken her to surgery," he said. "She's reacting very well." He disappeared.

The seconds ticked off. The door opened a crack, and the cheerful face thrust forward. "They've given her the anesthetic —a spinal block," he reported. "Everything is going fine."

Just ten minutes later, the beaming friend looked in again. "It's a girl," he said with as much pride as if Victoria Elizabeth were his own. "The doctor says that she has the prettiest body he has seen in years. Looks like you've got another pin-up girl on your hands."

Harry's face, which had been a fog grey, suddenly went glacier white. Then he swallowed hard, stood up and put his arm around Mrs. Grable. "Would you like to see the baby?" asked the friend. Fine question.

They followed him. Respectfully and in awe, they stood in an anteroom where the doctor was oiling the newcomer. Her hair was pale topaz, her disposition appeared to be drowsy, but cordial. "She's just five minutes old," said the doctor.

Learn something about your War Bonds from this fellow!

THE BEST THING a bulldog does is HANG ON! Once he gets hold of something, it's mighty hard to make him let go!

And that's the lesson about War Bonds you can learn from him. Once you get hold of a War Bond, HANG ON TO IT for the full ten years of its life.

You buy War Bonds because you want to put some of your money into fighting the war. But . . . if you don't hang on to those War Bonds, your money isn't going to stay in the battle.

Another reason you buy War Bonds is because no one knows just what's going to happen after the War. And the man with a fistful of War Bonds knows he'll have a roof over his head and 3 squares a day no matter what happens!

War Bonds pay you back $4 for every $3 in 10 years. But, if you don't hang on to your Bonds for the full ten years, you don't get the full face value, and . . . you won't have that money coming in later on.

So buy War Bonds . . . more and more War Bonds. And then keep them. You will find that War Bonds are very good things to have . . . and to hold!

Can't Keep Grandma In Her Chair

She's as Lively as a Youngster—
Now her Backache is better

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

When she was tucked away, Harry and Mrs. Grable left. Just as they reached the corridor, Betty was being wheeled back to her room. She was groggy, but conscious. Harry leaned down to kiss her. "Baybee!" he said softly. And he added, "We've seen the little baybee."

When Mrs. Grable leaned over to kiss her daughter, Betty whispered, "Now we can buy those darling dresses, Mother."

Elizabeth the second . . .

The next day, when Mrs. Grable went up to the nursery to peer through the glass at her granddaughter, she found an Ensign standing thoughtfully before the window. Without looking at the woman who had joined him—and he wouldn't have recognized her if he had studied her closely, anyway—he said, "That's mine, right there. Isn't he a husky guy? And that baby right there belongs to Harry James and Betty Grable. Pretty little tyke, isn't she?" Then his gaze returned to his chubby son. "Look at those fists," he said. "Maybe he'll be a trumpeter some day and take that little girl dancing."

When Mrs. Grable repeated this to her daughter, Betty smiled. "Vicki doesn't ever have to take dancing lessons if she doesn't want to," she said.

The little non-dancing lady was allowed to spend the 30 minutes between one and one-thirty each day with her dancing mother, and both seemed to enjoy the visit. One day Mrs. Grable brought to the hospital some baby pictures of Betty, and Betty, aided by a mirror, agreed with Harry and Mrs. Grable that the young Vicki was an encore of the young Betty.

Betty noticed something else with the use of the mirror. "My hair is all tangled."

But not until March 14th did the nurse get the last snarl out of the blonde curls. That was such an event that Betty telephoned her mother to convey the news. She also wanted to remind her mother that Harry's birthday fell on March 15th. She gave him six linen handkerchiefs.

"What would you really like for your birthday?" she inquired.

Harry delivered the line dead-pan. "A new car," he said.

"I should use a blunt instrument on you," opined Betty. "But I can't . . . because you're the father of my child."

And they exchanged one of those long glances that are forever the precious property of two new parents, deeply in love.

P.S. They found that carrying pillow. So Victoria Elizabeth travels in style befitting the namesake of two British queens and the daughter of a Hollywood queen.

LION'S ROAR
TWENTY YEARS OF LEADERSHIP 1924-1944
MGM

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

King Vidor, who directed "The Big Parade", the first outstanding MGM picture twenty years ago, now delivers to the same company, as an Anniversary gesture, his mighty production "An American Romance".

★ ★ ★ ★

This film is the flesh and blood story of the American dream come true.

★ ★ ★ ★

It's about a guy called Steve Dangos, a young immigrant who came to this land of freedom with his bare hands and a shining hope. (Brian Donlevy gives all his sincerity to this role.)

★ ★ ★ ★

It's also about a girl called Anna O'Rourke. Who shared in the struggles, the tribulations, the dreams of her man, as he made it the hard way, from iron mine worker, steel puddler, factory worker to great industrialist.

★ ★ ★ ★

While their story is intimate, personal, glowing, it is also symbolic of the fight, the love, the surge, the drama, that has made our way of life the wonder of the whole, wide world.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" is the big adventure, told in wonderfully human and exciting terms—in a robust screen play by Herbert Dalmas and William Ludwig.

★ ★ ★ ★

It is dramatic fiction. It is also the truth. For this story in its scope parallels the life stories of many men who have helped to make America great.

★ ★ ★ ★

King Vidor has found the movie material that many directors have been reaching for ever since the beginning of films. What he has done with it is magnificent.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" is photographed in perfected Technicolor. Red-brown earth tones of Mesabi; fiery reds and yellows of Steel Town; the bluish-gray colors of the automobile factories; the bright sky-blues of America's conquest of the heavenly skies above, follow in storied sequence.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" has caught the mighty cadences of the American dream. Something of you, yourself, is surely in it.

MOVIE REVIEWS

By Virginia Wilson

She meets mocking gambler Clint Maroon (Gary Cooper), and flaunts their love to humiliate family. Clint, finding she's used him as tool, flees to Saratoga, writes of rich Van Steed who's "ideal."

Abetted by servants Angelique (F. Robson) and Cupidon (Jerry Austin), Cleo poses as Countess, captivates both Saratoga society and Van Steed who hires Clint to rout gang that's seized his R.R.

Realizing she loves Clint, Cleo denounces fiancé, sees wounded Clint return with dying dwarf who saved his life. Cupidon mutters, "Boss" and sobbing, Cleo vows past is over, Clint's her boss, too.

Exotic Cleo Dulaine (Ingrid Bergman) returns to her native New Orleans bent on avenging wrong done her mother by Dulaines, to "marry a millionaire, become respectable."

SARATOGA TRUNK

■ THIS, MY FRIENDS, is really it. This is the picture that has everything—romance, excitement, humor, Ingrid Bergman, Gary Cooper. For sheer entertainment, it's the best bet since "Casablanca." If you had any doubts about la Bergman being the type to play the volatile half-French Cleo, forget them. She is perfect. She has even turned brunette in the interests of accuracy. Gary is lanky, Texan, and pleasantly humorous as Clint Maroon.

The story starts with Cleo Dulaine's desire for revenge on New Orleans society for its treatment of her dead mother. Cleo has come all the way from France for this revenge. Once she has accomplished it she intends to "marry a millionaire and become very respectable." Looking at the glint in Cleo's eye, you are sure she'll have no trouble with the former but you aren't so sure about the latter.

The first person Cleo meets in New Orleans is Clint Maroon. Not that Clint is Creole society—he's a gambler from Texas. Cleo deliberately picks him up. "A fine way to go about acquiring respectability," sniffs her mulatto servant, Angelique (Flora Robson). But Cleo has decided to use Clint in her revenge. When he finds it out, he leaves her and goes off to Saratoga.

From there he sends her

a letter one day describing the town's society, its money, its gambling, its eligible millionaires. One in particular—Bartholomew Van Steed. "If he wasn't tied so close to his mamma's apron strings, he'd be just what you're looking for," Clint writes mockingly. Two weeks later, Cleo arrives in Saratoga. But she arrives as a widowed French countess—and drives from the station with Bart Van Steed (John Warburton)! Clint can't believe his eyes, and neither can the rocking chair brigade on the hotel's long shady porch. The battle is on—Cleo Dulaine vs. Saratoga Society.

Meanwhile a real battle is in the making. Clint, working for Van Steed—and a share in the profits—has guaranteed to free the Saratoga trunk line railroad, Van Steed's property, from the Soule mob which has seized it. To tell you any more would spoil a superb climax, but don't miss "Saratoga Trunk"!—War.

P. S.

Warner Bros. drafted the entire Gombo speaking population of Los Angeles to appear in the French Market scenes—a total of 26 people. Gombo is the Louisiana negro's dialect of Creole French. . . . Also in the Market scenes is the first Razzy Dazzy Spasm band to appear on the screen. No, not double talk. It's a Negro band composed of home-made instruments. . . . For the first time in movie history, eggs laid by the performers were edible. The fowl used in the market scenes were penned on the stage at night. First person on the set each morning was the one to go home with strictly fresh eggs that evening. . . . All those beautiful fruits and vegetables were artificial—studio-made props. . . . Miss Bergman set a record by working 62 consecutive days.

BATHING BEAUTY

Remember the spread Life magazine ran on the beauties in this picture? Seldom have bathing suits been so well filled. Esther Williams, swimming champ, plays the feminine lead opposite Red Skelton, and her scenes in the water ballet are the McCoy. Red is as funny as ever, and that's very funny indeed. Nothing he says makes much sense, but you laugh like mad. He plays a song writer named Steve Elliot, who is in love with a beautiful swimming instructor, Caroline (Esther Williams). They are both having a blissful time in Mexico City when George Adams appears on the scene. George (Basil Rathbone) is a Broadway producer who is waiting for Steve to dream up some hot new songs. But Steve has been too busy sitting in the moonlight with Caroline to write any. In fact, he and Caroline are to be married the next day. "I'll fix that," George says grimly. He hires a pretty Mexican gal to appear at the ceremony with three red-headed boys, all of whom greet Steve enthusiastically as "Papa." Caroline is not inclined to be broad-minded about this, and goes back to the girls' college where she teaches, in utter disillusionment.

Steve, of course, follows her. He even discovers that the college charter provides for the admittance of men to classes and promptly enrolls as a student. That was one of those things that seem like a good idea at the time. It turns out to be pretty bad. The other students—all girls—as well as the instructors, gang up on Steve. He gets demerits at the drop of a hat. Any-

Evans' dog—Evans (Bill Goodwin) is also in love with Caroline. He is practically drowned by beautiful Glamazons during a swimming lesson. And he still hasn't written any songs for George.

On the other hand, the faculty hasn't found a legitimate excuse for tossing him out of college. Caroline, moreover, has given signs of thawing. But then George shows up again, and so does the little Mexican girl. There is hell to pay, until the Dean gets an idea. . . .

Besides all the bathing beauties and Red Skelton, you get music by Ethel Smith, Xavier Cugat and Harry James.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Strange torso model standing between the figures of Lana Turner and Hedy Lamarr in the Metro wardrobe department is that of Red Skelton. Red had to have female clothes for his part in this picture so designers moved his dummy to the women's department. . . . Red was a busy boy during production of "Bathing Beauty"—made 18 personal appearances in seven days, played to more than 230,000 servicemen and wrote his first book, "The Ubangis Will Win The War." . . . In addition to writing, Red found time for keeping up with his oil painting. Almost fainted when Ed Gardner offered him $250.00 for a Skelton original entitled "The Clown". . . . Made several thousand dollars for Uncle Sam by selling other paintings for Bonds.

THE STORY OF DOCTOR WASSELL

Probably you were listening to President Roosevelt the night he broadcast the story of Dr. Corydon Wassell. It was a simple story, about the kind of unassuming heroism Americans are famed for. It is still a simple story, in movie form, with a heart-warming quality of homespun courage. Gary Cooper plays Dr. Wassell with an almost casual, good humored excellence. The find of the season is probably Carol Thurston, as Three Martini, the young Javanese nurse. She's that beautiful.

Dr. Wassell, ex-Chinese missionary, was stationed in Java as a medical officer in the Navy. He is there when the cruiser Marblehead limps into port after a terrific battle. Wassell is told to take charge of the wounded. There are a lot of them, and they come from all over the United States. There is one from the doctor's home state of Arizona. Wassell is also pleased to discover an old friend from China, Ping (Philip Ahn), among them. "Hoppy" (Dennis O'Keefe), the boy from Arizona, needs a transfusion, and Wassell takes the blood from Three Martini and puts her in charge of the case. "Now we are the same blood, you and I," she tells "Hoppy." "We are for each other always."

Dr. Wassell accidentally meets a Red Cross nurse, Madeline (Laraine Day), whom he has loved since the first day he met her in China long ago. He gave her up then to a younger man, and he hopes she is happy with him. The doctor can't even talk to her now—he must get the wounded on a train for a hospital in the interior where they'll be safe.

Safe? Well, not for long. On a gloomy, smoke-streaked day a few weeks later, Singapore falls. With it goes the safety of all Java. Dr. Wassell gets orders to evacuate the walking cases to a ship for America. Stretcher cases are to be left behind. But Wassell won't obey those

With stubborn courage, he defies every risk, every moment of panic, with the Japs only a little way behind in the trek across Java. When you've seen this, you'll know why the President talked about Dr. Corydon Wassell.—Par.

P. S.

When F.D.R. told the story of Dr. Wassell during a fireside chat one Sunday evening, C. B. DeMille grabbed the phone at his side and officially registered his intention to film the life story of this man. . . . Thus he stole the march on four other big producers who waited until Monday morning to begin work on the subject. . . . Mr. Y. Frank Freeman, head of Paramount studios, made a trip to Washington to work out details of the picture with Navy Secretary, the late Frank Knox—also pledged a percentage of the profits to Navy Relief. Dr. Wassell was recalled from Australia to work with DeMille's writers. . . . Novelist James Hilton and an entire research staff were sent to Mare Island Navy Hospital at Vallejo, Calif., to interview every available wounded veteran of the Houston and Marblehead engagements.

GOING MY WAY

When they pass out the Oscars, "Going My Way" will probably corral a whole herd of them. Certainly Bing Crosby's performance as Father O'Malley, and Barry Fitzgerald's as Father Fitzgibbon are Academy Award material. The whole picture is handled with a warm, tender humor that makes it a delight.

Bing isn't the type you'd usually think of as a priest. But Chuck O'Malley isn't the usual type of priest. And when he first comes to St. Dominick's, old Father Fitzgibbon greets him with about the same enthusiasm he'd accord the bubonic plague. That's partly because reports have been coming in for half an hour of Chuck's progress through the neighborhood. There's the matter of the baseball that broke a window. And the street cleaning truck that came along just as the new priest was on his hands and knees in the gutter, looking for the baseball. Of course it's just bad luck that Chuck's luggage hasn't arrived yet. But it doesn't do a young priest any good to have to greet his superior in a sweatshirt marked in large letters "St. Louis Browns."

7 NEW SONGS... AND SINATRA SINGS 5 OF THEM!

ANOTHER OF THE GREAT RKO RADIO PICTURES

To Families and Friends of Servicemen: This is one of the films chosen by the War Department and provided by the motion picture industry for showing overseas in combat areas, Red Cross hospitals and at isolated outposts.

All in all, it's a wonder that Father Fitzgibbon puts up with the young man. Everybody says so—at first. Him and his golf clubs and his baseball and that crazy friend of his, Father O'Dowd (Frank McHugh). Furthermore, there's that independent little James girl (Jean Heather), who should have been sent straight home to her family. Wants to be a singer, she does, and Father O'Malley sits down and plays the piano for her. No hymn, either, but some song about "Day After Forever." A love song!

Well, old Father Fitzgibbon stands for all that. He stands for Chuck taking the neighborhood kids to the World Series. But when they start practising "Three Blind Mice" in the church basement, it's too much. He goes to the Bishop.

That's when he finds out what Chuck has been too kind to tell him. That St. Dominick's has been getting run down and needs a younger man with new ideas. The Bishop sent young Father O'Malley there to replace the old man, but Chuck says "Stick around, Father. We'll work this out together." And they do.

Jean Heather and James Brown make young love look very attractive. Rise Stevens plays, by an odd coincidence, a Metropolitan star. The entire cast is perfect. It's really a swell picture.—Par.

P. S.

Second picture for Rise Stevens finds her virtually playing herself in the film. Stevens fans will be thrilled with her vocalizing of the famous "Habanera" aria from "Carmen." When the picture was completed, Rise left for the Metropolitan to do "Carmen" for the first time in her career. . . . Bing, Lakeside Golf Club champion for three consecutive years, has his first chance to play golf on the screen. Golf scenes were shot at the Riviera Country Club in Los Angeles. The Lakeside Club, where Bing is usually found, is most always filled with movie stars. Paramount couldn't shoot the golfing scenes there for fear of including some famous name from another studio. . . .

THE CANTERVILLE GHOST

This is really tops in ghost stories. Wait till you see Charles Laughton as the spirit of Sir Simon de Canterville—he's really terrific. Sir Simon is a pompous ghost, pleased with his record of terrifying countless people into insanity or suicide in the centuries he's been haunting the family castle. He's an awful coward, though, which is just how he got to be a ghost.

Back when knighthood was in flower, Sir Simon was challenged to a duel. He was so terrified that he ran and hid in the castle. Papa de Canterville, furious at having his son publicly appear as a coward, walled Simon up in his room, and left him to die of hunger. He also put a curse on him, with the result that Simon has to haunt the castle until the day when some Canterville descendant shall perform a brave act in his name and release him.

Unfortunately for Simon, all the Cantervilles turn out to be cowards from then on. Finally in 1944, only one descendant is left—little Lady Jessica (Margaret O'Brien). She's a coward, too, or thinks she is, which comes to the same thing, and doesn't live in the castle. It has been closed for the last twenty years, but now it is to be opened as quarters for a platoon of American rangers.

The Americans are amused to find that "Lady Jessica" is a small, grave eyed little girl. One of them, "Cuffy" (Robert Young), takes a particular fancy to her. She tells him about the ghost but he frankly doesn't believe a word. Neither do the other Rangers, until midnight, when Simon goes to work on them. He puts on all his best acts, but the Rangers are not only unimpressed, they gang up on him and chase him all around the castle. The poor old ghost is a wreck by morning, and retires to the graveyard to brood bitterly.

Then Lady Jessica finds out that "Cuffy" is really a Canterville. He is also an obviously brave guy. So why couldn't he get rid of the curse that keeps Simon hanging around the castle? It's an idea, but there are complications, which . . .

Margaret O'Brien is wonderful—you'll love her. Bill Gargan is particularly good in a comparatively minor part.—M-G-M.

P. S.

The Santa Monica Uplifters Club played host to the biggest crowd of spectators in its history, day Charles Laughton took a ride on a delayed action bomb straight across the polo field. Scene was for the sequence where Laughton, as a ghost, guides a bomb by sitting astride the thing and directing its course. Bomb was actually tied to the back end of a Robert Young-driven jeep. . . . Next day Mr. Laughton was back on the studio lot teaching small Margaret O'Brien the fine art of cutting newspaper dolls . . . Charles sings in this one for the first time since his Gilbert and Sullivan days in London. He and Young sing a boogie-woogie arrangement of "Dirty Gertie From Bizerte" with Jose Iturbi eight-beating at the piano . . . Mr. Laughton adds to his list of famous movie speeches (remember the Gettysburg Address in "Ruggles?") with the ghosts' wistful soliloquy on the "Garden of Death."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

It was muggy and very quiet on that hill in New Guinea, and suddenly the air was split with thunderous applause—the surprise which the Major had promised the waiting soldiers was here—Joe E. Brown!

He looked very small on the platform down there in the valley, but even from their seats which scaled the hillside they could see him blush and try to brush aside the tear in his eye as he yelled, "Thanks, fellas, thanks a million!"

And then he went into his routine. All alone and with no stooges or music to back him up, he had the G.I.'s holding their sides with laughter, and when he was done, his voice changed, and you could see that what he was asking meant a lot to him. Would they sing "God Bless America?" Would they!

Maybe that song's been sung a million times during this war but never with so much strength, and hope and determination. A thousand voices ringing out against the lonely New Guinea jungles and, too shaken to join in, the little man with the big mouth, Joe E. Brown, his face streaming with tears, alone on the boards, remembering the son who would never sing again—killed while fighting for this blessed America.

If ever a man deserved a letter of thanks, it's funny-man Joe E. Brown.

MAKE YOUR OWN BED

The servant problem is providing a lot of material these days. The standard gag is to have a young couple (unmarried) hire out as cook and butler (married) for purposes of their own. In "Make Your Own Bed" this progresses into a combination spy-thriller and bedroom farce. Jane Wyman and Jack Carson are starred, and it won't tax your brain unduly on a hot day.

Walter Whirtle (Alan Hale) is the head of a gunpowder factory. He's a busy man and it seems to him that his wife, Vivian (Irene Manning), should be able to attend to the servant problem. Vivian tries hard, but the servants leave in droves. So Whirtle takes over. Instead of hiring a cook and butler, he hires a detective and his girl friend to pose as a butler and a cook. He tells the detective, young Jerry Curtis (Jack Carson) that his life is being threatened, his wife is falling for another man, and his gunpowder factory is in danger of sabotage from Nazi agents. He even, to make things convincing, invites some actors and actresses out for the weekend to make like Nazi agents.

Jerry is sure it's going to be a big case. When he breaks this one, he can get his own agency and marry Susan (Jane Wyman). But meanwhile, Mrs. Whirtle thinks he and Susan are already married. She assigns the new "butler" and "cook" to a nice room with a lovely view—and a double bed. Susan is very indignant and Jerry ends by sleeping in the bathhouse dressing room.

Unfortunately, he picks the women's dressing room, where two of the actresses turn up. Susan finds them, and all is not peachy. "Maybe," she suggests, "Mr. Whirtle made the whole thing up. Maybe he just wanted a butler and a cook."

"Ridiculous," says Jerry. "I have evidence that these are real Nazi agents." And darned if he's not right! The action speeds

Are You in the Know?

What's wrong with this picture?

☐ The rose is on the wrong lapel
☐ The Lieutenant is allergic to roses
☐ He's forbidden to wear non-military ornaments

Your rose may be as precious to him as a campaign ribbon. But—only military ornaments are permitted on an officer's uniform. Be sure about military etiquette! And to be sure of yourself, on "trying days" choose the napkin that doesn't show even under your filmiest formal. With Kotex, you needn't fear telltale outlines, for the ends of Kotex are pressed flat—different from other napkins because they're not thick, not stubby. Thanks to this patented Kotex feature you'll pass inspection always!

This type of coat is a good bet if you are—

☐ Pleasingly plump
☐ Long and lean
☐ A "pocket edition"

Shopping for back-to-school togs? The short box coat is just your dish if you're long and lean. It breaks your height, adds "heft" you need. Wear it with dash, any time. Breeze through "that" time, too—with the special confidence Kotex sanitary napkins give. For this is the napkin with the patented safety-center that keeps moisture away from the edges, gives extra protection exactly where you need it most. And with Kotex, there's no wrong side to cause accidents . . . no chance to make a mistake!

Then reverse. Mild exercise is good for you on "problem days." And you'll find Kotex different from ordinary napkins . . . far more comfortable. For rather than just "feel" soft, at first touch—Kotex stays soft while wearing. Unlike flimsy pads that bunch and rope, Kotex is built to hold its shape—to give you longer-lasting comfort.

P. S.

Irene Manning earned the admiration of her colleagues by being the only member of the cast who didn't succumb to the "flu" germ which circulated the set and put all the others to bed for a week . . . This is the first picture Miss Manning has made in which she plays a strictly dramatic role—she doesn't sing a note . . . The framed picture of a curly-headed blond child in one of the bedroom scenes is Jane's favorite photographic study of her three-year-old daughter, Maureen.

DOUBLE INDEMNITY

Do you read murder cases in the papers? Then this is for you. The story of "Double Indemnity" is a story that happens all too frequently in real life. Most murders, police records tell us, are done coldly and deliberately for money. This is an almost clinical study of the cause and results of one such murder. It will undoubtedly scare hell out of you. Barbara Stanwyck is sultry and spectacular in what looks like a blonde wig. Fred MacMurray is more convincing than you would expect as a murderer. Edward G. Robinson, as usual, walks off with the acting honors.

Walter Neff (Fred MacMurray) is an insurance salesman. One of the prospects on his list is a Mr. Dietrichson (Tom Power). But Walter meets Dietrichson's wife, Phyllis (Barbara Stanwyck) first, and that sets the stage for murder. Phyllis would like to take out a policy on her husband's life—a large policy. Without his knowing about it. Now Walter Neff is no dope. He understands immediately. He tells her he wants no part of that deal, and he thinks he means it. Till that night, when Phyllis comes to his apartment.

It would, after all, be simple enough to kill Dietrichson. Walter knows a way it could be done so that even Barton Keyes (Edward G. Robinson), the insurance company's crack trouble shooter, could never prove a thing. A way, furthermore, that would make the company pay a double indemnity.

So Dietrichson dies. The case comes to Keyes, and he is reasonably sure that it is murder. But proving it is another matter. Phyllis was probably mixed up in it, but who helped her? The only suspect is a young Italian who has been going around with Dietrichson's daughter, Lola (Jean Heather). Could he and Phyllis have worked together? Perhaps. . . .

Meanwhile tension mounts in the minds of Walter and Phyllis. How much does Keyes know? What can he prove? The tension flares into violent scenes between them. They begin to suspect each other of betrayal. The thought of going through life tied together by this secret is unbearable. And murder strikes again.—Par.

VAS YOU DERE?

Did your knees quake, did your mouth go dry, did you drool like your two-headed cousin from Squeedunk? Bet you did, but so what! Good personal contacts with our Hollywood stars are few and far between, and if you've ever had a really unusual encounter with one, well, for pity's sake, whaddaya waitin' for!! We're just as movie mad as you are, and when you send us in a terrifically tingle-y tale that we think the rest of the gang would enjoy, those five dollar checks just fly!

So, if you saw it happen—won't you let us in on it, too?

P. S.

Movie-goers will find some interesting and rare antiques in this one. Inside of Jerry's market is stocked with 1,000,000 ration points worth of sliced pineapple, chocolate, and solid pack tomatoes . . . Studio officials haggled with the Office of Civilian Defense for several days before permission was obtained to do night scenes in Burbank under dimout restrictions. After wading through yards and yards of red tape, bosses obtained the okay—shot night scenes with Kleig lights dimmed from above. This necessitated building special blinders and covers for the dozens of lamps. Two days after the scenes were taken, dimout restrictions were lifted completely . . . Story called for a scene at the Glendale depot. It was more convenient for the studio to shoot these sequences at Burbank. All of the Glendale Depot signs were copied and hung at Burbank for one day. Since the trains out of Los Angeles go through Glendale and then into Burbank, passengers were most confused to find themselves going through Glendale twice—missing Burbank altogether.

SENSATIONS OF 1945

Do you like the circus? Tap dancing? Hot piano? W. C. Fields? Swell. You'll find them all in this picture, plus Eleanor Powell, Dennis O'Keefe, Cab Calloway and Woody Herman. The circus is a sort of night club version of Ringling Brothers. It has a lot of the same acts, including the acrobats and the trained bears. It gets into the picture because Ginny Walker (Eleanor Powell), has an idea. Ginny, a musical comedy star, is slightly nuts about publicity. She even persuades her understudy to appear, mysteriously veiled, and shoot her during a performance. Just to make the front pages. Of course Ginny isn't really shot, but she cops a lot of space.

Her press agent, Gus (Eugene Pallette), thinks she was pretty clever to dream that up all by herself. But his son, Junior (Dennis O'Keefe), disappears. Junior thinks press agentry should be lifted to a higher intellectual plane. Gus decides to teach him a lesson by going away and putting Ginny in charge of the office.

That's where the circus comes in. Ginny gets a lot of the firm's delinquent accounts together and finds herself with circus material on her hands. Also a penthouse restaurant. The obvious answer is a night club called "Circus In The Sky," and it's a great success. Junior is silent, but annoyed. He's even more annoyed when Ginny gets a tight rope walker to cross the Grand Canyon, or its movie equivalent, for publicity purposes. Junior seethes. "Suppose the guy gets killed? What good will publicity do him then?" Ginny, it seems, has never thought of that. It makes her nervous for all of a minute.

She dreams up a lot of other bright ideas, one of which lands her in jail. When she comes out, she still thinks publicity is wonderful. Junior gives up. Maybe the girl is right. But her next scheme is definitely bad—he has to do something about that. That, you've got to see. Oh, I forgot to tell you. Sophie Tucker is in the picture, too.—U. A.

P. S.

Movie fans looking for missions and messages in their motion pictures will find neither in "Sensations." Acts were drafted from circus rings, jive spots, supper clubs and vaudeville acts all over the country and woven into the picture as part of the story . . . This is Ellie Powell's first freelance picture since leaving M-G-M studios. She was the first person cast for this show . . . Miss Powell worked for two months perfecting the dance routine she does as a whirling ball in a pinball machine . . . David Lichine, her partner in the opening boogie-woogie number, is a dance director engaged to supervise dance numbers for this film. He's a former star of the famous Ballet Russe.

ROGER TOUHY

Gangsters aren't very smart. If they were, they probably wouldn't be gangsters. Even a super-gangster like Roger Touhy was really stupid, as you'll realize when you see this picture. Touhy was the last of the big time mob. He is now serving a life sentence in the Illinois State Prison. Preston Foster plays Touhy and does an extraordinarily good job of it. He manages to look tough, venomous, and yet in some curious way, commonplace. A man who might have been a butcher or a factory foreman, but who chose to live by violence.

The story begins with the kidnapping of Joe Sutton (William Post, Jr.). Joe is a prosperous broker, and Touhy wants $100,000 ransom. The mob finally settles for $70,000, and Joe is released. When the police question him about the kidnappers, he suffers a sudden lapse of memory—as witnesses against the Touhy mob were apt to do. "I never saw their faces," he insists, but the police break down his story. The mob is arrested—Touhy himself, his right hand man, Owl Banghart (Victor McLaglen), Troubles O'Connor (Frank Jenks). The boys aren't worried. Nobody's ever pinned a rap on them yet. But this time things are different. One of the lads who was in on the snatch talks. Smoke Reardon (Henry Morgan) turns state's evidence.

So Touhy and the others go to prison.

NEW ENGLAND . . . The second in our series on the Regional Recipes of the Stars, brings you Sonny Tufts

■ If you were trying to decide on an actor who is "just the type" to play the part of a typical New Englander, I doubt if you would think of casting Sonny Tufts—the big, smiling "Kansas" of "So Proudly We Hail"—for this sort of a role. That is, you wouldn't, unless you already knew some of the interesting biographical details that we picked up in the course of a most entertaining afternoon spent with the Tufts in their present home—a fantastic Grecian house with black floors and teal and terracotta walls, out in Bel Air.

In this completely incongruous setting we discovered that the mercurial Sonny was born in Boston, that his family has lived in and around that city since the early 17th Century and that Sonny (who has never been called anything else, by the way) was originally christened Bowen Charleston Tufts the 3rd, if you please! All of which sounds very "Back Bay Society" indeed.

We also learned that one of his forebears founded Tufts College, that he went to Phillips-Exeter and then to Yale (although boys in the Tufts family were always supposed to go to Harvard . . . but then Sonny started out early in life to be "different"). Finally we discovered that, come August, this six-foot-four overnight sensation and his little wife Barbara will move to the new home they have just bought out in Hidden Valley—a typical New England farmhouse, complete with chickens and vegetable garden and a lovely big kitchen where Mrs. Tufts can proudly display the shining copper pans which she brought with her all the way from Rome.

Add it all up and you can clearly see why we were so happy to have hit on the idea of asking this particular young man to represent New England in our Regional Recipe series.

Not that Sonny himself attempted to tell us anything about the actual preparation of the fine fare that is traditional in the section of the country from which he comes! Instead, he confined himself pretty much to telling us what Yankee specialties he likes and then went on to advise us to get the necessary culinary details from Barbara. It turned out that Sonny's wife is both an excellent and an enthusiastic cook—the kind who loves to invent new recipes and to flavor sauces with wine, herbs and spices. But above all, she enjoys trying her hand at fixing up her husband's favorite dishes. So she was naturally able to speak with considerable authority about many of the tried and true New England treats for which Sonny has expressed a marked preference.

However when—as was frequently the case—Barbara was unable to supply us with a recipe which she knew to be authentic in its every detail, we wisely turned to "THE YANKEE COOK BOOK*". For this book is a veritable treasure trove of native New England customs as well as cookery, we learned. So much so, in fact, that it is accepted by New Englanders, everywhere, as the authority on the way food is prepared in their own home States. So you see you have double assurance as to the authenticity of the things we are going to tell you about Sonny Tufts' favorite foods.

* Edited by Imogene Wolcott, well known food authority. Coward-McCann, publishers.

Sonny Tufts, now starring in "I Love a Soldier," likes to watch his wife cook . . . always hangs around hungrily whenever Baked Beans are being prepared!

Being a born and bred New Englander, Paramount's new "find" likes to eat beans on Saturday night—in line with a custom which dates back to Puritan days.

Here, then, is a short description of the traditional treats that this particular "Yankee Doodle Boy" recommends and that we offer you in this month's free leaflet. When you get these recipes, you can serve Boston Baked Beans, Brown Bread and other New England dishes—made the way the Tufts like them.

Since Sonny likes highly spiced foods, Barbara uses a little garlic when preparing her beans. That suggestion is one to make any dyed-in-the-wool New Englander cringe . . . so we mention it here only because she did. However, many residents of the Nutmeg State (Connecticut) insist on placing a big onion plunk in the middle of the bean pot, while Vermonters argue vociferously in favor of using maple syrup instead of molasses as the sweetening.

Where the culinary controversy gets really heated is on the subject of Clam Chowder! "'To be or not to be' made with tomatoes, 'that's the question,'" declaimed Sonny with mock seriousness—before admitting that he, himself, emphatically belongs to the NO TOMATOES school of thought.

Indian Pudding, one of the oldest of New England desserts, is another of Sonny's preferences. For, although he usually likes to end up a dinner with cheese rather than with a sweet, he considers that Indian Pudding teamed up with Vanilla Ice Cream is "but terrific."

Also included in the leaflet is a cranberry recipe, since no New England story would be complete without mention of this fine fruit, first discovered in wild state on Cape Cod. Traditionally served in the form of a rich "Sauce" to go with roast fowl (incidentally we're also giving you the recipe for Barbara's favorite poultry stuffing in the leaflet) the Tufts' collection includes directions for a Cranberry Sherbet—just to be "different" again. Made with canned cranberry sauce—available the year around—this is a delicately tinted, delightfully flavored ice such as is served in one of Massachusetts' most famous eating places—The Toll House, of Chocolate Cookie fame. You have Barbara's word for it that the characteristically tart flavor of cranberries, in this colorful frozen delight, will be quite as welcome in the warm weather as it is in the Fall and around the holidays.

In fact, all these dishes which stem from New England deserve nationwide acceptance; so be sure to send for your copy soon.

"It's time you knew, Dear!"

When the time comes for little Garments to hear 'the facts of life,' it seems only proper to rely on someone who has—so to speak—been through the wringer.

So if Kitty Kerchief isn't learning the 'facts' about Fels-Naptha Soap, we've missed our guess on wise, old Auntie Slip.

Fels-Naptha Soap is a source of long and wear-free life for garments of all kinds. And for all kinds of family wash. This good, mild soap—blended with active naptha—turns out the whitest wash you've ever seen. It saves needless wear on fabrics because it makes harsh rubbing unnecessary.

If you haven't already learned the 'fact' that it's better to wash with Fels-Naptha Soap— it's time you knew, too!

Eventually Reardon goes, too—framed by friends of Touhy. He is murdered there. Then Touhy breaks jail. It's quite a thing, that jail break. You'll find yourself getting awfully excited about it. Split second timing, sheer brutality, and a sort of desperate, crazy courage make it a success. And the Touhy mob is "outside" again!

Now the FBI goes to work on the case. Roger Touhy hasn't the brains to cope with this outfit. He makes mistakes—bad ones. The FBI traces tiny clues with the utmost care. A torn paper in a garbage pail. An empty bottle of hair dye. A new customer at the local meat market. And so at last, in a thrilling climax, we see the end of the Touhy gang.

Vic McLaglen is fine as Banghart, the "intellectual" member of the mob. Frank Jenks and Henry Morgan are helpful, too. It's an exciting picture.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

More screen tests were made in casting the title role of this picture than for any other movie to come off the Fox lot. Preston Foster was finally selected because of his ability to give the impression of brutal purpose, not because of physical resemblance to Touhy . . . Production was greatly facilitated by Dwight Green, Governor of Illinois, and Joseph Ragen, warden of Stateville. They acted as technical advisers, granting permission to studio officials to reenact the famous Touhy escape. Even allowed the "shooting" to take place inside prison walls. This is the first time such photographs have been permitted.

GASLIGHT

Can you imagine what it would be like to feel that you were going slowly out of your mind? The cumulative horror of each additional bit of evidence—the picture you took from the wall and hid away in a drawer for no good reason, the letter you sat reading when there was no letter there at all? Madness creeping slowly, eerily.

In "Gaslight" Paula Anton (Ingrid Bergman) is indeed in danger of going mad, but it's because she is being systematically driven mad. And the person who is doing this, deliberately, cruelly, is her husband, Gregory (Charles Boyer).

Paula doesn't, of course, realize it, but from the first day they met, Gregory has planned this. His ardent love making was only a preliminary. Their marriage was part of his plan, and the moment they come to live in the gloomy old house in London which Paula inherited from her aunt, the plan accelerates. Perhaps if she hadn't found that faded letter in the drawing room, it wouldn't have been necessary to hurry so. The letter was addressed to Paula's aunt, Alice Alquist, who was murdered there many years before. If the police should learn about that letter. . . .

But as far as Scotland Yard is concerned, the Alquist case is closed. Unsolved. Only one detective is still interested. His name is Brian Cameron (Joseph Cotten) and when he meets Gregory Anton and his beautiful wife, he is more interested than ever. Something is very wrong with these two. Even their neighbor, Miss Thwaites (Dame May Whitty) points out that Mrs. Anton never leaves the house, whereas Mr. Anton goes out every night. None knows where. The plot against Paula's sanity goes on, but now Brian works feverishly to counteract it. There must be some clue, something that would tell him where to look. And at last Paula remembers. . . .

Ingrid Bergman was never so lovely as in this terrifying drama. Charles Boyer is both fascinating and sinister as the villainous husband, and Joseph Cotten makes a satisfactory hero. Spend your next free evening by "Gaslight."—M-G-M.

Clothes, chitchat, come-hithering, rebuffing—there's definitely an art to this canteen game. Here's how to maneuver the right guys your way!

■ Aren't we all leaving our hearts around at various canteens these days? Sometimes we leave it with the right guy. Sometimes with a lad who collects hearts like your kid sister collects autographs. And romance isn't the only canteen dilemma. There's conversation with strange men: How to make same? There are wolves: How to cope? There are—but you know all the questions. What you want are the $64 answers. Here are a few of 'em.

WHAT'LL I WEAR? Something eye-catching and feminine. A colorful wash dress with a soft round neckline and a full skirt. A checked taffeta skirt with a ruffly white blouse. A conversation-making print. Wear gay colors, rather than navy or black; they seem to go over bigger. And consider the back of the dress, for that's really the stag's-eye-view. The boys love sashes that tie in big bows in the back. Nice whirly skirts. Crisp, cool-looking jobs. Low but not too low necklines. They like light perfume that haunts them without practically blacking them out. And becoming make-up that doesn't drool all over their uniforms when rugs are a-cutting. They like stockings or leg-goo, but bare legs are tabu. High-heeled shoes, please, unless your little man is truly a little man.

WHAT'LL I SAY? You see this cute little sailor off by himself, and you long to chat with him, but suddenly you haven't a thought in your head. Well, just take your courage in your two little fat hands and give him your most Sunday smile. He'll smile

REWARD UNLIMITED

Just what is patriotism? More than just devotion to your country, it's acting upon that love, and in a way, maybe it can be a little selfish, too, 'cause country is you, yes? In "Reward Unlimited," Peggy Adams (Dorothy McGuire) is in love, but really in love. Even proposes to Paul (Jim Brown), a shiny new second Lieutenant, and suffers the ignominy of being turned down. Turned down, that is, till after the war. He's got his pride, and like a lot of the boys you know, wants to provide a home with all the trimmings for his bride. Peggy dries her tears and makes up her mind to do something to make that day come sooner—anything to bring Paul back. Through Mrs. Scott (Aline MacMahon) Peggy discovers the job that'll do it, and in a hurry. She enlists in the U.S. Cadet Nurse Corps. Peggy learns not only how to handle a stethoscope and a hypodermic needle, but also the satisfaction that comes with alleviating suffering. It's chasing bogeys for a little boy, it's teaching a wounded soldier how to walk on crutches. That's where the real thrill comes in, and you know at the end of the picture that Paul will come back to a Peggy twice as beautiful and respected as the Peggy he left. And it wouldn't surprise us at all if hundreds of you girls made a dash for the nearest hospital to sign up for the Cadet Nurse Corps, after seeing "Reward Unlimited." P.S. The uni-

Remember them dear, dead days when you'd pull an "oops-I'm-going-down-for-the-third-time" routine when you got a gander at that bicepy hunk o' man lifeguarding at your pet bathery? Well, them days are gone forever, and while our watery Apollos are off to the wars, it's up to us gals to play aquatic guardian angels. The Red Cross has announced that surveys of last season's femme lifeguard records proved that in many cases we gals showed a greater sense of responsibility and ability than the men we replaced—do you wonder they're all het up about getting more of us trained for this truly vital and oodles-of-fun job?

If you're at least 19 years old and have your senior lifesaving certificate, why not contact your local Red Cross chapter today and ask when you may join one of their 17 schools which will be holding ten-day sessions in acquatic first aid, accident prevention and life saving techniques from June through September? . . . just to make sure the WAVES don't get too many unsuspecting recruits. . . .

TO OUR READERS...

Today Leo is a lion. And today MODERN SCREEN is very sentimental. Read us and weep. Twenty magnificent years of Metro! . . . Or shouldn't I fuss so? After all, making motion pictures is a business just like manufacturing full-length woolen underwear is a business. All I can say is I remember my beautiful, beautiful young-love for Greta Garbo a helluva lot more tenderly than my first glamorous set of droopy-drawers. Pictures and stars somehow get tangled up in our personal lives. I used to stick pins in Jack Gilbert's picture just 'cause he had Greta and I didn't. . . . So, in this issue MODERN SCREEN looks back—with the help of Lolly Parsons, the best looker-backer in Hollywood. With due respect to her grand book, "The Gay Illiterate," the story of Lolly's 20-year romance with Leo (page 59), is the finest, sincerest Parsons I've read! . . . And while Lolly rummages in the past, Kirt Baskette (page 30) tells another saga. He tells the glorious tale of a gang of "phoneys," a gang of actors who went to war. Get a load of what Kirt says about those "phoneys," and you'll be proud that you have taken guys like Clark Gable and Jim Stewart into your hearts. . . . When you're all done with the issue, come back and tell us—have we a right to get sentimental over Leo?

Leo goes to war

By Jack Wade

These were the boys with the greasepaint and the lopsided grins—but there aren't any Kliegs over Berlin now and their only applause is ack-ack.

■ Bob Taylor got the news at breakfast that morning. He snatched an official looking envelope out of the usual stack beside the toaster, ripped it open with shaky fingers and then let out a whoop—"Woweee!"

That brought Mrs. Robert Taylor tumbling downstairs, out of breath and ready to call the cops, the fire department or the Beverly Hills senior air raid warden. She didn't know for sure just what, but she didn't have to hold her breath long.

"Look—it says here—hey—I'm in! I'm in the Navy!"

Barbara Stanwyck eyed her handsome husband with a very happy grin. "You know what you are, Bob Taylor, don't you?" she said with just a touch of envy.

"Sure, I'm a lieutenant, junior grade, U. S. Naval Aviation Reserve, or darned (Continued on page 32) soon will be," began Robert Taylor. "I'm—"

"That's wonderful," said his wife, "but it's not exactly what I mean. Bob Taylor, you're the luckiest guy in this world, that's what you are!"

Lieutenant (j.g.) Robert Taylor seconded the motion that very morning and has ever since he joined the double dozen other Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer stars who have traded make-up kits for service gear and snagged the biggest starring parts they ever played in their lives. Leo the Lion's litter of fighting cubs, some 1100 of them, pepper with stars the big service flag that waves over the studio at Culver City. They're not all movie stars by a long shot—they're grips and props, gaffers and errand boys, gatemen and secretaries, too. But there are plenty of dog tag numbers in the Army and Navy, Coast Guard, Marines, Air Corps that only yesterday were names that packed a box-office punch from Boston to Bombay, and back again—names like Clark Gable, James Stewart, Melvyn Douglas, Van Heflin, Bob Montgomery, Jean Pierre Aumont, Bill Lundigan, John Carroll, Richard Carlson, Lew Ayres. And Barbara Stanwyck might have been speaking right up for the whole bunch when she told Bob Taylor, "You're lucky!" That's the way every one of them feels about it—this biggest bunch of big stars to ditch any Hollywood studio flat and duck the glamour spotlight for service obscurity and, incidentally, to trade fancy four-figured Saturday night checks for Uncle Sam's modest payroll.

All of them left their homes and their jobs just like Joe American, grimly and eagerly, to do a rugged job. And all of them are doing it in a way that has made the world breathe a soft whistle of respect, because, when war broke, eyes burned down on Hollywood male stars with a new and critical intensity. Two strikes went up against Hollywood stars at the start. They were swell at make-believe—sure—but what about the real thing? Were they men or just pretty shadows? Could they take it? Could they come down off their Hollywood pedestals and buddy with the boys?

Even service men, soldiers and sailors, looked at them with a skeptical cocked eye at first—but they don't any more. You earn what you get in Uncle Sam's league. (Continued on page 105)

Van Johnson

By Kirtley Baskette

The 5 bucks worth of nickels didn't jingle long and the brown brogues were scuffed—but they carried him on to make S. R. O. history!

■ Van Johnson surveys a Hollywood future today as bright as his shining red-gold hair. Starred at last in "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo" after making hits out of bits on his own sunny ability, Van's star is at last high in a cloudless Hollywood sky.

But it wasn't always that way. Van is where he is today because he had a stubborn faith in himself, and could answer "I'll do it!" to every tiny opportunity that knocked.

Born of serious, industrious Swedish immigrant parents in snooty Newport, R. I., summer kingdom of Astors, Vanderbilts, and high Society's Four Hundred, Van fought as a kid against stuffy conservatism and severe frowns on his dreams of becoming an actor. He was patronized as a "town native" by the rich kids and even at home, where a family separation left him motherless at three. He had kindness and care from his thrifty, cautious father and aging grandmother—but no sympathy with his eager desire to act.

Sports-loving Van relaxes after a day on "30 Seconds Over Tokyo" set. He's on "I'll take one o' dem and one o' dose" dressers, so he's grateful for recent costume (intern, aviator, etc.) pix.

Van set record by returning to work after illness in 8 weeks instead of expected 12 mos. Big break came when he went on with ptomaine after lead he understudied in "Too Many Girls" fell ill.

Spence Tracy was so impressed with Van in "A Guy Named Joe," he introduced himself on set, proceeded to rave. V. J. is thrilled he's finally met Bette D. whom he's hero-worshipped for years.

his school work and heavy chores, spunkily grabbing every chance to try himself in school, church and town shows. He drank inspiration from Newport's summer theater, the Casino, where Broadway stars spent "the season" from vaudeville, the Provincetown circus, and particularly the movies at the local Bijou, where he became Newport's champion all-out movie fan. Naturally shy and unassuming, Van made himself loved by everyone, and at Rogers High School where he played football, basketball, sawed a violin in the school orchestra, and drum-majored the band, he won "the most popular contest" and carried on romances with Newport's prettiest town girls.

But his frantic activities made his studies slip, and high school days over, Van felt unprepared for Brown College and unenthusiastic about the legal career his father had planned for him. Confused, he took a job frying clams in a highway drive-in restaurant and there met Lois, a Newport girl who had been away to school, traveled in Europe and knew her way around so well, that, sensing his mixed-up dreams and frustrations, she told him off straight from the shoulder.

"Get out of this town," she said. "Go to New York and get a job on Broadway. Follow your dreams, or you're lost!"

"I'll do it!" replied Van impulsively. Next day, he left Newport with a new suit, a wicker suitcase, five dollars cash and his father's frowning disapproval. But Van Johnson's hopes were on wings. He knew he was on his way—but where?

* * *

Van was nineteen when he left home, determined to show Broadway he had what it takes. And he was as theater-green as the plush (Continued on page 98)

A dyed-in-the-wool sentimentalist, trouper Van is drooling over prospect of doing "Oklahoma!" with Judy G.

Van's a real water baby, loves to be near oceans, is tops in acquatic sports. (With cute G. De Haven, in "Two Sisters and A Sailor.")

Two and half weeks after her trip, she and Burgess Meredith eloped to Tiajuana, Mex. Bugs, now an Air Corps Captain, has just returned from overseas. Left H'wood in '42 as Army private.

For six weeks Keenan Wynn, Paulette, accordian man Andy Arcari and rest of the troupe existed entirely on C-rations. "That's what did it!" bemoans Paulette of her added eight pounds!

"miss precious cargo"

That's what she is in Chinese radio code. But to the lonely Yanks in Asia, she means glamour, home . . . Goddard!

■ Everything was quiet. Too quiet—you could hear the mosquitoes buzzing angrily against the netting around the cot. Away to the South, a scout plane zoomed off toward Jap-held territory. And in the corner of the tent something moved . . .

Paulette sat up and grabbed her flashlight. Its yellow glow caught the thing in the corner, and she gave the little shudder that the sight of rats always evoked. She ought to be used to them by now, after two months of this trip, but she just wasn't. She hated them! And this was a really enormous one, with horrible fiery eyes. It slithered around the tent, trying frantically to get away from the light. Suddenly it popped into the water bucket. There was a splash.

"Wonderful!" Paulette thought and started to relax. The creature would drown. But the splashing continued. Come to think about it, there were water rats, weren't there? That lived in the water! Maybe this was one of them. Maybe this awful rodent would swim around and around all night!

"I won't think about it," Paulette said out loud, in a firm voice. "I'll think about the show tonight instead. It went over very well, considering the rain . . ."

It had gone over well. But it always did. These kids were starved for entertainment. They had been out here in India so long, and they hadn't even seen a white woman for months, let alone anyone who looked like Paulette Goddard. If the show had consisted of nothing but Paulette walking on stage and walking off again, they would still have loved it. But it didn't. It was a complete USO Camp show, with Bill Gargan and Keenan Wynn for comedy, and Andy Arcari playing the accordion and singing. It was fast and funny and gay.

Tonight the rain hadn't kept the audience from getting there hours early, as usual. They'd sat around in the downpour from six to (Continued on page 91)

On May 3rd, troupe landed in New York after 38,000-mile trek through 15 countries. Eleven weeks without one, a bubble bath was Paulette's first objective!

kelly is the name!

By George Benjamin

The cocky grin's from Eire and the home-grown corn's from hunger—but when he makes like Nijinsky you know it's genius flashing.

■ At the Hollywood preview of "Cover Girl," when Gene Kelly's amazing dance ended, and one of the biggest thunders of applause any Hollywood star has ever earned died down at last, an expert on the dance turned to his companion in the audience.

"That's the greatest dancing since Nijinsky!" he said.

Gene Kelly didn't hear that remark, until somebody passed it on to him. Then he was pleased, but not as thrilled as he might have been. Gene had his big thrill weeks before when he saw the complete rushes of the part in that picture that was to make him famous.

He'd dreamed about and planned the dance himself, argued with studio technicians who said it couldn't be done, plugged for it 'gainst the advice of half of Hollywood, worked it out painstakingly through tedious, weary weeks. It was his baby, and a million tiny things could have wrecked it along the way. But at last it was over, and the results were right there on the screen, and perfect.

Gene sat through it all in silence. Then he strolled out of the dark projection room at Columbia Studios. He didn't say anything, but he felt swell. The cameraman who shot it followed him out. "Gene," he said, "Congratulations! The public will love that dance." And the public did.

Hollywood had never seen a dance like the one Gene did in "Cover Girl." And Hollywood has never seen anything exactly like Gene Kelly, either, not for a good many years. He's a perfectionist, an artist from the tips of his flashing toes to his sparkling black eyes and inky hair. He's a guy who knows what he wants to do and how to do it and who says what he thinks, without any helping of hooey.

duchess on wheels

Duchess Garson! You should see her chugging uphill on a bike or slithering through a rumba.

By Nancy Winslow Squire

"Mrs. Parkington" required weeks of make-up and costume tests, 36 wardrobe changes, hours of hair-styling. Greer, who's always wanted to be brunette, stuffs taffy hair under black wig for pic.

■ One of the most astonishing things that happens to an able actor is the conclusion reached by the public mind that the actor is actually very much like the characters he or she portrays on the screen. Boris Karloff (born British Henry Pratt) has gone through professional life scaring the daylights out of children he meets on the street, much to his chagrin. Bogart, a cinematic toughie, is frequently embarrassed by the willingness of perfect strangers to engage him in fisticuffs.

And Greer Garson, the gentle, spiritual Mrs. Chips, the mature Mrs. Miniver, and the scholarly Madame Curie of films, sometimes finds herself catalogued as austere, aloof and distinctly the Grand Duchess.

This aura of dignity and elegance bothers Greer Garson. She is, with the protocol scraped away, a high-spirited red-head who likes to rumba, to go cycling, to romp with her dog and to exercise her sense of humor in scintillating wise cracks.

She is both astoundingly young and unnecessarily beautiful. There is no sense in one woman having such an array of talents. Perhaps it is Nature's way of levying a tax upon Miss Garson, by making her seem to strangers somewhat august.

One afternoon recently, a resident of a quiet street in Beverly Hills was standing at the front window conning the activities of the neighborhood, when a cycling pair rolled past. The man was long-limbed, mustached and dark. The girl was wearing a faded bandana from beneath which escaped a few carroty curls; her shorts were rough blue ticking, her shirt was open at the throat and her feet were encased in weary sneakers. "It's Greer Garson and Richard Ney!" gasped the householder, shouting to her daughter.

"You're seeing things," the younger generation dismissed the suggestion. "I can't imagine Greer Garson on a bicycle."

■ Nothing's happened to Judy since she got back from her bond tour. Nothing but work. She started right in on "Meet Me in St. Louis," and she's been at it ever since. Nothing's happened to write a story about—

She just gets up and works from 9 to 6 with an hour for lunch, and who wants to hear about that? Dorothy, the maid, gets her up with orange juice. Hands it to her and ducks, Judy not being the type who leaps lightly from slumber, trilling, "Oh, what a beautiful morning!" By the time she's showered and dressed, life begins to look possible. In knee-length skirt and sweater, moccasins and long socks —to keep her legs warm—she's ready for her truck driver's breakfast. Bacon and eggs and coffee and jam and five slices of toast. The way she eats, she should be a baby Kate Smith. But she works it off—

"ONE PUNCH" LUNDIGAN

Well, maybe not one punch—but the only time Bill ever threw in the towel was after a bout with some haymaking fudge!

Marine G. I. Bill has phobia against memorizing song lyrics, learned "Holy Night" as choir boy, is now wrestling with "Mother Machree." He insists all his lucky breaks pan out on 15th of any month.

■ Uncle Bill O'Brien was always Bill Lundigan's hero. Uncle Bill had been a Marine in the first world war; true, he hadn't been lucky enough to get across, but he had been through the rigorous Marine training, and he was thoroughly indoctrinated with Marine lore. Nephew Bill used to don Uncle Bill's service topcoat and strut around. The coat was so big that it trailed the floor, and the shoulders were so wide that they hung to junior elbows, lowering sleeves far beyond the most ambitious stretch of young fingers, but the aura was there: the excitement of the uniform and the esprit de corps.

Young Bill learned to offer his rifle for Inspection Arms, and he learned the other side of the ritual, too—the officer's responsibility. He learned the Manual of Arms, and he learned to march and salute like a true devil-dog. "Some day," he told his uncle, lower lip thrust forward solemnly, "I'm going to be a Marine, too."

"God grant that it isn't necessary for you to fight another war," said Uncle Bill.

But in June, 1942, Bill Lundigan—rising young Hollywood actor—paced the floor one night, then turned to his father, Mike Lundigan. "I think I'm going to join the Marines if they'll have me," he said. It had always been his habit to talk over any move with his father and mother; he always considered their wishes; he always deferred to their judgment. And they, in turn, gave him—and his three brothers—wide rein. They let their sons think for themselves.

Still, when the question of joining a combat outfit as rugged as the Marine Corps was raised, Mr. Lundigan—like every father on earth—hesitated. "The studio wants to defer you for a few more pictures, Bill," he reminded his son. "Maybe you can serve just as well behind the camera as behind the gun. Each of us has his own abilities and has to use them in his best way. Why not wait until you're drafted?"

"You wouldn't mind if I joined up, would you?"

Mr. Lundigan shook his head slowly. "That you'll have to decide for yourself."

So, before you could say (Continued on page 95)

As Time Goes By . . .

Some loved it, some left it—the acclaim and heartbreak these Metro stars knew as the First Men and Ladies of Hollywood.

Starting out as film cutter, Myrna Loy got first pic job through Rudy Valentino, became famous as sultry Orienta siren. At M-G-M, Producer Arthur Hornblow Svengali-d her into more sympathetic roles, married her 4 years later

When Norma Shearer started out on her career at 14, she came to N. Y. on funds from sale of family piano, lived on ragged edge of nothing posing, playing in movie houses. Years later at M-G-M, married gen'l prod. mgr. Irving Tholberg, made film-history with him.

Wally Beery's life is more drama-packed than any film. Ran away in 4th grade, worked as riveter, elephant boy, chorus boy. Made and lost fortune in '29 crash, staged comeback, won Oscar for "The Champ" with Jockie Cooper.

The Sinatro of H'wood plush era, John Gilbert was idolized by millions of mature, otherwise level-headed women. Reached peak in "The Big Parode" with Rene Adoree. Divarced 3 times, he courted Garbo who, when he hit skids due to odvent of sound, gave him boost.

Garbo's first Swedish film was comedy in which she whacked lead aver head with a fish. When Louis B. Mayer brought her and director Stiller to U.S., she was a gongly 16, unable to speak a word of English. Our Yankee enthusiasm sent her inta shell of silence.

her 50's, down and out after o life on stage, Marie Dressler ld reporters she was just a tired old waman whom nobody nted. Little did she know that ahead of her wos "Anna hristie" with Garbo and an Oscar on her 60th birthday!

Unlike brother John, Lionel Barrymore was stable, amiable, o devoted husband. When Jahn was down and out, he brought him to H'wood, cared for him, got him job. Won Oscar for "A Free Soul." Due to crippling arthritis plays Dr. Gillespie role from wheelchair.

As Time Goes By . . .

One of the greatest love affairs was Bill Powell's with Jean Harlow. Heartbroken over her death, he went into seclusion for 2 years after, seriously ill. Bathroom scene in "The Thin Man" with Minna Gombell became famous.

Clark Gable picked up dramatic training by working as call boy, tool hand, tramp, lumberjack, mule driver in Oregon hop fields. A terrific screen lover, he played with Joan Crawford in "Chained."

The immortal Jean Harlow will always be remembered as the vivacious Platinum Blonde, with the memory of her courage and gaiety obliterating the tragedy of her 2 unhappy marriages and the horror of Paul Bern's still unexplained suicide.

At one time former hubby Fritz Mandl spent millions trying to control all the prints of 17-year-old Hedy's "Ecstasy." It's still being bootlegged around, and she's had a stiff fight overcoming that publicity!

When Katie Hepburn was cast opposite Tracy, she asked, "Aren't you kind of short to play opposite me?" He replied "I'll cut you down to my size!" He copped 2 Academy Awards for "Boys Town" and "Captains Courageous."

Back in "the old days", the little red schoolhouse was a hothouse for budding genius with those enfants terribles, Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland, twitting La Turner, "How much are 2 and 2, Lana?" Execs are still mourning "How sad I am" after releasing Deanna.

Lowest ebb of Judy Garland's life came when Deanna D. went on to Univ. to become a star, while she was left sitting! Her first love was Mickey Rooney. It all started with blackface routine in "Strike Up the Band."

When Jimmy Stewart was senior at Princeton starring in commencement play with guesting Maggie Sullavan, your editor Al was freshman lugging props backstage. After graduation, Stewart got first stage role thru college contact. Hit top in "Philadelphia Story" with Hepburn.

Maria Montez

Jean Pierre Aumont

By Struthers Holt

Waiting for Jean Pierre

"Say my name as she says it—and 9000 miles away Maria dreams and murmurs "Hon Pierre, Hon Pierre." . . .

← Lt. Ahh-mont, now with his old motorized unit, is wearer of Croix de Guerre for bravery in 1940. Learned English from Whorf, Lorre, Calleia on set of "Cross of Lorraine."

■ Everywhere, all over the world, there are women waiting for letters; the rich and the poor, the married and the single, the obscure and the famous . . . waiting for the clink of the metal postbox cover, or the postman's brisk whistle to say that word from the beloved has arrived. Hollywood is no different from Tempe, or Yellow Creek, or Cherrytown.

And in Hollywood, after the long make-believe day is done, Maria Montez sheds her glamorous trappings and waits for letters from Jean Pierre Aumont.

After such war letters are received, they are stored in some secret or tender place, to be read and reread by women everywhere. Sometimes they are tied with blue ribbons, sometimes they are penciled with the date of receipt and carefully filed in a dresser drawer or in any of the little secret niches women reserve for their most precious belongings. As for Maria, she stashes her letters away in an old shoe box with her favorite ones tumbled in on top because they are reread more frequently than the others.

While wives wait for letters and the war's end, they find various ways of passing the long time. They work in aircraft factories or munition plants, they teach school, or work in the telephone exchange, or operate a busy typewriter—Maria acts. When she is between pictures, as she is now at Universal, having completed "Gypsy Wildcat" and not yet scheduled to go to work in "Bowery to Broadway," she busies herself in other ways.

For one thing, she is writing a book. It is now nearly finished and Maria is hopeful that it may be on the spring lists. She is uncertain whether the title will be "The Sin of Sins" or "Among the Shadows," but those to whom she has told parts of the story, say that it is a delicate and sensitive chronicle of a beautiful girl in love.

In wartime, it is easy for women to believe in such a love story because a ghost is nothing but a dream—a projection of the mind—and sometimes a man long (Continued on page 126)

Susy-Q

It came mighty close to being "Calling Dr. Carnahan"—but whatcha' gonna do when they team you with Taylor and Colman—and there's Quine makin' with the cracks?

■ Susan wanted to be a doctor. She was going to Pomona for pre-medical work and needed all the points she could roll up. So in senior year at Hollywood High, she took five solids instead of the four that were required. As the fifth, she picked dramatics, because it sounded like the kind of course where you could get away with murder. That's how she got to be an actress. If she hadn't been an actress, she wouldn't have met Dick Quine. So she's Susy Q. today because she wanted to be a doctor. Fate's wonderful—

Mr. Kachel, who taught dramatics, told her she was the world's worst actress. Susan agreed. What was Shakespeare to her, or she to Shakespeare, that she should sweat for him? All she wanted was her points—flunk you," Mr. Kachel would warn her, and she'd droop like a wounded fawn. But that didn't bring her and Shakespeare any closer.

The day before graduation, a mysterious stranger came in with Mr. Kachel. Nobody knew he was Bud Sholem, Sol Lesser's talent scout, on the hunt for a girl to play Bobby Breen's sister. But they all noticed that Mr. Kachel was calling on the class luminaries, and that the stranger was very attentive. Till he caught sight of a small pig-tailed figure, sitting wide-eyed in the back row, out of Teacher's line of vision—

There was a murmured exchange, heard distinctly by those up front.

"What about Big-Eyes back there?"

"She doesn't know the time of day."

They murmured some more and, when class was dismissed, Susan was asked to wait. Uh-uh. Mr. Kachel was going to tell her she'd flunked—

Mr. Kachel said nothing. It was the stranger who spoke, and his words were weird and wonderful. "Would you be interested in making a picture?"

She looked from one to the other. Mr. Kachel seemed intent on detaching himself from the whole business.

"I don't think so," said Big-Eyes.

"Well, why don't you go home and talk it over with your mother?"

Susan had planned to work that summer. She had no illusions about medicine. You studied for years, and when you were old and gray at 45, you made ten dollars, if you were lucky. She'd always known she'd have to work her way through. She'd been 8 and Bob 6 when Dad had died. Mother'd been working ever since. Grandmother'd taken over the responsibility of Susan's education, but neither could afford to send her to college. Maybe this was a heaven-sent chance to earn some money.

Mother told her to go ahead if she wanted to. So she went ahead, but didn't get the picture. "Too young," they said.

"You look 12."

Bud Sholem gave her a letter to the Reinhardt School. The Reinhardt School gave her a scholarship and the lead in "Holiday." Henry Blanke of Warners' saw her, gave her a contract at $75 a week and a new name—Susan Peters for Suzanne Carnahan.

She didn't take it big. Hollywood girls are wise to the ways of Hollywood, where many are called but few are chosen. Besides, she lived in an atmosphere of healthy cynicism. Salka Viertel, Garbo's great friend who was also a friend of Susan's French grandmother, used to say: "I'd like to get that child into pictures." Grandmother'd laugh her head off. Now she laughed harder. Mother went hysterical every time she looked at Susan. Bob snorted, and her friends gave her the razz. But you can't laugh off $75 a week.

At Warners' she sat for two years and made every test in the calendar—"Sergeant York," "Constant Nymph," "Kings Row." "You're a sweet little girl," they'd tell her, "but you can't act." Or, by way of variation: "That was a swell test, Susan, but you're too young." Then the part would go to Joan Leslie, who was a sharp 16.

When they dropped her contract, she was heartbroken. Not because she couldn't be an actress, but because she'd wasted two years and missed her chance at medicine. A girl can't wait till she's 50 to start earning money—

"I'm going to learn another trade," she told her agent, "and don't ask me what, because I don't know. All I know is, I'm through with pictures, which makes it nice

LOUELLA PARSONS GOOD NEWS

For 20 years Louella's was the shoulder Metro stars cried on, the ear they confided into—here are her memories.

■ Twenty years is a long time to look back—longer than some of you kids have lived. And, yet, as I thumbed back over my old columns getting material for this special feature for MODERN SCREEN, I would come across a famous name, a face, the title of a movie and think, "Why, that was only yesterday."

Turning back the pages of time, reviving memories of the great ones who are gone, like Marie Dressler, John Gilbert, vivid little Jean Harlow, I would feel a lump in my throat.

And then, I would come across a picture of a chubby-faced little boy of six, Jackie Coogan, who, I had once long ago told my readers would soon be seen in "Rags." It made me very proud to think of that boy now—a movie tyke who grew up to be one of the real heroes of this war.

Other names—so nostalgic: Ramon Novarro, Alice Terry, Viola Dana, Conway Tearle (he of the cynical lifted eyebrow), Mae Murray as "The Merry Widow," Lon Chaney. Great names then. Just memories now.

But they are glamorous, exciting memories—so let's turn back the calendar. Let's pretend it is again—— men dress "downstairs"—the women "upstairs." There is a large censor-proof sign reading GENTLEMEN NOT PERMITTED UPSTAIRS. ABSOLUTELY NO EXCEPTIONS!

The three great stars are all men . . . Lon Chaney, John Gilbert, Ramon Novarro. They couldn't be more unlike.

John is a flame—restless, vivid, intense, who is almost consumed by his fame—but loving it. Just like Frank Sinatra loves it today. Jack once told me: "I live for all this. It's the breath of my life!" I can't think of that now without a tug at my heart. The breath in him literally was snuffed out when his fans forgot him.

Lon Chaney! There was a grand person. The greatest "horror" star of them all who played one monster after the other in the movies, was the folksiest actor who ever lived. His salary was $10,000 a week—but he drove his own coupe to the studio and it was always filled with studio workers and "extras" he had picked up on corners along the way. He mowed his own lawn and pruned the rose bushes. In the evenings he talked politics with his neighbors at the corner drug store.

Norma Shearer was Lon's leading lady in "He Who Gets Slapped," and he always called her "the Beauty" and himself, "the Beast."

Ramon Novarro was the esthete, a moody, sensitive, introspective boy. He lived in a world of his own away from the studio. He bought his family a rambling old mansion in the exclusive old West Adams district and behind this the young Mexican star built his own apartment.

The windows were stained glass equipped with lighting effects that poured artificial moonlight into the big, heavy draped room across Ramon's bed. There was an enormous piano in the bedroom for Novarro had a lovely singing voice and liked to play and sing into the night.

Once, I remember saying to him: "It is too bad the fans cannot hear you sing, Ramon." He laughed: "Perhaps that is the beauty of the silent screen."

* * *

By 1926 two queens ruled the roost at M-G-M: Norma Shearer, the adored wife of Irving Thalberg was one of them. But a plump chorus girl from the Winter Garden had arrived and her name was Lucille Le Seur. She promptly changed her name to Joan Crawford and her figure to perfection. On every hand you heard about Joan: "She won't last. She's too giddy! Up every night until all hours in dancing contests. Drives young Mike Cudahy's car like a demon down Sunset Boulevard. No, she won't last!" (Oh, Joan—how you made them eat those words. Bravo to you for a sustained career of eighteen years with M-G-M. My newest John Frederics is off to you.)

William Haines, brash, good looking Bill, soared to stardom in "Brown of Harvard" and as a present to himself, Bill furnished the most distinctive home in Hollywood. Everybody was begging young Haines to "do" his or her place. "Might as well go into the interior decorating business," he laughed. "But I haven't got time. Too many movies to make."

Nobody pays much attention to a tall, blonde Swedish actress who has just been imported—that is, nobody but Jack Gilbert who always has an eye out for pretty girls. Her name is Greta Garbo and Jack tells everyone, "She's wonderful. She's divine." But much to his chagrin—the lady refuses his dinner invitations!

Greta, who didn't speak English well, had an interpreter named Svend Borg. I don't know whether she had a sense of humor or not—but Svend did. Whenever she was asked to do something she didn't want to, Svend would come back, saying: "What she said in Swedish—I wouldn't dare tell you in English!"

But this I know—Greta was not a recluse nor a cold girl in the beginning. True, she was lonely and homesick. She did not make friends easily. She did not dress well. But my mind goes back to a party Clarence Brown, her director, gave at the old Montmartre.

She was madly in love with Gilbert by this time. She was like a happy, laughing school girl gowned in a simple pink evening gown, dancing every dance in his arms.

Another time I saw her at a football game with Jack, Eddie Lowe and Lilyan Tashman. It started to rain. Lilyan and the boys wanted to leave but Garbo said: "I stay."

And stay she did—covered up from head to toe in the pages of a newspaper she bought for protection.

I'll always believe that Garbo changed and went into her shell after her romance with John was in ashes. But she remained his friend—even after the talkies ruined his career and she insisted that he stage a comeback with her in "Queen Christina." But the fire had died between them. The tables in their glory had turned—and Jack could not take kindness—and pity—from the woman he had loved with such fire.

By 1928 Marion Davies was the undisputed Queen of Hollywood both in beauty and in popularity. There was no one like Marion—so perfectly natural, so gay. John Barrymore once said: "Marion is the only woman in the world who can be beautiful and funny at the same time."

Everyone flocked to her parties at her Colonial Beach house or gathered in her imposing bungalow dressing room—really a Spanish hacienda in the middle of the M-G-M lot. Marion loved people and wanted them around her always, which reminds me of an amusing story which occurred when she was making "Zander, The Great."

So many of her friends visited on the set evey day that the director finally lost patience. Taking Marion to one side, he said: "Can you get rid of the gang after lunch?"

After lunch—not a soul showed up—no cameraman, no crew, no cast. "What's this all about?" gasped the startled megaphoner when he found just himself and Marion had reported for work.

"We-l-l," stammered Marion mischievously, "you said you wanted me to get rid of the gang. So I sent them down to the Beach house to swim for the afternoon!"

The years roll on, as I turn the pages, and by 1929 the most amazing starring duo in all movie history are going strong at the box office—Marie Dressler and Wally Beery. What a grand person was Marie. Solid gold. And yet she once said to me, sadly:

"My success came too late. I can buy all the things I have wanted all my life and yet I find I haven't the energy to enjoy them that I had when I was young."

But Marie did love her beautiful home in Beverly Hills and she was so grateful for the comfort and devotion given her by her two colored servants that when she died she willed them fifty thousand dollars "in appreciation"!

No career in Hollywood was ever as amazing as Marie's rise to fame. When the movies were just flickers she had been in "Tillie's Punctured Romance" with Charlie Chaplin. Even then Marie was not young and seemingly the fans forgot about the funny old character actress.

Then Louis B. Mayer brought her back to the screen—and to glory in one of Garbo's KEEPING a husband supplied with clean shirts is no problem to LINIT-wise wives.

LINIT, the modern starch that penetrates and protects fibres, makes ironing easy because LINIT never sticks. LINIT gives a smooth dust-shedding "finish" to all fine fabrics.

RUB SOAP into collars and cuffs. Soak 10-15 minutes in warm soapy water. Wash in plenty of hot water. (8-10 minutes, if using machine.) Don't skimp on soap.

RINSE three times in clean hot water. To restore the "finish" of the fabric, improve appearance and make ironing easier, add a light LINIT starch solution (1 part LINIT to 10 parts water) to final rinse.

WORK basic LINIT starch solution (full directions on package) thoroughly into collars, cuffs and button-hole band. LINIT penetrates easily and evenly, protects and preserves fabrics.

DAMPEN collars, cuffs and button-hole band more than body of shirt. A light iron at correct heat does better work than a heavy iron—but any iron glides easily over LINIT-starched fabrics. LINIT-starched collars and cuffs are soil-resistant, long wearing.

first talking pictures, "Anna Christie." That was the beginning of the real success that so heartbreakingly came in the twilight of her life. My most vivid memory of Marie goes back to a birthday party L. B. gave in her honor at which he said, "The studio is at your feet." It should have been the happiest moment of her life.

Instead, try as she would to be brave, two enormous tears rolled down her face. Marie had just recently learned that she had an incurable disease—cancer—and that her days were numbered.

"You know, Louella," she said soon after when we were having dinner—just the two of us, "if Life were a thing that money could buy, the rich would live and the poor would die." I hope that doesn't sound too sad. Marie had great pride in what she had accomplished. She realized that her success gave hope to other middle-aged actors who said, "See what happened to Marie. Old age is no barrier to fame."

There will never be another Dressler. She stands in her niche of fame alone—so much so that many fine plays bought by M-G-M to star her have never been filmed with any other star.

I would love to be able to brag that the first time I saw Clark Gable I realized he was going to knock the ladies cold! But t'aint true!

To tell the truth, when Norma Shearer introduced him to me on the set of "A Free Soul," I was far from impressed. Clark was tall and thin and his ears seemed unduly conspicuous. Nor, in talking with him, did he flash any of the terrific personality that later earned him the greatest feminine following ever corralled by a male star.

My heart did no flip flops that day when Clark told me that he owed his movie break to Lionel Barrymore. Barrymore had seen him on the stage in "The Last Mile" and was impressed by his performance.

Clark was not happy in those days. He was married to Ria Langham, a woman much older than he, and she was socially ambitious which annoyed Gable no end.

It was not until after their divorce, when he met and married Carole Lombard, that he became a completely different person. Carole's terrific sense of humor gave him a new perspective on life. She kidded him constantly and never let him forget "Parnell," the one dismal flop of his movie career.

Today—he deeply misses Carole, her nonsense and her love of life. But I noticed that when Major Gable was recently home on leave that still another change had come over his personality. The many times I saw him he always had a funny story to tell. And he is a wild-eyed Gin Rummy enthusiast. Not a particularly good player, I might add—but he loves the game and will play at the drop of a hat or in the middle of the most social cocktail party.

Whether or not he remarries, and the girl is fun-loving, blonde Kay Williams or someone else, there is no gainsaying that Kay has been an outstanding influence on him. She has the same gay spirit and love of laughter Carole had.

As much of a man's man as Clark is—he has always been influenced by the women in his life. His first wife, Josephine Dillon, taught him the fine points of acting and she did much for his career. Ria, in spite of their unhappiness together, taught him appreciation for the niceties of life. Carole brought him life, laughter and love. Clark is the type of man who needs to be in love—and to his everlasting credit it must be said that he never fails to credit the women who have loved him with their share of glory in his success.

About the time of the advent of Gable, another young actor named Robert Montgomery, was coming along by leaps and bounds. Bob had the reputation of being a young "intellectual" off the screen and for being a cocktail-shaking roué before the cameras. He hated those roles. "If all those cocktails I've mixed were consumed," he once told me, "they would produce the world's greatest hangover!"

He had the reputation of being a bit "difficult" and also a bit of a rebel. "If anything important ever came along," he said, "I could toss this all over in a minute."

I thought—"Oh, yes?" That is fine talk—but I had never seen an actor yet who would toss it all over.

Well, Bob made me eat those thoughts and words. When the war came along he was among the first Hollywood actors to enlist and now, as a Lt. Commander in the Navy, he has proved himself one of the finest officers in the service.

A man high in Navy circles told me: "Montgomery is a natural leader. His men would follow him to the bottom of the sea."

Today, Bob's wife and two children live in a modest home in Westwood—a far different place from his elaborate estate in Holmby Hills when he was a top-salaried star. Certainly he meant it when he said, lo these many years, "If anything important came along—I could give this all up!" He proved it!

married three times. First, to a childhood sweetheart in Kansas City. Then, tragically, to Paul Bern, the gentle little producer who killed himself, and finally, the third time to Hal Rosson, the cameraman. All these men loved Jean very much. But she loved just one man in her life—William Powell.

Everything about Jean was white. She wore nothing but white evening gowns. Her big home in Beverly Hills was decorated in white satins and brocades. Her famous platinum blonde hair was as silvery as Christmas tinsel.

She was an individualist if I ever saw one. She had an unusual habit of receiving her best gal friends when she was in the bathtub. She even gave interviews to the femme press lying back in bubble-soaped water.

At one time, she and Joan Crawford indulged in a feud. They didn't speak when they passed on the lot and it was hard to be friends with both girls.

But Joan did a terribly sweet thing after she learned that Jean was a very sick girl with a kidney infection. She went over to the set of "Saratoga" one afternoon, took Jean's hands in hers and said: "It's about time we grew up. I admire you so much. Can't we be friends?" The little Harlow who had the warmest heart of any girl I have ever known, threw her arms around Joan and cried like a little girl.

Jean was twenty-seven years old when she died—an intense white flame consumed by her own youth, beauty and fire.

The early 30's were grand days on the M-G-M lot. There are so many memories—

Business-wise Sonja Henie grossed cool 2 million with her touring ice show. Studying singing for next pic, she says, "It's a pleasure." (With Capt. Topping.)

Premature Daria Cassini stayed in Wash. 'cause she was too tiny to move, was later brought to H'wood by nurse. Pop, recently commissioned 2nd Lieut., is stationed at Fort Riley, Kans.

Helen Hayes, believed by many to be "the first lady of the Theater" made "The White Sister" with Clark Gable. Helen is a wonderful actress with a fine screen personality. But she always hated herself in the movies. Although she won the coveted Oscar in 1932 for "The Sin of Madelon Claudet" she told me, "I am too plain looking for the movies. The fans want beautiful girls like Norma Shearer, Marion Davies, Joan Crawford, Garbo and Jean Harlow. Not a plain mouse like me."

William Powell came over to M-G-M from Warner Bros. He was married to Carole Lombard at the time. They were marvelous hosts in their honeymoon home in Beverly. I remember one costume party at which Carole was arrayed as "a Lady" and Bill wore a sweat shirt and a pair of diapers masquerading as "No Gentleman."

And believe it or not—it was as far back as this that the big exodus toward the Valley—farm life and farm homes—began. Noah and Wally Beery opened their famous Trout Club. Clark Gable bought land in the Valley. So did dozens of other stars. So you see, "I'm Going To Make The San Fernando Valley My Home" isn't such a new idea after all.

In 1934, M-G-M celebrated its tenth year and they were ten important years that changed the appearance of the big Culver City studio as greatly as the advent of talking pictures changed the destiny of the movies.

Much of the informality of the lot is gone—the old rambling stages giving way to modern, factory-like sound stages crowded close together.

A beautiful new dressing room building has been erected in which each star has his or her individual suite consisting of two rooms and a kitchenette and is furnished to set off each player's personality.

"Darn it," Lionel Barrymore complains, "I can't stand all this elegance. Can't find anything with somebody coming in all the time and cleaning up after me!"

There's a man for you, this Lionel, turning everything into a laugh or a gentle jest even when he is racked by excruciating pain from arthritis. There are times when he can hardly walk from his dressing room to the set. When no one is looking his face drops into lines of pain from the effort he is making. But if there is anyone looking, or when the cameras start turning, no one would suspect what he is going through.

Myrna Loy, the perky red-head born Myrna Williams, and I have one thing in common. We hate our nicknames. I hate to be called "Lolly" and Myrna, when I first met her, couldn't stand for anyone to call her "Minnie" but Arthur Hornblow.

I've known Myrna a long time—even before she brought her freckles to M-G-M and when she was still playing Oriental sirens in the movies. In fact, her nickname "Minnie" sprang from so many roles in the setting of "The Voice From the Minaret."

Myrna is quiet and reserved and refuses to go in for glamour away from the screen. At one time I thought she was a very indifferent dresser. But believe me—that is all past now. Since her year's retirement from the screen at the time she married John Hertz, her subsequent divorce and her triumphant return as "Mrs. Thin Man," Myrna is chic—and how!

Turning the pages among my 1936 columns, I came across this comment: "You'll be hearing more of Rosalind Russell, a new contract player at M-G-M, said to be a rival of Myrna Modern Screen's Fashion Guide . . .

■ Thank Lana Turner for all this. Me—I'd clean forgotten how wonderful pin-checks were. Forgotten about all fashions, almost, sitting there at the pre-view of "Marriage Is a Private Affair." Then—smacko! Gorgeous Lana in the scene where she wears that pin-checked suit. Tell me how it ended, will you? Because, with that, out I went (stumbling over Al's new No. 2 Airplane Stamp shoes). Yep, off to find checks that would be just as flattering to your own five foot three-or-so figure.

Tough assignment? You can say that again! Not that the woods aren't full of checks this season. It was just that I wanted something specially wonderful for you. But just look—in case you think I'm not a never-say-die snooper-outer. A waistcoat two-piecer of wool

This is as good a way as any to get hep. To the fact that it's later than we thought. Time to buckle down and rustle up the look of Fall in our duds. Notice I don't say, "back to school," "campus," "career" or anything like that. Today, we all want the same colorful, sensible wearable stuff no matter what we're doing. We're on the job, all of us. So let's get going, looking the part.

Oh sure, checks are wonderful. But they have a way of bouncing if your figure's not in scale. All the world's not Lana Turner—even if the sun does rise and set on her for a lot of us. Maybe you never wanted to be the cuddly type anyhow, just wished you weren't quite so lanky looking. Your trick is to saw your height right in two with a break of color. TRUE-LOVE and FRIENDSHIP RING And Matching EARRINGS

What makes both the ring and the matching earrings so unusual and attractive is the twin, Sterling Silver, pendant hearts that dangle daintily like sentimental and charming settings. Either the ring or earrings can be worn separately, but together they are truly captivating. Everyone who sees this altogether new and thrilling ring and matching earrings immediately wants a set. No other gift is quite so appropriate among friends or lovers now that so many good friends, pals and sweethearts are far away from each other. The precious Sterling Silver ring is extra wide. Both the ring and earrings are beautifully embossed with the very newest "Forget-Me-Not" design with two pendant hearts suitable for engraving initials of loved ones. Both the ring and earrings become more attractive and sentimental the longer they are worn.

Loy's. Since Miss Russell has been in Hollywood she has played in seven pictures and it seems almost sure to predict that she will soon be playing featured roles!" Quite a fortune teller, wasn't I? Certainly that was the height of understatement about Roz's success and we've often laughed about it.

My first impression of Robert Taylor was that he was an unduly modest boy for his startling good looks—actually suffering agonies over a New York writer's observation that he was a "pretty boy." He was worried sick that he would never live it down. For months, Bob thought that his career was ruined.

I think he found the heart to go on only because he thought he owed such a big debt to Louis B. Mayer. "When I started" he told me, "I wasn't making enough money to buy the clothes I wore on the screen. Mr. Mayer called me into the front office and said he would stake me to a complete wardrobe. The tailor's bill was terrific. I tried to tell him that maybe that "pretty boy" label would ruin my career and I would never be able to pay him back. He said he would take a gamble!" L. B. certainly put his money on the right boy! In the great respect the fans now have for Lt. Robert Taylor, U.S.N.R.—most of them have forgotten that he was ever called a "pretty boy."

1937 is Jimmy Stewart's year to rise and shine. I think more glamorous women fell in love with Jimmy than any other actor. A tall, lanky boy—just like the kid next door, I guess he appealed to the maternal instinct of the glamour girls. Marlene Dietrich liked Jimmy pu-lenty at one time. So did Olivia De Havilland. Strangely enough—and it was almost ridiculously untrue, Jimmy was supposed to be carrying an undying torch for one of his best friends, Margaret Sullavan.

Perhaps they had been in love at one time when the two of them and Henry Fonda (who later married Maggie) were in summer stock companies. But it was all over before they came to Hollywood. Nevertheless, the legend stuck and it seemed to give Jimmy a sad romantic aura.

When the war came along, Jimmy was one of the first Hollywood actors to join up. And now he is one of the real heroes—Major James Stewart, squadron commander, who has been decorated with the shiniest medals our country has to offer for his exploits over Nazi Germany.

The years roll by and old faces disappear and new ones come along to take their places in the spotlight. Two children—Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney come along to take their place at the top of the box-office list as a team.

I felt closer to Mickey when he was a little boy than I do now that he is grown-up and a divorced man. His marriage to Ava Gardner, whom he adored, went on the rocks, and that rift left its mark on the little kid who used to be such a cocksure youngster.

Even when he was about twelve years old, Mickey used to call me "Toots." "Hello, Toots," he would greet me when we met on the lot, "what's new?"

One day, the producer of his picture, said to him: "Why do you call Miss Parsons, "Toots"—Mickey?"

"Say, is that wrong?" gasped the juvenile Rooney who wasn't really being fresh but who thought the world was his oyster. "Say, I'm sorry. It's her name, isn't it?" he puzzled, scratching his head.

* * *

The team that has taken the place of Gilbert and Garbo on the M-G-M roster today is Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon. Walter isn't new on the lot—far from it. He has been with the studio more than ten years and strangely enough, much of his background has never been told.

Walter came out to California almost 14 years ago—to die. He was a very sick man. He believed he was suffering from a malignant ailment and that he would never be cured.

For a long time this fear of his had a marked effect on his career. He actually preferred supporting roles that weren't as big because he thought starring parts were too strenuous on him and taxed his strength too much. But finally, through a combination of fine medical treatment and faith, Walter licked the bugaboo of ill health and almost simultaneously with his changed mental attitude, his star began to rise.

He calls Greer Garson "A swell guy" and in that, I certainly agree with him. I adore Greer and cannot agree with any fellow journalist who finds the red-headed Irish charmer "difficult" or un-cooperative.

* * *

The new idols come along so fast it is almost impossible to keep up with them. The past two or three years have given us Van Johnson, Robert Walker, the wholesome young actor who starred in "See Here, Private Hargrove;" Jean Pierre Aumont who would have become THE romantic idol of the movies if he hadn't chosen to serve with the Free French; Gene Kelly, the dancing hero who has all the girls winging.

Gene is young and boyish looking. But I think he understands perfectly how much is at stake. Reports from the M-G-M front are that he isn't letting Fred Astaire get away with a thing in the picture they are both making, "Ziegfeld Follies."

Among the new girls, Lana Turner and Susan Peters show the most promise, I believe. Sometimes I could spank Lana. On other occasions I bless her for being a colorful, exciting, glamour girl and furnishing plenty of interesting "scoops" for my paper.

Lana, in private life, belongs to the Clara Bow-Jean Harlow type of actress. She seems to be continually in hot water as witness her elopment, annullment and remarriage to Steve Crane and then, just when everyone thought thy were happy with their baby, her equally sudden divorce. If I had one word of advice to Lana right now it would be to "Slow Down." Flames can sometimes burn too brightly—they have in the past.

Where Lana is an extrovert, little Susan Peters on the other hand is definitely an introvert to use some good psychological words. A shy, retiring girl, she is so very modest that when she recently had a very serious operation she told her studio that it was just a minor "throat trouble." When it came out later that Susan (Mrs. Richard Quine) had lost an expected baby, her explanation was that she hadn't been able to discuss such a personal thing with business associates.

But mark my word for it—this girl with her charm and refinement will go far. She is a wonderful little actress.

And so now we come to the end of our memories back over twenty years of M-G-M's great glamour stars. It has been a long and brilliant parade of colorful and loveable personalities. Great names all of them. Many are gone now—but they wrote Hollywood and movie history that should never be forgotten by the legions to whom they gave so much pleasure.

gabardine lumberjack dress. Coffee-cream beige up top, coffee-bean brown below. Pretty good eye-opener, if you ask me, morning or any other time. Comes in other combinations just as eye-opening and mouth-watering.

Or let's say you've a nice enough waistline, but your hips just won't cooperate. Your best bet is a dirndl—and are you in luck! Yep, dirndls are still with us but the skirts can't be too whirl-around. That ballerina stuff's no go once you start wearing a coat. The lacy wool arrow dress sketched is aimed straight at the heart of somebody. I can picture you wearing it now in a color like purple or chartreuse or coral—the round neck making you look all innocence, you faker. Pretty smart of you, too, to think of matching the grosgrain arrows and belt with a short bead choker!

What's that? You never got slimmed down at the waistline or anyplace else? I'm not frowning—just thinking. That you ought to see page twenty-six and send for reducing chart. But, meanwhile, a smart new shirtmaker will help keep those bulges a secret. Look closely at the one in rayon crepe with the dagger buttons. (Arrows, daggers—is it safe 'round here do you think?) The V neck and long mid-section tucks do wonders for the figure. This has a zipper—and all the time we figured that was just a post-war dream!

By the way—remember the shirtmaker I showed back in June that you fell for so hard? The one with the buttons up the side? You can have practically the same thing for Fall if you like. It's in "Whippet cloth"—an all rayon gabardine. Costs about nine dollars, and I'll tell you where if you write me.

I know you're still plenty envious over the way the half-pints have been hopping around all Summer in those frisky pinafores of theirs. Never mind—your day has come. With jumper dresses designed to slim the frame like a hunger strike. Looks like a rich diet I know—the one I've had sketched. But take note of the way it darts clear to the waist and that tucked mid-riff trick again. You'll find out for yourself what the flat peplum effect can do for you. Because when you see this in kelly green or coral or purple, you're going to want it like mad. And—if I know you—what you want, you get.

Maybe you think I'm asleep on my feet because I don't tell you to head for dresses with waistlines plunged way down low. No, pal. I know that there's talk about lower belts, but they're hard to take at the start. So I say wait a while to see what happens. If it's a real trend, not a false alarm, we'll do it up super in date dresses later on but right now it would be kinda foolish of us to scramble around busting up the old nest egg and find out later that it's been a budget-breaking false alarm. Right? Right!

* * * *

Come to think of it, why don't I hot-foot out for some Fall duds myself 'stead of sitting here all day talking? For news regarding the whereabouts of the dresses sketched, send me a postcard or letter a-winging. Or, if clothes in general just get you down, write me all, and we'll see what's to be done. Marjorie Bailey, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y. Be good, now.

Susie doesn't mind doing "weirdies," prefers them to little girl roles. Between horror scenes of "The Climax," she and Boris Karloff tore off a lullaby. Karloff did the lyrics, S. the music.

Susanna collects records like a puppy collects fleas. Hundreds of discs range from Bach to Victor Herbert but, says Susie, "No swing." Thinks dislike for swing is probably reason she can't dance.

And what a perfect dream of a date! Sit Susie Foster behind a platter of doughnuts and you can keep the Crepe Suzettes!

By Sylvia Katz

■ It's 10:30 at the Hollywood Canteen. If one more soldier edges through the door, the walls will start bellying out. In the corner a guy's picking out scraps of melody on the piano. Behind him half a dozen boys are yelling for "Pistol Packin' Mama." He slides into it and above the clatter of dishes and the noise and the laughing, you can hear the tight little knot at the piano doing a Calloway, hot and loud. Feet start stomping, the piano's rumbling and somebody yells over to you, "The joint's sure rockin'! Get into it, soldier. Get into it." So you do.

But after a minute or so, you realize something's happened. The guys are standing quietly looking toward the platform; the piano's trailing off to a murmur; and the joe whose elbow was just jammed into your rib is looking like he just saw gold. "Man, what a blonde. WHAT A BLONDE!"

She's young, about 18, and she's got dimples and shiny hair. Long—past her shoulder. You don't know what she's there for exactly, but it doesn't matter. Just being there's enough. So you start clapping and soon the whole place is clapping and hooting and pounding. She smiles a stiff little smile, then tells you she's never been to the canteen before, that she sings, but not boogie-woogie, only Nelson Eddy-ish stuff and maybe you won't like it but she'll do her best. Thank you. She says it fast, sort of breathlessly. And then she sings something from Victor Herbert, with that frozen little smile still on her face. When it's over she walks off quickly—practically runs.

But the guys are yelling now. Yelling for Susie. "Make it Ave Maria, Susie. Make it good!" It was good, all right. The guys said later it made them think of Sunday morning and how they'd never gone to church and wished they had. They said it—well—it was plain beautiful—that's all.

That's what Susie's first night at the canteen was like. She's thawed out by now. After a half hour's singing—when her throat's gone froggy—she sits down behind a platter of doughnuts and talks between bites. The fellows get statistical. Where does she come from and that kind of thing.

"From Minneapolis and my real name's Larson. I'm half Swede and half practically everything else." You can tell she's Swedish by those clear blue eyes—and that hair again. She squeaks, "Hair. Don't mention it. They spend hours building me a hair-do at the studio and then I go home and knock it to pieces. Look at the stuff." You look, start to mumble something appropriate, but Susie beats you to it. "Did I ever tell you about the time I socked Rooney? I'm talking too much, I know. I always do. But this time we were playing sand-lot football during recess. I threw a pass. Mickey intercepted the ball and went flying for a touchdown. I yelled, 'You can't do that.' He yelled back, 'I did it!' So I socked him. Hard. On the chin."

That was before Susie started growing up. Now that she's grown, there's no football. In fact, there isn't much of anything that's fun.

"You could call it grim," she says. "Practice, work, no men! Not even the slightest crush in years. Only how grim can it be when you've worked with Don O'Connor eight hours a day. Gosh, I miss him. You think he horses around in his movies. You should see him when he's unrestrained. You should settle down over a coke and really talk with him, or spend a couple of hours running through a stack of records. Donnie knows the stuff. Not just Basie or James but the hefty, solid items like Brahms. You should see him slumped down in a chair with his big feet up on a coffee table, looking solemn. He used to kid me about not knowing how to dance. (A jeep's lighter on its feet.) And about getting dispossessed so many times. Dad and I have had a ghoulish time. It's my practicing. I always seem to be doing it

Young mothers dare not ignore this advice

Scientific research has proved that every infant, every growing child needs the protective benefits of the "cod liver oil" vitamins A and D. That is why doctors recommend and prescribe these two essential vitamins. They know that a prolonged deficiency may seriously impair normal growth, retard the natural development of bones and teeth, cause life-long, physical handicaps.

Every day, children of all ages need adequate amounts of Vitamins A and D. Before it is too late—before a threatening shortage undermines health, start giving your child Vita-Baby.

Vita-Baby is a liquid concentrate of the health-aiding Vitamins A and D. Derived from biologically tested fish liver oils and activated ergosterol, and manufactured under the latest and most scientific laboratory control, Vita-Baby's formula meets the rigid requirements of recognized vitamin therapy. Yes, when you give your child Vita-Baby, you can be sure you are giving an outstanding product. A few drops in cereal, milk or direct on the tongue with the handy dropper provide full, daily requirements.

Don't deny your child the wonderful, protective benefits of this proved, growing-aid. Get a bottle from your druggist today. Show it to your doctor. He will approve the formula or your money will be refunded. Regular size—75c. Large, economy size—$3.00.

short course in applied make-up

By Carol Carter

■ No books to tote! No quizzes to answer! This is one summer course you're going to enjoy. All you have to do is c'mon along with us and learn the beauty-making rules. But, of course, you'll have to do a spot of homework. You'll have to analyze this glowing, sunkissed version of You. Now that Old Sol has warmed over your wan winter complexion, be sure your make-up matches your new skin tones.

Clean Sweep—You want your make-up job to look Durbin-fresh, so away with leftover rouge and lipstick before applying powder foundation. Sloosh cleansing cream over your face from widow's peak to neckline, then remove with a wisp of tissue. Follow up with a sudsing; rinse in cool water. Dab on an astringent that will send tingles down into your pores. Nice feeling? You bet! On days when the mercury is brimming over the thermometer, swathe an ice cube in a square of cloth and slide it over your hot little face. You'll think you've dived into a mint julep.

Smoothie-Puss—That's what they'll call you after you've sleeked on make-up base. No glossy nose for you when you meet your warrior at the station. It seems the boys excuse shiny noses on buddies plodding back from thirty-mile hikes, but on their pet pin-up girl, uh, uh! If your skin is dry, you may prefer a cream or the liquid foundation that casts a glow over the complexion. Cake and stick foundations are favorites with the oily-skinned. Only puhleese, my pretty, remember that make-up is meant to be smoothed over your lissome throat right down to the neckline. We underscore this point 'cause we've seen the effect of many a charming round-necked peasant blouse spoiled because dark make-up ended at the chinline. When choosing make-up, key it to skin tone and be guided by face powder color. One cosmetic house has a twin powder and make-up cake packaged together to guarantee you a perfect match.

Tips On Lips—Just for fun take a look at your lipstick wardrobe, a good impartial look. Sure, you're strong for blue-red and purple tones, and they're mighty luscious with your winter woolens. But you're looking on the sunny side of things these days! How about keying your lip color to your new complexion? If you're a brunette, you'll find that cherry red will set you Apart. Copperheads and golden blondes can heighten their natural radiance with warm orange-red lipstick. For the ash-blonde with delicate, untinted skin, shell pink and raspberry are still prettiest. Arm yourself with one of those wonderful smearproof, waterproof lipsticks that weather the saltiest surf and come up bright as ever. All you have to do is apply the lipstick once, dust on powder, repaint lightly, and touch the lips with tissue. Presto, but no change for hours!

Role of Rouge—Don't we know you, though! Almost every one of your letters poses a problem—a reader with scant lashes, spreading hips or straggly locks. Typical is this plea from Alice J. "I'm sixteen and I've begun to use make-up, but my mother objects to the rouge I wear. Am I too young for it?" In our opinion, no, but "too much, too early" is the pitfall Alice has to skirt. Most girls find that rouge puts an impish sparkle in their eyes. Skillfully placed rouge can subtly accent the best planes of a girl's face.

Here's the one-two-three of rouge application, depending on whether you prefer liquid, cream or cake. Liquid rouge should be applied directly to the skin before the make-up base and powder. Cream rouge is applied after the foundation in a series of dots that are blended together with the edges feathered off. Cake rouge is patted on after the make-up base and powder. Needless to say, if you're aiming to be a four-alarm beauty, you'll match rouge to lipstick and fingertips.

Eyes That Shine—Face the critical north light and gaze eye to eye with yourself in a mirror. How do you measure up? Wish your orbs were spaced à la Colbert, appealing like Joan Leslie's, or tilted ike those of Maria Montez? Cheer up! We'll tell you how to make yours something special, too. Brush mascara only n the outer half of the lashes to make he eyes appear wider. Pluck your brows ack from the center and under the arch o create the (Continued on page 80)

? Personally, I'd rather swing and sway with Sammy Kaye, but come summer, I like to spend some time at the beach. I'm mighty proud of my peaches and cream complexion, however. How can I sun-bathe and still keep my fair skin untanned? How to avoid an unwonted toasting?

You were born to look as fragile as a southern belle. Languish under a sweeping brim and saturate every square inch of exposed surface with suntan lotion. Keep your camellia complexion intact, but don't stint on the leg make-up for street wear. You'll love the sleek effect.

? I'm the blonde type that tans to a nifty bronze in a pair of afternoons. My formula for an A-1 summer equals a white bathing suit, a wacky crowd, and plenty of Vitamin D. My only beauty problem is skin dryness and tiny lines around my eyes. How can I stave 'em off?

Lucky you—the All-American Summer Girl, Grable version! Swirl a frosting of dry-skin cream over your face and forehead every night. Sleek it on in wide arcs and then concentrate the cream around the eyes, working it in with tiny circular motions. No "eye squints" for you!

? With a patch of blue water to swim in, my summer's complete. But having reddish hair, do I freckle! When the Life Guards' Ball rolls around, I always look like brown and pink dotted swiss. How can I be beautiful without sitting on the porch with a fan all day?

Be as outdoor girl-ish as you please, chum, but smooth on a film of protective cream or lotion to strain out many a budding freckle. If Old Sol should paint you lobster color, reach for a soothing medicated cream to relieve the stinging burn. You'll feel human again.

? If I can get off from work in time to enjoy a weekend at the beach, I'm lucky. So I look strictly Indian for a few days and do an anemic fade-out for the next couple of weeks. How can I keep my tan on an even keel without the customary nursing?

You'll have to depend on a screen of suntan oil or lotion to keep you scorch-proof on your scattered outings. Use a tinted make-up base in cake, liquid, cream, or stick form (colors bisque to butterscotch), if you'd look freshly toasted 'tween-times.

? Maybe I'm doing an Amazon's job by life-guarding at the beach this summer, but I don't like to look it. How can I keep my dark skin from turning mahogany color? And what should I do to erase my newly-acquired squint that only a sea captain could love?

Best way to avoid an overdose of tan is to wallow in suntan lotions. Unless you want a little strip of corrugated nose, swoosh on a dark foundation cream or make-up base. First-class sun glasses with gay, bewitching frames will pay dividends in eye comfort . . . and add a dash of glamour.

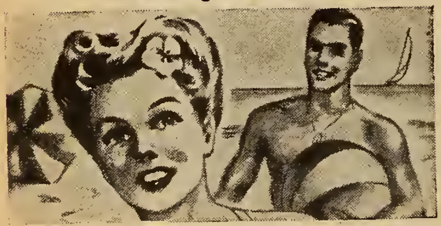
Lovely Hair made him want me for keeps

I met Jim when he was home on a furlough. What a wonderful time we had! Then, his letter came—

"You were so lovely that last day at the beach as the sun played hide and seek with the soft highlights in your hair.

I'd like to feel that the girl with the lustrous curls will be waiting for me when I get back."



How happy I was—and how I thanked Nestle Colorinse for taking away the dull, drabness of my hair and giving it richer color, sparkling highlights and a glorious silken sheen.

Colorinse can make your hair lovelier, too. Why don't you try it tonight?

back, and you'll discover your head functioning again. You'll hear yourself saying, "Hi, there. Will you be my guinea pig?" He'll bite on that, and you'll say, "I'm learning Navy insignia, but I'm not too flashy at it. Let's see if I can get yours straight." You will get it straight, of course, and he'll beam. Then ease into the where-are-you-from business.

can I get him back?

We know how it is. A certain sergeant gave you a beautiful whirl. Every Wednesday night he'd turn up at the USO and book you for every dance. He'd admire your eyes and ply you with Pepsis and walk you home in the moonlight. He was heaven with three stripes, and when suddenly, for no reason at all, he jilted you, you died. How can you recapture him? Well, lady, for our ten cents, he's a lost cause and chalk him up to experience. Maybe you fell too hard too fast, and he lost interest. Maybe he's the kind of a gent who likes variety. Anyway, the spark went out, and—leave us face it—it's a blow.

should I wait for him?

You're really carrying a big one for this Air Corps guy. You like all the same songs. You laugh at the same jokes. You think this is it, but you want to know. So when he asks you to wait for him, you'll handle it this way. Don't be coy. Let him know he's Mister Big with you, but that you're not quite ready to hit the shelf and just wait. Tell him he'll be filed away in your heart for the duration under the heading IMPORTANT, and when the war is over, and you can see each other in a good light, he'll come up for reclassification.

Well, don't go taking down addresses in your little black book unless you're really going to write. It's too unkind. And don't sign up for a correspondence with someone who doesn't appeal to you at all. It will just be a grisly chore, and your letters, if sincere, can't possibly do anything for him. Obviously, you won't exchange letters with married or engaged guys—for what future is there in that? And stamps are expensive nowadays. There will be a few boys to whom you will want to write, and really work a bit over your letters. You'll send them V-mail, of course, for you-know-how-many reasons, and you'll write just as clearly as you can. More important still, is the warmth and friendliness you'll put into them.

would my fella mind?

Your lad is overseas, and you're lonely. The kids keep begging you to go to the USO dances, but you just can't reconcile yourself to getting all smoothed up and flirting with a lot of lads that aren't Him. What to do? Well, some girls can keep gay and perky minus any male companionship, but they're a dying race. If you find yourself fed to the ears with stork showers and female chatter, if you can't talk anything but dress patterns and recipes, we'd say it was high time you did head for the USO and hear some nice masculine laughter for a change. It'll be good for you, and —indirectly—for The Man. Just remember a couple of suggestions. Don't dance with one lad too often. You might get yourself talked about, and you might, for a few deluded moments, think you were really liking the lad who was rushing you. Don't exactly wear your heart on your sleeve, but make it plain if the subject comes up, that you aren't available.

There now, that about covers all the canteen problems that have turned up in our mail, but if you've a special one—canteen or otherwise—ask us about it, and we'll answer you personally. You know where to write, don't you? Jean Kinkead, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, New York.

same illusion. Pencilling the brows in short, light strokes gives a frame to light eyes. A touch of vaseline to the lids will give them a natural sheen that's tops for daytime. On gala evenings, your eyes deserve the flattery of eye shadow, artfully smoothed on the edge of the upper lid.

P.S.—Let's hope, as you peer into the mirror, you don't see angry squint lines around your precious peepers. Good sunglasses worn on bright days will squelch 'em, remember?

Powder Puffing. Last, but mighty important, is the final dust-off with powder. First, though, can your puff pass inspection? If it isn't fresh and fluffy, you rate a demerit. Reach for a spanking clean puff before you proceed to whisk powder airily over your face. If you crave a clear-skinned finish to your make-up, try patting your face with a damp sponge. To remove those last traces of powder at the hairline, moisten a wedge of cotton with cologne and touch it to the hair.

The Speckled Band. We've borrowed a phrase from Sherlock Holmes' adventures to nickname our freckled readers. Now that summer has arrived in earnest, we can count on at least one letter a day with this refrain, "Please, Miss Carter, won't you tell me how I can get rid of my raft of freckles?" We've tried to lull our spotted friends into forgetfulness by telling them boys think freckles are cute, and we still maintain a poll would prove our point. We've tried to comfort them with the assurance that they're playing on Katie Hepburn's team. To no avail. So for those stubborn freckle-haters, here's a thought: In summer use a darker foundation with a covering of warm, rosy powder. There's a bleach cream available that will make freckles less noticeable in time and do wonders towards clearing summer-sallow skin. Feel better, kids?

Close-Up. Sooner or later, you'll have to undergo one. So give yourself a flawless make-up job every single day. Then you'll take close-ups in your stride and get a cool one-hundred percent rating from friend and beau.

But if your close-up leaves you glum, pen a note about your problem to Carol Carter, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., N. Y., 16, N. Y. We have the answer to brighten things up!

with COOL-RAY SUN GLASSES

Here's what happens when Sun Glasses provide no Zone of Safety

GUARD AGAINST brilliant sunlight. It's hard on your eyes. Ultra-violet "sunburn" rays and infra-red (heat) rays are both annoying and harmful. These rays pass right through some sun glasses, as shown above.

Here's how Cool-Ray Sun Glasses provide the "Safety Zone"

SAFETY ZONE

COOL-RAY SUN GLASSES, made by American Optical Company*, provide the eyes with a "Safety Zone." These AO sun glasses have lenses of scientifically-compounded glass that absorbs ultra-violet and infra-red rays, and excessive light. Your eyes feel comfortable within the "Safety Zone."

"SEEING RAYS"—plenty of them that let you see clearly and comfortably—are admitted by Cool-Ray Sun Glasses. That's why you'll like them.

Cool-Ray Sun Glasses have been supplied in great quantity to the armed forces, so the civilian supply is limited. Price $1.95 and up.

"MARRIAGE IS A PRIVATE AFFAIR"

(STORY)

pletely; no, no of course I haven't; it's Tom; Tom West.

Yet she might have forgotten the lean, young stranger who was going to be her husband. Three days. It takes a fool, she thought, to meet a man and marry him in three days; it takes Theo Scofield.

Of course her mother scoffed at the idea, when she gave it any thought at all. Mother somehow was much more interested in the next tea party, in the fluctuations of her bank balance. And in the matter of marriage, Mother was all for Miles Lancing because—well, to put it simply—because Miles had money.

You never married a man about whom you could think: he's nice, but— It had to be as it was with Tom, not thinking at all, just doing, hoping and, perhaps, keeping your fingers crossed. Marriage was an odd business, as Theo had a right to know. Mother had been married four times, and just a half hour ago Theo had stood talking with a man, a stranger to her. He had been her father, and Theo had never known him because in Mother's life he was three marriages ago.

What was it he had said to her, softly, gently: "If you're like your mother, you never will be married. You've got to know clearly that you belong to this boy for good. Tell me that, and I'll wish you all the happiness in the world."

There was the music again, and she was at the end of the aisle, and someone seemed to be touching her. She saw with immense surprise that he was leaning toward her, and a moment later he kissed her, and she felt a small flurry of embarrassment that he had kissed her here, before all these people. Then she knew she was married.

It was odd how many things could happen in a little time. The honeymoon had been wonderful in the quiet and splendid beauty of Vermont; in that small space of time she discovered Tom, the little surprising secrets that were somehow more important than the large issues and the big words: That a small wrinkle shaped like an arrow appeared on his brow when he was thinking, that the fingers of his hand had a swift, moving, brown grace . . .

But then, just at the end of the honeymoon, things happened with devastating swiftness. Tom's father died, and they raced back to Boston. And abruptly, without warning, the Army ordered him to take over the West Optical Works, insisting that after his father's death it was absolutely necessary that he stay on the job of producing valuable and important range finders. That had hurt Tom; he wasn't prepared to be thrown back into the civilian world. Something in him, a sense of duty or a patriotism of which he never spoke, had demanded overseas duty.

He hated it even more because Joe Murdoch should have been able to take over at the West Optical Works. Joe was competent, brilliant at the tricky business of producing range finders, already deferred because of an old heart ailment. But, and it hurt because Joe was an old and dear friend, Joe drank and the WPB refused to allow him the responsibility.

It frightened Theo; not that Tom would be near, close to her, but that suddenly she had to make a home, prepare for a married life. Marriage was one thing when it was compounded of love and kisses and the hurried tender good-by of two people who had not very much time; but faced with all the suddenly huge details of building a common life, Theo was frightened. She turned to Sissy Mortimer for advice because her marriage to Ted Mortimer was a shining success.

"I didn't expect it," Theo said, "—so soon. I don't know what to do Sissy. Making a home—Boston—out of nothing."

"You'll do it," Sissy said.

"Help me, Sissy," Theo said.

"Of course, darling."

Mother came to visit them in Boston, staring with a faint distaste at the pleasant three room apartment in which they lived. Mother thought three room apartments were just a little common; couldn't Theo have arranged something with a bit more flash? After all one can't get very excited about an all-tile bath or an enamel sink.

"Of course if you like your little rut—" Mother said.

"I adore it," Theo said.

"As much as all that? Three rooms and a bath?"

"Three rooms, a bath—and Tom."

"Oh, yes, Tom of course. I forgot Tom."

"We mustn't forget Tom, must we?" Theo said gently.

"I always remember my husbands fondly," Mother said.

"Look, Mother," Theo said. "I like being a housewife. I like just being a wife. A plain, ordinary, common, everyday wife. The kind that makes breakfast in the morning and cleans up the house and runs out to do the shopping—"

"Aren't you forgetting something in your little paradise?" Mother said. "The patter of little feet?"

"There will be," Theo said softly. "Soon."

Mother looked at her briefly: "Well, dear, I'm glad in a way. I thought you were getting vulgarly fat."

It turned out to be a boy, and of course it was named Tom. Tommy was a strange and awesome bundle to Theo. It was incredible that anyone so young and so small could demand such a vast amount of attention, or have such an assortment of queer habits, customs and abilities. There was Tommy's voice which he seemed to exercise almost continuously, and where that huge amount of wail came from in so small a body, Theo could never understand. There was the sometimes indelicate matter of Tommy's diapers; the miles and miles of Tommy's bottles. There was Tommy's smug demand that he be "bubbled." But somehow, despite everything, Tommy grew and thrived.

Mother was passing through Boston the day of Tommy's birthday. She couldn't quite make it to the apartment. There would be only a half hour between trains she told Theo when she called her, but Theo promised to come down to the station and say hello. She came, staggering under the weight of a huge bag of mason jars she had stumbled across at a bargain, looking hot, and her slip was showing.

"What in the world do you need all those jars for?" Mother said.

"Tomatoes," Theo said. "I'm going to can them."

But Mother wasn't listening. She was waving to someone in the station, calling in her shrill, possessed voice: "Why, Miles—Miles Lancing!"

It was Miles—Major Lancing now—and there he looked very tan and very fit, and there were colored ribbons on his tunic for overseas service. Looking at him, then, all of the past, the glamorous past, rushed back into Theo's mind, and she was suddenly uncomfortably aware of the awkward bag

Speaking of CALF LOVE

What could be neater than a NEET CALF?

In the Spring (or any season), a young man's . . . well, eyes . . . turn to shapely calves. For every male is versed in the art of husbandry . . . and his love of calves has been cultivated since Adam.

Look to your own calves, lady. See that they're "smooth" calves, free from glamour-stealing hair, whether stockinged or fashionably bare. Give your legs that self-assurance that comes with the knowledge that they're perfectly groomed . . . are truly NEET looking!

"Better get NEET today"! This cosmetic hair remover will, in a few moments, literally wash away unsightly hair from legs, arm-pits, and forearms. Leaves the skin silken-smooth and pleasantly scented. No sharp edges or razor stubble when never-failing NEET is used. Nor will NEET encourage hair growth. Buy a tube of NEET today, at drug, department, or ten cent stores.

Miles was polite, eyeing her with a sort of ironic courtesy.

"In town for long?" Theo said.

"Four weeks."

"We'll see you, of course, won't we?"

"Oh, yes," Miles said. "We must get together."

He said it like a man discussing an unpleasant spell of recent weather.

"How about tonight?" Theo said.

"Well—" Miles said uncomfortably.

And suddenly Theo knew that he didn't particularly want to come; and she was aware that out of the corner of his eye he was staring at a long, thin, cool looking blonde who was passing by. Theo felt a sudden wave of anger. Once Miles had been glad enough to look at her.

Miles left her at the station exit, and she watched the even stride of his down the street, walking with never a turning look over his shoulders. Suddenly she lifted the bag of mason jars and dumped them sharply to the gutter. Willfully she straightened her hat, pulled at the erring slip. She hurried to a cab.

"West Optical Works," she said.

She didn't know just why she had to see Tom. But she felt she had to. She stood waiting for him in the plain office, and she watched him as he came to her, anxiously.

"Something wrong?" he said.

"Wrong? No, darling. Nothing wrong."

"But to bust in this way. It's not like you. And we're up to our necks in work right now. Joe's off on another toot and—"

"Tom—"

"Eh?"

"You do love me?"

"Of course I do."

"Thanks."

"You mean that's all you wanted. You came busting in here, breaking up a lens test, throwing me into an uproar just—"

"Isn't it important, Tom?"

"Of course it's important but—"

"Then there can't be any 'buts,'" she said angrily.

She saw someone waiting outside the door, one of the workmen, waiting for Tom.

He said: "When are you going to grow up, Theo?"

And then without waiting, he went out, and she saw him hurry down the corridor with the workman. She watched him, feeling again and more sharply that same sense of shock and outrage and surprise that she had felt with Miles Lancing.

She poured it out to Sissy in the kitchen of her three room apartment, speaking willfully and angrily: "Am I different now, Sissy? Have I changed?"

"You've become Mrs. Thomas West," Sissy said softly.

"And does that mean that Theo is dead? That I have to give up everything?"

"It depends on what you mean by that."

"I don't feel different. Not inside. I still want fun and laughter. I like to have people say nice things to me. That isn't wrong. It can't be wrong—"

Tommy began to cry then. And suddenly the whole place seemed hateful. Boston, the apartment, cooking and cleaning, shopping and miles of baby's bottles. Martha, the maid, came in, her broad face very calm. Theo flung past her into the bedroom. In the closet she found one of her old dresses, the pretty one.

"Where are you going?" Sissy said.

"I don't know," Theo said. "I'm going to join the Army."

The Officers' Club was still the same. It was still the same room where she had met Tom in those almost-forgotten days when she had been Theo Scofield, and life had somehow been fun and laughter. Nothing had changed. And she knew, in a sudden pleased moment that not even she had changed. Because the very young flying officer whistled, low and slow, when she came in. Someone was at the piano. Across the room she saw Miles Lancing, and she flung a triumphant smile at him.

It was wonderful until Tom came in. That was the first time she looked at the clock. Was it as late as that? It couldn't be. She'd walked in only a moment before, meaning to stay only a little while, just time for a dance and a joke.

Tom didn't say anything until they were in the taxi going home.

"I thought we were going to celebrate the kid's birthday together," he said. "I didn't expect you'd be out playing pin-up girl with the Army—"

"I only dropped in to—"

"Dropped in? For hours?"

"I didn't realize . . ." she began.

"You don't realize a lot of things."

Then, there in the taxi they were staring at each other, and there was something close to hatred in their eyes. They were silent, then; silent with the terrible silence of bitterness.

Theo fled to Sissy. But at Sissy's apartment there was no answer to her ring. Instead, in the lobby, she found Joe Murdoch. He looked a little the worse for wear, but if he had been drunk he didn't show it.

"Sissy isn't in?" Joe said.

"She isn't," Theo said. "But you should be. You should be in at work at the West Optical Works."

Joe smiled crookedly: "All right, Mama."

"Come on," Theo said grimly.

Joe had to drop off at his place to change. Theo refused to let him out of her sight; she was afraid he might go off on another drunk. Joe was strangely quiet; he asked her to wait in the living room of his apartment while he changed. Then he walked toward the bedroom.

There was someone in the bedroom, Theo suddenly realized. She shrank back against the wall, and then very clearly she heard the voice say: "Joe, sweetheart, are you all right?" Through a mirror Theo could see into the bedroom, and in one sickening moment the whole thing was clear.

It was Sissy there in Joe's bedroom, moving about as if she were perfectly at home. She crossed to Joe and kissed him, and it was a kiss that gave the whole story away. Joe, desperately, was trying to act natural, but it was too late.

They all knew it was too late even when Theo in a determinedly gay voice called: "Hi, Sissy!" And then Theo fled. She couldn't stay to listen to the forced explanations that would come.

She didn't know how long she wandered around in the streets of Boston. Yet through every street the haunting thought followed her. That it should be Sissy. Why, Ted and Sissy Mortimer were the perfect married couple.

And it meant: That dingy scene in Joe's bedroom. Theo felt cheated. Marriage, so they told her, was based on honor and trust. Or was Mother right after all? That marriage was a selfish game that each partner played to his own advantage. Like Sissy. Why did it have to be Sissy, she thought hopelessly; for somehow Sissy had been a symbol to her.

Back at the apartment she found that Tom was gone. Martha told her that Joe Murdoch had called, and then the two of them had rushed off together. Tom had left word that he was going to Vermont and wouldn't be back until the next day.

Here, safe in her own apartment, under her own roof, the whole problem became unbearable. Was that what marriage was? Is it all a cheat, she thought, living with a man even if you don't love him, out of habit or because of convention or for security? No, that wasn't what she wanted.

That was why, at five o'clock that morning, Miles Lancing found her curled up on the sofa in his apartment. He was tired; he was just back from a long test flight. As the light of the snapped electric switch filled the room, Theo sat up.

Miles said: "Is it Christmas? Are you my present?"

Theo said brightly: "Hello, aviator? Don't fliers ever come home?"

Miles said, still standing there, very seriously: "You poor kid, why did you leave Tom?"

"Leave Tom?"

He understood then, and he said harshly: "Is that why you came? A little test game for yourself? Or some other silly idea? Trying to play both ends against the middle, Theo?"

"No," she said slowly, "it's not that only—"

"Only what?"

"Only I'm here," she said softly.

He didn't move toward her at all: "You're here," he said bitterly. "Yes, you're here. Here with all your stupid, selfish tricks. You ran out on Tom tonight because of whim. Because you're still so wrapped up in yourself that you don't see that marriage cuts both ways."

"Miles!" she said.

"I'm not through," he said. "I loved you once. Maybe I still love you. But I can see you for what you are. A vain, little, pampered, silly fool."

She stood up white with anger, trying to sweep past him out of the apartment. But as she passed, he reached for her and in a savage movement he kissed her.

"Theo," he whispered. "Theo. I've dreamt of you. I've tried to get along without you. But I couldn't."

She hardly moved in his arms, and she said in a tired voice: "It's no good, Miles. Because everything you said to me was true, I suppose. Maybe you were right."

And then she left him with the same thought hammering in her mind: Marriage is for fools. . . .

Then the whole incredible mess came to a climax. Tom had gone to Vermont with Joe because Joe wanted to get married. There was a girl there, and Tom, knowing nothing of Sissy, had urged Joe to marry her and had gone up with him, believing that marriage would settle Joe, help him. And Joe and his bride, a shy, quiet girl, had come back to Theo's apartment. Come back to Theo's apartment at the same time that Sissy and Ted came in.

It was a scene Theo would remember all of life: The amazed, incredulous look on Sissy's face, that terrible moment when Sissy wavered in the room and fainted, and suddenly everyone knew why; everyone, even Ted and Tom. The whole ugly thing was in the open, and the next few hours were a nightmare until the house was empty again, and there was only Tom and Theo, alone now, and together.

It might have been all right even then if Tom hadn't gone tearing at the thin, frazzled shreds of his emotions. He'd had faith in Sissy and Ted, faith in their marriage and by symbol in all marriage. It was just the sheerest bad luck that he stumbled on the fact that Theo hadn't been at home the night he went to Vermont.

He stared at her: "Where were you?"

She couldn't hurt him anymore, and in the state he was, he wouldn't understand. "Please, Tom," she said. "We'll talk about it some other time."

How could she inflict her own torments and doubts on him now? He had been shocked enough, hurt enough. She wanted to help him, protect him. But he wouldn't leave it alone.

"You told me you were out to a movie. You weren't, were you?"

"No."

"Where were you, then?"

"Tom—"

He said slowly: "A man? You were out with a man?"

She said helplessly: "I was out with Miles Lancing."

"All right," he said harshly.

"Tom," she said, "it's not what you think."

"What am I supposed to think?" he said.

"Tom," she pleaded, "trust me, I had to find out. I had to find out whether I could trust myself. Whether I could trust you."

"That's a new one, isn't it?"

Then, suddenly, her own nerves were gone, and she couldn't go on, trying to explain it calmly, as it had happened.

In a very tired voice, she said: "I'm sorry, Tom. But that finishes it, doesn't it? It's all over now. It's good-by."

"Yes," Tom said slowly. "I suppose that's what it does mean."

She had been in Reno three weeks when her father called her from San Francisco. And because she had liked the quiet man who had been her father and because she wanted to know him better, she went.

Her father didn't try to talk to her. He told her only that in marriage you had to be sure and then left her to herself. She liked to sit in the large room that overlooked the ocean, in the darkness.

It was odd how the images formed there, in the dark, against the background of the swelling Pacific. They seemed almost real. The young Princeton boy who had once proposed marriage to her, the man in Reno—old and wise—, the pursuit flier who on one mad week-end had decided they were meant for each other.

The images faded out. But not quite. There was one more. It was somehow a little more solid, a little more substantial than the rest. It seemed almost real. And then with a little shock she realized that it was real, and that Miles Lancing was in the room waiting for her to speak.

"Theo," he said softly, "I had to come. Knowing you were here, I had to come and see you. Listen to me, Theo, I'm leaving again for active service. But I want your promise before I go. Promise to marry me. We could make a go of it—"

It was like an echo of what she had been thinking. "Yes," she said. "I think we could. But don't you see, Miles, once there was a man I thought I could marry and be happy with. I could have made a go of it with him, if I'd tried. I married him for a reason, and that reason, somehow, still holds good. I love him, Miles. And I wish I could tell him that I could make a go of our marriage—"

Miles said: "Tom?"

Theo nodded: "Yes, Tom. Do you know where he is, Miles? I've tried to get in touch with him but he's gone. He applied for overseas service, and this time they let him go. Miles I've got to talk to him. . . ."

Miles smiled crookedly: "I'm a pretty funny looking duck to play Cupid."

But somehow he arranged it. And speaking into a phone her voice went out, thousands of miles, through the whole labyrinth of wires, across an ocean to an island somewhere in the South Pacific where a lean, young man who was a fighter pilot listened, intently at first and then with a foolish, ecstatic grin.

It seemed a little silly, because it was something she could have said any time, without trouble or for a nickel call; maybe it wasn't portentous enough for the miracle that allowed her to speak across thousands and thousands of miles.

"Tom, darling, I love you and Tommy loves you and we both miss you terribly. And we want to stay married. Can you hear me, Tom? We want to stay married."

It was as simple as all that because marriage is always simple if you see it straight and hold to what's true and good.

NOTHING EVER HAPPENS TO JUDY

through the M-G-M gate to her dressing room. Slaps on her hair—the picture calls for a 1903 wig—puts on her face and bids Vincent Minelli, the director, good-morning at 9. Eats all day long. Lunch is a mere item. Dot, Mary and Evelyn see to that. They're in make-up, hairdressing and wardrobe respectively, but their object in life is to fatten Judy up.

Choochoo meets her at the door, goes racing madly round the house to denote joy, then comes back for their dance. Judy hums a tune, and they waltz together, and Choochoo trips her up—on purpose, says Judy. Because she's a rowdy—an aristocrat with a barrelhouse personality.

Being clean depresses her, but not for long, because it's easy enough to go out and roll in the dirt. What really gets her down is being clipped in pompoms, the way any self-respecting French poodle should be. Choochoo can't stand it. The Scottie next door hangs around the drive, waiting for her to get home from the vet's. She slinks past him into the house, flops in a corner and refuses to be comforted by food, blandishments or rubber mice.

Her eyes lift, two mournful questionmarks. "What have you done to me?" It takes a day to mend her broken heart.

moanin' in the mornin' . . .

She'd rather eat nails than bother cooking for herself, but likes to fuss when someone's coming over—the most exciting part's waiting to see whether everything comes out at the same time, which it never does.

Once in a blue moon she has dinner in bed—mostly to use up the bed-tray her mother gave her. She can't say she enjoys it. One end of the tray starts tipping, and things start sliding, and she starts grabbing, and any resemblance to elegance in a maribou jacket and exotic perfume becomes purely ludicrous—you get more of a Joan Davis routine—so the bed-tray goes into mothballs for another six months.

She knows lots of lovely ways to spend an evening. At least twice a week she answers letters from boys in the service. Naturally she can't answer all the mail herself, or she'd be doing nothing else. It's sorted, and she gets the specials. Like the one from some RAF boys who'd named their plane after her. In Italy they met up with a Yank crew who'd had the same idea. So the Yanks gave the Tommies their insignia—Judy's tilted nose between her pigtails. "And now we're fighting side by side," wrote the English flyers.

A Scotch boy wrote that his company had voted her their favorite leave-at-home girl. Which sounded like a left-handed compliment, till she realized that a leave-at-home was a furlough.

What breaks her up are the kids who write: "I'm nothing but a rookie, but I happen to like you very much. You don't have to answer, but could you send a picture, I'd be so grateful—"

Her impulse is to write back, "I'm nothing but a girl, and suppose I'm busy, what's that compared with your murderous routine, and don't be grateful because I and millions like me are so deep in your debt, there's no word to cover it."

She never knows when she's going to be called for a command performance. Once she was hauled out from the hairdresser's. Of course she knew that these broadcasts went overseas, but a few weeks ago something happened to make her realize it in a very extra-special kind of way.

every day in every way . . .

Artie Shaw, back from duty in the South Pacific, phoned her.

It seemed he'd been ill with dengue fever on that distant island, and the hospital was full, so they'd stuck him in officers' quarters. He could hear people talking and the radio screeching, but no one paid any attention to him, and he was feeling awfully sorry for himself. Then a voice on the radio said, "Here she is," and a girl said, "Hello, fellows," and it was Judy.

He never had anything give him quite such a lift. Lifted him right out of his miseries. Sounded so friendly and homelike. Across thousands of miles of water, the voice of a girl he knew. And even if those other guys didn't know her personally, she still meant home to them—home and the neighborhood movie and a soda at the corner drugstore with their own girls. "So keep it up, Judy."

As if she wouldn't, anyway. Only now when she gives these command performances, it's as if she were planting herself over there right among the boys.

Sometimes she phones her pal, Betty Asher, and they go to a movie. You can have the musicals, they'll take the tear-jerkers. Judy's a fall guy for love and patriotism. All a fellow'd have to do to get her Academy Award vote is walk in tempo to the Army Air Corps song and walk out again. They wept through "Jane Eyre" in a projection room. The projectionist couldn't believe his eyes.

"We loved it. Oh Judy, couldn't you die, just watching that Orson Welles stalk across moors—"

Judy nodded dreamily. "In a cloud of capes and whips and horses and dogs and Joan Fontaine."

Sometimes she just stays home with the radio, Choochoo and a book. Her reading's interrupted at intervals by Choochoo and the rubber mouse. Choochoo's no dope, why should she play by herself when that girl's around? So she takes her nose and shoves the mouse under the couch and comes scratching at Judy. Judy digs the mouse out, plants it in the middle of the rug, tells Choochoo a thing or two and goes back to her book. Things are quiet for a while. Judy looks up to make sure they stay that way. "Choochoo! Stop edging over to that couch!" Her head drops on her paws. What couch? Who's edging? Next thing Judy knows, the black head's at her knee.

Bedtime's around eleven, but that doesn't mean sleep. Judy's bought books on how to fall asleep, yet the art escapes her. When everything else fails, she sticks a pillow under one arm, a blanket under the other and trails from bed to bed. She's been known to cast a speculative eye at Choochoo's ample bed on the back porch, but generally winds up on the living room divan.

It's true she's had an occasional day off during the making of "Meet Me in St. Louis," but these have been mostly consumed by the dentist. Because Judy doesn't just go to the dentist and done with it. She needs a day to let the idea begin to seep in and another couple of days to steel herself and a day to decide that maybe she doesn't have to go after all—till at last comes the day when the tooth's really jumpin' and she goes.

Once in the chair, panic grips her.

"Look," says the dentist, "have I ever once hurt you badly?"

"No, but some day you will, and then I'll have to punch you right in the nose."

He's reaching for that fiendish drill. She's got to stop him!

"How can anyone like a dentist?"

"Why, don't you like me?"

"That's beside the point. What I mean is, how can a girl like a guy who, when he was 12 and you asked him what he wanted to be, he said a dentist!"

"We're very helpful people. Open your mouth."

"Helpful! The only way you could help me is to pull 'em all out and give me false teeth."

"Open, Judy."

the yanks are coming . . .

The drill gleams closer, she scrounges down in the chair, lower and lower, but she can't get away from the drill, the drill keeps chasing her.

"Look, I really don't feel very well, I'm underweight, I just got out of the hospital, I'll come back next week."

"Now wait a minute."

"No, I don't have to wait a minute, it's my tooth, it aches me, not you, let it decay, did I ask to have teeth?"

Novocaine, gas and ether don't work on Judy. He reaches for a needle.

"You can't give me a shot. I have no veins."

"You have wonderful veins. Like forget-me-nots in spring."

"Ouch!!"

And a few minutes later, "Feel better now, Judy?"

"Like forget-me-nots in spring," she murmurs. . . .

Then, of course, she has Saturday evening and Sunday, which she frequently spends at her mother's in the valley. The times are out of joint unless she sees her niece twice a week. Judaline's five now. She's named after Judy, she looks like Judy, she's left-handed like Judy and has a habit of passing on Judy's stale jokes. Except for bad jokes, Judaline wants no part of show business. She hates movies. "They're all sad," she says.

"Don't you want to be in pictures when you grow up?"

"No, thank you just the same."

On the other hand, she feels no prejudice against actors and developed a mad crush on Peter Lawford, when Judy took him out there to dinner one night—went all gay and feminine on him.

Being an only child presents no problems since she creates brothers and sisters at will. Right now she's got a pair of each, good and bad. For reasons clear only to Judaline, the good brother makes barrage balloons at Douglas. But it's the bad sister who comes in handiest.

"Now, Judaline, you know that was naughty to do."

"Oh, but I didn't do it. That was my bad sister Alice."

No one, thinks Judy, ever paid her mother a prettier compliment than Judaline. It was Mrs. Garland's birthday, and Judaline was helping her in the kitchen.

"Nanna, how old are you today?"

"Forty-eight."

"Goodness, that's pretty old, isn't it? But don't you mind, I'll love you, no matter how old you get."

"Oh pooh! You'll grow up and get married and forget all about me."

She thought that one over. "By the time I'm old enough to get married," she said slowly, "you might be flying around with the angels." The small figure pressed close, earnest eyes uplifted. "You know something, Nanna? I bet when you're up there, you won't be just a plain angel. I bet you'll be God's partner."

When Judy's not at her mother's week-ends, she may go out dancing on Saturday

Here's easy way to a lovelier, fresher CLEARER 'TOP-SKIN'

Helps Deflake Faded Dried Up, Aging Skin Cells

As skin experts will tell you—a deflaking of dried up, faded, coarse textured skin cells must constantly take place in the skin (even in young girls) otherwise your skin often appears muddy, faded, drab and "old" looking.

And here's why Edna Wallace Hopper's White Clay Pack is one of the most effective and quickest ways to help clear away this ugly "top-skin" debris.

A Real Short Cut To Beauty

Just spread Edna Wallace Hopper's White Clay Pack over your face and neck. Wash off when dry. Notice how that tired faded look vanishes. The mild rubefacient or "blushing" action of Hopper's Clay Pack gives your skin a youthful glow—a fascinating radiant beauty that is simply devastating!

Use Hopper's Clay Pack whenever you want to look your dazzling best on short notice—and to help maintain a heavenly smooth "top-skin" beauty thruout the years. At all cosmetic counters.

Cover Girl tells—"How I really do Stop Underarm Perspiration and Odor (and save up to 50%)"

"My career is glamour" says enchanting DANA JENNEY

"Being a Cover Girl is a dream job"—says alluring, successful Dana Jenney. "But I have to be right down to earth about keeping exquisite under the torrid heat of photographers' 1000-watt lamps.

"So I was thrilled when I found a deodorant that really did keep my underarms dry—Odorono Cream! I can trust it under the most trying conditions. It's a wonderful way to keep freshness from wilting—and a perfect safeguard for the expensive dresses and furs I model.

"Every girl will like the things I like about Odorono Cream. First, it contains a really effective perspiration stopper that closes the tiny underarm sweat glands and keeps them closed up to 3 days! That's why it ends perspiration nuisance so satisfactorily.

"It's safe for fabrics too—just follow directions. And you can tell it contains soothing emollients because it's non-irritating even after shaving.

"Another thing—each jar gives you up to 21 more applications for 39¢ than other leading deodorants—a war stamp saving.

"Won't you try velvety, fragrant Odorono Cream—see if you don't agree with me and other Cover Girls that it's a marvelous help in guarding precious glamour!"

night—with Van Johnson or Peter Lawford or Freddie De Cordova. Any place where they play a nice rumba—Clover Club or Mocambo or a little place on Sunset called the Serapi, that she and Van like. Or wherever Joe E. Lewis happens to be billed. She'd walk barefoot to hear him sing "The Guy's Got Me on a Blitz." Of course, if she can talk her escort into the Orpheum, that's so much velvet.

She'll wear a suit or black dress and preferably no hat. The ways of Judy with clothes are strange and wonderful. She likes them well enough but hates to buy them. Driven to it, she'll run into a store, grab a dress off a hanger and get out.

Three months later Betty says, "I've never seen you in that new dress."

"Neither have I. It hasn't been altered."

About a year ago she bought the hat of her dreams, and she's worn it once. It was photographed in Vogue—toast straw with a toast-colored veil—had a page all to itself and deserved it. She called John Frederics. "I want the hat on page 35." When it came out, she swooned. No week goes by that she doesn't put it on for her own pleasure, but since that first night she's never worn it out. Somebody might turn and look and say, "Get her!"

On the night of the Academy Award show, she got out her 4-year-old mink to wear and thrust it hastily back into the closet. The lining wasn't ripped, it had quietly fallen away, so that the skins showed. "Some gentleman," said Judy, "would help me off with my coat and yell, 'It's alive!'" So she wore her ermine bolero—bought when she was 15—and people said, "How pretty. New, isn't it?"

That proves you should never throw anything away—a rule Judy lives by. Why buy hats, when you can cut a lei of shell-pink flowers apart and run them up into a snood? Or twist two strips of lace around hairpins, stick one here, one there.

the well-dressed tapeworm . . .

As for dresses, the possibilities are endless. When Judy stands meditatively at the door of her wardrobe, Betty hands her the shears. Once she took a violent dislike to the turquoise vest in her black dress, just as she was ready to leave for a party. So she ripped the vest out, folded a black lace veil and had Dorothy tape it to her.

At the party a girl asked where she'd bought the dress.

"Oh, a little shop called What the Well-dressed Tapeworm will Wear."

For Sundays at home there's a regular routine. Betty comes over. They both sit all week, they both need exercise, they don't feel like a rip-roaring game of tennis, so they walk four miles up the canyon and four miles back. Their walk is enlivened by dogs and bees. No dog has ever bitten Judy, no bee ever stung her, but she knows that some day they will.

So the strange dog comes out, and she tries to underplay it. Stares straight ahead.

"Think he's going to bite?"

Betty, the interpid, steals a glance. "No, his tail's wagging."

"Don't look now, but here comes that nasty character."

The nasty character's an Airedale, whose name can't be Jenny, because he won't make up his mind. Won't bite and won't wag his tail.

"Maybe our stocking seams are crooked," Judy suggests. "There's a bee headed this way, and to me he looks hungry."

"Ignore him," says Betty.

Safe home again, they fix some food and relax with their favorite Sunday night broadcasts—Drew Pearson, Winchell, Fred Allen, The Weird Circle . . .

That's all Judy's done for three months, just work. Nothing's happened. Nothing to write a story about . . .

"MISS PRECIOUS CARGO"

eight, while a phonograph played records for them. Then on the dot of eight, Keenan and Bill arose from their seats among the GIs and started making like burlesque.

"We will now give away ab-so-lute-ly free one solid gold set of false teeth with every package of Mrs. McGillicuddy's Headache Pills," Bill bellowed.

Keenan promptly out-bellowed him. "I rep-re-sent the Super California Fruit and Nut Company. Reserve your patronage for well-established concerns."

Nonsense stuff. Then Bill up on the stage introducing himself and Keenan. Giving with the latest news from home. "Roosevelt's still in there, boys. Hedy Lamarr is still beautiful. And 'Mairzy Doats' is still on the Hit Parade."

"What," demanded a stupefied voice from the audience, "is 'Mairzy Doats'?"

You didn't have to plant a stooge to say that, either. These kids had never heard of the song. It hadn't been written when they left the States. So when Andy Arcari came out with his accordion and introduced them to "Mairzy Doats," the GIs laughed like hell. They said, "What's the world coming to?" They said, "Has everyone gone nuts?" But they loved it.

"That," Paulette remembered, trying to ignore the splashing that continued from the bucket, "was where I came in."

She had worn the white dress with the sequins tonight. That dress had already gone through over two months of three shows a day in China, Burma and India. By now "white" was the last adjective you could truthfully apply to it. For weeks Bill and Keenan had been making ribbing remarks about "tattletale grey." But today Paulette had found a GI who used to be in the cleaning business. And the GI had found some high octane gas or something. And tonight when she came on stage, it had really been a thing. Dazzling white dress, green gloves, Paulette. The boys had roared like fight fans.

"What's the matter?" Bill demanded reprovingly. "Haven't you guys ever seen a pair of gloves before?" Then he had got a load of the pristine splendor of the dress. "In the middle of the jungle the girl finds a dry cleaner! Paulette, you're killing me. Fellows, did you ever see anything quite so beautiful?"

They were crazy about the act when Bill put her in a trance. "Madame Svengali Goddard who does mind reading." Paulette sat on the stage looking as mesmerized as possible, while the audience asked her silly questions. "Madame, what is the date on this 1932 penny?" She couldn't answer that one. "Madame, what is the name of the Sergeant in charge here?" "Stinkie," said Paulette.

Oh yes, it had been a good show for its purpose. But now Paulette's mind was back on the rat in the bucket. The splashing seemed to be getting definitely feebler. Slower . . . slower. Now it had stopped entirely. With a sigh of relief, she lay back, took a deep breath and slowly relaxed. In another minute she was off.

You got so you could sleep almost anywhere, any time, on a trip like this. You had to. You went from post to post by plane, and always at night. So you would spread a coat on the tin floor of the plane and sleep. Or even sit up straight in one of the "bucket seats" that lined the sides, and your eyes would close and you'd tear off a quick nap. Till Keenan touched your shoulder and said, "Okay, Mabel, this is it."

That was the catch phrase for the entire trip. Not the "Mabel"—Keenan called her that for no good reason. But the "this is it" part had started way back at their embarkation point. They had been told that night to be ready to start any minute—they were "alerted," as the Army puts it. There was a little nervous tension in the group, of course. They were going to make a trip no other entertainers had made. They would cover the China, Burma and India field, and it would take three months, and it wasn't going to be any picnic. They would start out tonight, the four of them, and fly and fly and fly till they got to the end of the line, in China. Then they would work their way back, doing shows all the way. But anything could happen in that kind of a set-up.

They had sat around there, thinking about it, and then there was a banging at the door, and it swung open with a crash. A huge sergeant who looked like a cross between Vic Mature and Gargantua, stood in the doorway.

"Okay, folks," he barked. "This is it!" Very dramatic.

They tore around like mad for fifteen minutes, getting things into bags, doing all the last-moment little jobs, dropping everything they picked up, from excitement. Then the sergeant came back. He seemed to have shrunk a little.

"Planes have been delayed two hours," he announced gruffly. "Relax."

So all the way, whenever they would land somewhere, Paulette would say, "This is it. Now we're really here." Or Keenan or Bill would say politely to the officer in charge of the installation, "I guess this is it, sir. This must be the end of the line." But somehow there was always another stop ahead. And another. Till at last they were only two hundred and forty miles from Canton—and this was it.

The most unexpected incident of the entire trip was their arrival at General Stillwell's headquarters. Unexpected to them, to Stillwell, to everyone. It was an accident—they weren't really supposed to have come that far—but it was wonderful. When the plane landed they were instantly surrounded by a milling mob of Chinese soldiers, with a sprinkling of Americans. They were taken to see the General, who was as surprised as a General ever is at anything.

"Now that you're here," he said, "could you put on a show? Could you do it in forty-five minutes?"

"The war," said the General, "can wait forty-five minutes. Mr. Arcari, I hear you play the accordion. I've fooled around a bit with it myself. How do you handle 'When Irish Eyes Are Smiling'?"

So Paulette and Keenan and Bill stood around, first on one foot, then on the other, for ten minutes, while the General talked accordions with Andy. It struck Paulette funny. Here she was, the only white woman within hundreds of miles and a movie star besides, and the General wanted to know about "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling." Meanwhile, Chinese soldiers were putting up a tent for her to use as a dressing room. One brown-faced boy with a merry grin, gave her his cap for a souvenir, and accompanied it with a message. The message, translated, said, "I hope some day I will be allowed to put up this tent for you in Tokyo."

The Chinese used two names in radio code for this slim, grey-eyed girl who had come so far from Hollywood. One was "Miss Precious Cargo." The other was "American Girl with Electric Form."

Take the time the troupe made that most perilous trip of all—the flight over "the Hump," the Himalaya mountains. They got a presidential citation for that, by the way. That's how dangerous it was. It was a clear night, with the moon shining like crazy. You could see the mountain peaks all silver and beautiful. You could even see the Jap airfields in the valley below. The plane was flying very high, and it was terrifically cold. There was danger all around, of course. Danger of a crack-up. Danger of Jap planes. Danger of ice forming on the wings.

Paulette sat there looking like a bear cub with a crocodile's snout. That was because she had on a fur coat over her uniform, woolen underwear beneath it, high fur boots, ear muffs with a fur cap over them, a parachute and an oxygen mask. She was trying to keep warm, trying to breathe normally in this extreme altitude. Trying to persuade herself that the pounding of her heart was from the altitude not because she was scared half out of her wits. Clumsily she scribbled a note to the pilot with a fur-gloved hand.

"Dear Sugar 6 Peter (the code name for this pilot)," she wrote. "What kind of band is on the radio tonight?"

The note came back addressed to Madame Cheesecake Number One. "My dearest Miss C, what kind of band would you like? We want you to be happy. And do you feel all right?"

"If I get too much oxygen, what will it do to me?" Paulette wanted to know.

"It will make you go like this." The pilot fluttered his arms in a flying motion.

Paulette giggled into her oxygen mask. "Give me some more." Then she looked down at the moonlit sinister beauty of the country below and thought of something else. "Do the Japs know we're here?"

The pilot nodded casually. Paulette swallowed hard. She grabbed the pencil again and wrote feverishly. "What did they say?"

"They're plotting our course. But relax, my dear Miss C, nothing will happen."

Oh sure. Relax. Flying over the Hump, with the Japs plotting your course. The funny part was, Paulette did relax. Just because the pilot made with the nicknames and gagged about everything, and made her laugh.

Almost as much as Keenan, who was a walking Joe Miller joke book, having been brought up on gags from the cradle by his comedian father, Ed Wynn. Bill, too, knew plenty of comedy angles. Andy made the music. Paulette was just the stooge.

Keenan gagged off stage as well as on. But one time when they made a landing for fuel on a tiny island in the middle of the ocean, his gag blew up in his face. They had just gotten off the plane and had breakfast. (They were always having breakfast, because the time changed so fast as they flew that wherever they landed, everyone was just sitting down to powdered eggs and coffee.) Anyway, after breakfast, Keenan inquired the name of the officer in charge.

"Major so-and-so," he was told.

Keenan beamed. "Say, I know that guy. He's a hell of a good egg and an old friend of mine. What a chance for a gag!" He grabbed the phone, and was connected with the Major's office.

"Good morning, Major," said Wynn, in a deep Shakespearian voice. "This is Orson Welles speaking. I have just landed with a troop of forty to put on a show here. I need some props right away. I would like one marble bathtub, two white horses, three camels, a la-a-rge banquet table complete with food—" There was a click at the other end.

"What do you know?" said Keenan. "The guy hung up. He must have recognized my voice. Guess he's on his way down here to say hello."

The major was indeed on his way down, but it is doubtful if the words he had on his mind included hello. He stalked into the mess hall looking like a khaki thunderstorm. Keenan took one look and buckled at the knees.

"Oh, my God! I never saw this character before in my life! There must be two majors by that name."

Paulette, who had been laughing like a lunatic up to now, held her breath. This could cause trouble. The major was not amused. Then Bill Gargan stepped in.

"How are you, Major? Remember me? We met last year in New York."

Fortunately, the major did remember. His granite countenance cracked around the edges. Everything was going to be all right. But Keenan didn't pull another gag for two whole days!

Anyone who has not been over the route the troupe took can't have much idea of what conditions are like. The poverty of those countries is almost incredible. There was great difficulty even in some of the large cities in getting the most ordinary necessities of life. Inflation has taken over. Paulette once paid three thousand Chinese dollars for a basin of water to wash in. Frequently she couldn't get water at all and had to use tea for her face instead, and brush her teeth in grapefruit juice. She ran out of cold cream and got a bottle of castor oil at an Army hospital to use instead. When there was water she shampooed her hair in two small basins of it. The GIs loved that nice, shiny, clean-smelling hair. One day at a camp in India, Paulette was surrounded by a bunch of soldiers asking for autographs. They were crowded in so close that back of her a young private's nose was pressed right into Paulette's freshly shampooed hair. He took a deep breath, then another.

"Oh, boy!" he said happily. "That will keep me going for another year."

One of the fighter pilots on the plane going over, used to brush Paulette's hair for her by the hour. As a reward she gave him a large autographed picture. At their first stop at a camp in India, the young pilot strutted around showing it off to everybody.

"My girl!" he informed an Indian bearer, pointing to the picture.

"Not your girl," said the Indian coldly. "Paulette Goddard. Cinema."

Oh, sure, they'd all seen her in the movies—Indians, English, Chinese, Americans. But they were pretty curious about what she looked like in person. The plane would land at an installation, and everyone would rush out and stare.

"Well, hello!" Paulette would say gayly to the crowd. But they were shy. They just went on staring silently, their eyes taking in the heavenly sight of a girl.

"Please," Paulette would beg, "somebody say something. Can't you say hello?"

Then the storm would break. Everyone cheering and calling greetings and flocking around. Bill and Keenan shaking hands with them all, and Paulette—always—picking out one GI and kissing him.

The soldiers did odd, touching little things. Like the joe who rushed up one day just as she was leaving and said, "Here, Paulette!" He thrust a beautiful little ring into her hand and was gone. The plane took off, and she never saw him again, never knew his name. But she wears the ring now, always.

At one jungle post, Paulette was dressing for the show in an ambulance, as usual. There was a knock. "Come in," she said, and a very GI hand appeared. It held a bouquet of orchids as big as your head. There were, in fact, exactly a thousand of them. The soldiers had been picking them for hours. Paulette promptly put on a purple dress to match and arranged the flowers into an orchid hat that would have knocked Lilly Daché cold.

AUGUST 11

We know lotsa things, secrets 'n' stuff—and we're going to spill all in September's MODERN SCREEN. Interested? Well, better pick us up August 11 if you don't want to be let down—we're the hard-to-get kind.

Then there was the boy in China who brought her a bullet hollowed out and filled with water, and violets in it. Like a tiny vase. The violets were cool and lovely and seemed suddenly to make the grim reality of war recede a little. They were so much like home. "They sort of reminded me of you," the boy said shyly.

Things like that pulled her heart right to pieces. These kids—doing a tremendous job, hating it, but doing it to the very best of their ability. And all the while thinking wistfully of home. The truck driver on the Burma road who wants to finish the war in a hurry and get back to piloting his taxi around Brooklyn. The tall Texans who always yelled, "Take a nice tall glass of milk for me when you get back to the States." The boys who gave you a phone number on a piece of paper and said, "Look, would you call Mom when you get back? You can't tell her where I am, but just say I'm okay." Paulette had about five thousand of those messages by the time she got back.

She wore a uniform, traveling—a regular USO Camp Shows uniform. Because she had to wear high boots, she shortened the skirt to exactly four inches above the knee. And you know Paulette's knees! But she always changed out of the uniform before each show into an evening dress that would really put their eye out. Scarlet or purple or the white sequin number. She was there to give those kids as much glamour as she could manage in a jungle installation a million miles from nowhere.

Before she left for home, she gave away all her dresses and sweaters—everything but shoes and uniform, to the few girls she met out there. Flight nurses and Red Cross hostesses. The Red Cross is doing a terrific job. The troupe saw its representatives at even the most remote outposts. Serving coffee and doughnuts, doing anything that had to be done.

Keenan and Bill were pretty wonderful to Paulette. They took care of her like a kid sister. They were sweet. They kidded her all the while, of course. Bill insisted that the first time he was ever propositioned by a girl was the night the Army gave Paulette a whole empty barracks to sleep in. She was scared to death. Bill came over at bedtime to see if she needed water or anything, and Paulette grabbed him frantically and pulled him inside.

"Darling!" she said. "Please come over here and sleep! And bring Keenan and Andy with you!"

They met a lot of exciting people on the trip. General Stillwell, who gave them a scroll calling them "Uncle Joe's Dead End Kids," because they had gone clear to the end of the line. General Chennault, who is myth and magic and inspiration to everyone who meets him. Lord Montbatten who entertained them in New Delhi. But somehow those aren't the people Paulette remembers oftenest. Instead she thinks of the GI joes, who sweat and swear and work like Army mules. The boys who waved good-by after every stop and said "Good luck, Paulette. And thanks for coming." Paulette thinks it should be the other way—"Thanks, boys for letting me come. It's been tops!"

"ONE PUNCH" LUNDIGAN

Montezuma, Bill Lundigan was making with the feet in boot camp. As this is written, he is at Quantico, Virginia, enrolled in the Photographic Section of the Ciné School, taking training that the Marine Corps puts to crucial combat use.

His family is of the opinion that he should make an excellent fighting man. Not, you understand, that he ever deliberately picked a fight, but from the time he and his brothers were small fry, their father encouraged them to learn how to handle themselves.

bill, the battler . . .

When two of the boys got into a wrangle, they were equipped with gloves and sent out into the huge Lundigan back yard to settle the difference of opinion. It usually required only a few positive blows; the Lundigans were too devoted to slug it out with squared-circle venom.

Bill won his first fight when he was six. The evidence was not on his face nor skinned from his fists, for this time his clothes were the guilty informers.

"What happened to your clean shirt, Bill?" asked Mother Lundigan.

"A kid grabbed me and tore my shirt so I hit him—hard," said Bill. "Then he hit me back, then I hit him real hard, and he went away and left me alone."

Sometime later, when he was going through the Boy Scouts, knot by knot, he earned his hundred yard swimming pin and wore it proudly on his sweater. While proceeding innocently down the street one evening, Bill was assailed by a newsboy who saw the pin and made a flying tackle at same, hoping to make the jewelry spoils of war. He hadn't calculated on the Lundigan leather training. Bill's educated fist shot out once, twice, three times. The newsboy lost interest in Boy Scout pins.

As practically every one of Bill's fans who has seen his work in pictures such as "The Fighting 69th," or "North West Rangers," or "Dr. Gillespie's Criminal Case," "Back To God's Country," "International Squadron," or "Salute To The Marines"—is well aware, the Lundigans are a family of six. Beg pardon—nine. They are Mr. and Mrs. Mike Lundigan, the proud parents of four praiseworthy sons, and the following line-up: Bill, the oldest, Bob, who is an armored infantry lieutenant now overseas, Jack, and Ted. Bob is married to Muriel, and Jack is married to Eugenia and is the father of Miss Sharon Ann. That makes a total family of nine.

It is a particularly well-integrated family, about which the slogan "All for one and one for all" suddenly seems simple truth and never fraternal corn.

The sharing began when the boys were little, and the best dressed Lundigan was the first one up in the morning. They swapped clothes as fast as they became the same size.

Bill was the tidiest of the boys. He didn't always hang up everything, but he certainly wanted his outfit to be spotless and well-pressed the next morning. To this end he was frequently found working over the ironing board despite a twitting from Jack whose ensembles were strictly on the foot-loose and fancy-free order.

This insouciance sometimes came to Bill's attention. So did ears squashed too firmly to the ground during football practice, or knuckles remembering too well the black loam encountered during a marble game. A friend of the family once remarked, upon asking for Bill and being

"Guess My Age!"

New Kind of Face Powder Makes Her Look Years Younger!

ONCE this lovely girl looked quite a bit older. Some people thought she was approaching middle age.

For she was the innocent victim of an unflattering face powder! It showed up every tiny line in her face—accented every little skin fault—even seemed to exaggerate the size of her pores.

But look at her now! Can you guess her age? Would you say she is 20-30-35?

At last she has found a face powder that flatters her skin—makes it look younger, more enchanting!

Why Lady Esther Face Powder Is So Flattering

Lady Esther Face Powder is extra flattering because it's made differently. It isn't just mixed, just sifted, in the usual way. It's blown by Twin Hurricanes—blended with the speed and power of hurricanes—to look clearer, smoother and more flattering on your skin!

Because of this patented, exclusive method of hurricane blending, the texture of Lady Esther Face Powder is much smoother and finer than ordinary powder. The first touch of your puff spreads a delicate film of beauty on your skin, hiding little lines, little blemishes. And Lady Esther Face Powder clings longer, too—clings four long hours!

But the most exciting difference is in the shades. Lady Esther shades have a subtle new quality—because the color is blown in by hurricanes. Many women say that the Lady Esther shades are so fresh and alive that ordinary powder shades seem dull and drab by comparison.

Try Lady Esther Face Powder! See for yourself, in your own mirror, how much smoother and younger it makes your skin look. Get the small-size box and try it today!

told he was upstairs at that moment, "It seems to me that every time I come over to see you, I find that Bill is busy bathing one of the boys."

In addition to being Vice-President In Charge Of Soap, Bill was also Assistant General Fun Maker. Partly because he always entered into any game with enthusiasm, and partly because he was a handy man to have around in a pinch. One Christmas Jack received a motor scooter, but the weather was too bad to try it out during the first ten days of ownership. However, one freezing night in January, blue with frost and cracker-brittle with crisp snow—Jack and Bill tried the scooter out on a hill. Mrs. Lundigan waved them good-by and issued maternal caution.

A few moments later the front doorbell rang, and some psychic impulse sent her running to answer. There stood Bill, holding Jack. "Send for the doctor," said Bill between white lips. He carried Jack up to his room, put him down gently, then hurried to get a wet towel to wash Jack's face, crimson from the long cut above his left eye. The doctor took three or four stitches in the wound, and the scooter was retired from service for several months.

Some time later, Bill was a casualty. It was a result, not of athletic adventure, but of financial ambition. From the time Bill was old enough to convince customers of his sincerity and knowledge of stock, he had helped his father in Mr. Lundigan's shoe store. For this labor, he was paid (and so were the other boys as they grew up and attained poise enough to talk combination lasts, short vamps and hand-turned soles) a salary of $2.50 per week. But his generosity constantly pauperized him. He was always buying presents.

To bolster the exchequer, he was constantly thinking up new lines of enterprise. One day, during a quiet period in the shop, Mr. Lundigan glanced around to find that his eldest son was nowhere about. He was just ruminating over the mysteries of juvenile conduct when he heard a reverberating shout from a spot only a few inches away from dead center of the store doorway, and hurried out to find Mr. William Lundigan in the newspaper business. It seems that Bill, loitering near the doorway, had heard nearby newsboys burst forth with an extra. The newspaper office was only a block down the street, so Bill had bee-lined down, secured an emergency position on the paper and gone forth with energy and a dauntless pair of lungs.

You've been wondering about the casualty caused by his financial manipulation? To wit: Bill had a very pretty girl friend whose father owned a confectionery. Seeking to add to his income and to be handy in case the lady of his heart-flutters should appear, he applied for a job at the candy shop. As a likely lad was always needed, Bill was put to work. "What's the deal about all this candy?" he asked politely, moistening his lips so as not to drool.

In the established practice of sweet-vendors, the proprietor told Bill that the employees were allowed to eat all the candy they wanted. A sound policy.

Bill tried the chocolate creams and found them delightful. Then he unpacked some goods and put them away. He tried the nougats and approved them. Then he swept the stock room. He tried the milk chocolate cherries and decided they were all right. Then, rather slowly, he cut wax paper. He tried the fudge—all three flavors—and decided that there was something vaguely peculiar about the flavor. So he washed a window. And sampled the chocolate-coated nut meats. They were definitely, absolutely . . . oh, well. He didn't feel very well, anyway. As a matter of fact, he couldn't recall any period of his life at which he had felt sicker.

He lagged over to the shoe store, his face a dill-pickle green. "Working in a candy store is awfully tiresome work," he confided. Then he went home.

The first gift he ever bought for his mother was an indication of the Lundigan taste. Mrs. Lundigan's birthday is November nineteenth, perilously adjacent to Christmas for the junior budget. However, Bill—just beginning high school—had been attending to all manner of odd jobs since the term began that fall. He had his eye on something highly appropriate.

The Lundigans always have made much over birthdays—even this year when only one son could be present at Father Lundigan's natal celebration, they had a big cake, candles, presents beside his plate, and two voices joined in singing "Happy Birthday To You."

subtle propaganda . . .

On that long ago day, there were five masculine melodists to chant the refrain. And when Mrs. Lundigan unwrapped the parcel from Bill, she opened her eyes and rounded a soft little OH with surprised lips. Bill, from his earnings, had purchased a lapis lazuli pendant.

Bill's birthday falls on June twelfth. The year he was to be graduated from high school, he was somewhat explicit about the fact that it would be extremely unfair for anyone to overlook a person's birthday just because one happened to be getting a diploma at approximately the same time.

A day or so later he was late for dinner. He apologized roundly and condemned the fact that he lacked a watch. "A wrist watch," he said without reference to any holiday near or far, "is a very useful item."

In the ensuing weeks, he mentioned—with the utmost casualness—the general type, size and price of desirable wrist watches. He mentioned certain friends who were almost certain to get watches for graduation and how lucky they were.

On June thirteenth, that ticking to be heard came from the Lundigan wrist.

l'amour, l'amour . . .

Bill's romantic life began at a very early age. When he was a gay blade of six, he came home from school one day and took up a certain problem with his mother. "Do you and Dad know some people named Forester?"

"Yes, indeed," said Mother Lundigan warmly. "Your father and I know the young Foresters very well and like them."

"Well, their little girl—her name is Florence—came up to me at school today," said Bill in the tone of a deacon at whom a pretty parishioner has made eyes, "and told me that she knew my mother and father. I just wanted to be sure."

After that, there was an understanding between Bill and Florence. The understanding seemed to be that Bill would carry her books home from school, and that she would sit in idolatrous admiration when Bill—against his better judgment—sang in the church choir. However, his juvenile revulsion to singing in public restrained him from any musical feat of memory. Even from learning "Gypsy Love Song," his favorite melody. Currently, his taste runs to Chopin, Debussy and Wagner.

For three years, Bill and Florence were an item. They attended the same junior parties and agonized over the same math problems. When Florence was absent from school one day, Bill had his mother call up the Forester home to learn the reason: Florence had measles.

The next day Bill, without a word to anyone, extracted a sizeable sum from his odd job earnings and ordered flowers for Florence. It was his initial experience in gallantry, and when his mother commended him for it—after she had talked to Florence's mother—he blushed way up to his tousled blonde crop.

In the days that followed, Florence's measles gave way to spinal meningitis, and Florence—at nine—became a brown-eyed, dark-haired memory. As Bill grew up, he used to say to his mother occasionally, "Do you know who would fit into this gang of ours? Florence."

In high school days, Bill had his quota of romances, one of which appeared to be quite serious. However, after he came to California, the girl married another man. For many months Bill and Columbia's Marguerite Chapman were a constant twosome, but this romance, too, seems ended.

During this formative period, Bill did most of his studying on the floor in front of the radio. During a particularly good program he would say, "That's where I'm going to be some day—handling a show like that." No one paid much attention.

Yet, after his second year in University, he secured a summer time job in the Syracuse radio station. He was doing commercials and gradually organized a series of daytime shows. When fall came, Bill had another of his heart-to-heart talks with his father. "I'm not going back to school, if you don't mind, Dad," he said.

Mr. Lundigan had cherished a longtime ambition for his eldest son to study law. He felt that Bill could build a brilliant future for himself, not alone because of his abilities, but because the Lundigans knew many influential persons in politics. Mrs. Lundigan had long been Democratic State Committeewoman, and the Lundigan home had entertained such guests as Governor and Mrs. Al Smith, Governor and Mrs. Lehman and dozens of other celebrated politicos. On a radio occasion, a group of announcers were tried out for a job of emceeing a convention. When Bill won the competition, the sponsor said cheerfully that Fate had singled out, to introduce Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt over the air, the only contestant who knew—on personal terms—the Roosevelt family.

Despite his family contacts, Bill didn't want to study law. He had made his own opportunity in radio and had gone forward under his own power. He believed in the future of that industry and wanted to be a part of it. Yet, while he was on vacation in New York, the long arm of Universal Studios reached out and tapped him for a screen test. Bill, returning to Syracuse after the holiday, had a long talk with his parents, cosily draped over various items of kitchen furniture.

"If this goes through," said Bill dazedly, feeling as if he had bought a cheap ticket in an overseas Steeple Chase, "I'll hear on the fifteenth," and sure enough, on the morning of March fifteenth, Universal telephoned . . . not the New York office, but the Hollywood authorities themselves.

Bill had been in Hollywood only a few months when he began to be conscious of a serious lack: He missed his family as he had never missed anything before.

He wrote twice, three, and four times a week; occasionally he telephoned. The theme of this ardent literary effort, and the gist of all wired conversations was: "Please come to California." The Lundigans discussed it and decided that in union there was happiness.

Currently, whenever Bill gets leave, he makes a bee-line for a certain homelike apartment in Hollywood where his mother has (by dint of much point manipulation) a steak, chocolate cake and apple pie.

M-G-M has a nice feast waiting for him too: A juicy contract going into effect the day the war is over. Great day.

WHAT A BLONDE!

when other people are sleeping. One day when things were looking pretty desperate, Lou Costello offered us his pine-panelled trailer. It was on the back lot of the studio, but who could be fussy? Anyway, the river gurgled just 20 feet away, and the woods in back were thick and green. Lovely. Only trouble was, you couldn't stick your head out for air without finding a pack of Zulus camping in the front yard. Well, Zulus are O.K. and so are Indians and Zombies. But the day I rolled out of bed and looked square into the face of that thing . . . holy smokes! It had two heads, both green, and hair on its cheeks and . . . Well, anyhow, that afternoon we moved. It was too bad though, except for those roving extras, it was just like Central Park."

"Did I hear you say Central Park? And if you did, please say it again."

"Central Park."

The rookie smiled. "I sure like the way that sounds."

"I like the way it looks," said Susie. "We rode through it one night in a buggy."

"A what?"

"A buggy."

"Yeah? When?"

"Couple of months ago. I'd gone to New York for a week or so, but the first few days weren't too much fun. Just night clubs and stores, and they look the same anywhere. Then one night from my hotel window, I saw a hansom in the street below."

"Gee," said the soldier, "on my next furlough in New York that's what I do, first thing."

"And then we went down to the Battery and took a ferry over to somewhere."

"Staten Island?"

"I don't remember. But anyhow, it was cold and awfully drizzly, and the ferry looked like a Toonerville Trolley, only bigger. Next morning my throat felt like an emery board, and they dumped me into bed with a temperature. But I didn't mind, really, 'cause the night before had been so much fun."

The soldier let out a slow sigh, then grinned. "Gee! You'd be some date!"

VAN JOHNSON

coach seat in which he rode to Grand Central Station. He had been down to New York only once before in his life. That was when he was fourteen.

There had been an argument with his father one morning and, as happens to all youngsters, Van decided he was wronged and would leave home. A letter from his mother shortly before had asked, "Don't you think it's time you came to visit me in New York?" So Van had packed up his spare wardrobe, taken the Fall River line and a train out to Long Island to the little town where his mother lived. "What would you like to do?" had been her first question.

"See shows!" Van had answered without a second's hesitation.

So his mother gave him money every day or so—carfare into Manhattan, the price of matinee balcony seats at Broadway theaters. Van took in just about every play running on Broadway that summer. He saw actresses like Katharine Cornell, Helen Hayes, Tallulah Bankhead, Ethel Barrymore. All by himself he sat in the peanut gallery and drank it in. Afterwards, he rode the commuter back out to Sunnyside, L. I., his brain racing with the afternoon's glamour. Van's mother was generous. It was her way of making up to him after long years of separation.

No one had ever pampered Van before with such treats. He stayed on with his mother, and when school opened in the fall, he enrolled there. The Long Island kids were plenty tough and mocked him for a hick, and he soon got homesick for Newport. Then his grandmother had a bad fall and developed pneumonia. Van was called home right before she died. He hadn't seen his mother or New York since.

ridin' around in the rain . . .

Now he had her address tucked firmly inside his pocket—a new address, out on Sheepshead Bay, because his mother had married once more. Van cashed his $5 bill into change, with plenty of nickels. He squeezed into the subway a cop recommended and headed for his mother's. He thought maybe she would give him a place to sleep. But getting to his mother's new address was something else.

The subway rocketed through the tubes, and Van almost snapped his rubberneck off trying to make sense of the street names and numbers on the shiny tiled stations that flashed by. He rode for hours it seemed, although it was really minutes.

It was late at night before Van finally found his way to his mother's house and pounded on the door. It was raining, his hatless red mop of hair was plastered forlornly down on his face, his cheap raincoat was soaking, the trousers of his new brown suit were a soggy black and the straw suitcase no longer shiny. The only thing not wet about Van was his spirits.

His mother opened the door—and almost fell over at the sight of her bedraggled son. But she made him dry off and told Van it was all right for him to stay there. In the morning she pressed ten dollars into his hand. "You can't go around New York without a hat," she told him. She ironed out his crinkled trousers, and Van set out for Broadway. He didn't buy the hat—but there were those actorish brown brogues. . . .

The only friends Van had in New York were two girls from Newport. Beth and Ann were daughters of U. S. Navy commanders, and they were both crazy about the theater. Like Van in Newport, they dreamed of coming down to New York and crashing Broadway. With him, too, they used to snag occasional walk-ons at the Casino in summer plays and stand around in awe of the great stars.

The summer Van got his clam frying job at "The Barnacle" Beth and Ann left Newport. They told Van good-by. "We're going to New York all by ourselves," they exulted. "Mother has given us fifty dollars to join Equity. We're going to stay at the Rehearsal Club, where Margaret Sullavan and lots of famous stars have lived. It's the real theater atmosphere."

"Gosh—are you lucky!" Van had marveled. He knew nobody would ever give him fifty dollars for anything, unless he earned it. At that point, getting out of Newport and living in New York seemed like a wild, impossible dream. And when Beth and Ann sent him back letters packed with famous stage names and glamorous activities and even reports of real jobs in Broadway shows, Van's stomach squirmed with envy.

They had been on Broadway all summer. Van regarded Beth and Ann as veterans and authorities on what to do. He looked them up the first day, as full of questions as a watermelon is seeds.

Beth and Ann had all the answers about the brave new world of the theater. They weren't really serious about Broadway like Van was. To them it was fun no end and a big lark. But they did have some good ideas. About whom to see and when and how to do it. About how to eat on pennies and where to go for lunch and what gyp-joints to stay away from. About the set-up of agents and the kind of front to put on. They taught him Broadway lingo and sharp talk. Van was a good listener and an eager beaver.

One thing Beth and Ann wised Van on was this: Beginners on Broadway have to sell themselves. Before they ever get near a real job on a stage, they have to convince an agent they've got personality. Beth and Ann had stories galore of how other youngsters had sold themselves, with this or that outstanding quirk or facet of their personalities; they related their own efforts to make an impression. "You've got a swell smile, Van," they told him. "Sell it! Use that smile until every agent on Broadway knows it. That's your selling point. Now remember."

Van didn't forget. His smile won him his first chance at a part—and within the first pavement-pounding week, too. Van started out cracking Broadway agents' offices like he used to crack clams. He'd make two dozen a day, shagging from one end of the bustling, bewildering street to the other, sitting and waiting, trying to warm up cold-eyed secretaries. But for four days he never got beyond the inevitable swinging gate that separated the sheep from the goats. He was just another starry-eyed kid, and nobody knew him from Adam. He'd come down town from Sheepshead Bay on an early subway, pound away at casting offices all morning, slip his nickles into the Automat at noon and burn up his suede shoes all afternoon. He had to catch the 6:40 express back to his mother's house or he wouldn't eat. Van liked to eat, so he usually quit at six sharp. But on the fifth night, hustling past the French Casino Building on Broadway on his way to the subway kiosk, Van spotted a light burning in an office. He'd played musical chairs in that particular agent's office the day before for hours and never had got past the secretary. A bright thought struck him: Maybe at this hour the job hunters would be gone, but the agent would still be at work.

Sure enough, the office door was open, but the reception room was empty. The agent, Murray Phillips, was in his private office, but his wife was at the reception desk. She eyed Van.

"Mr. Phillips isn't in," she said. Van smiled. She looked at him again. "I remember you," she said.

"You DO?" Van turned on his smile.

"Yes," she said, "now that you smile. Wait a minute." She opened the private door and called to her husband. "Maybe this one is it." The gate swung open, and Van had his first interview. He kept smiling, and he lied glibly about all the experience he'd had. The job was a singing spot. Van let on like he was an undiscovered Sinatra.

"Okay," Phillips finally said. "Be down at nine tomorrow morning, Cherry Lane Theater, for an audition."

Van never even missed the dinner he'd skipped that night. He spent the evening wandering up and down Broadway looking for the Cherry Lane Theater. Somehow he pictured it a glorious, resplendent house, and he saw himself walking regally in the stage door while Broadway crowds gaped. A first crack at Broadway will do that to anyone—especially a romantic, head-in-the-clouds small town boy like Van Johnson was then. But it didn't turn out to be exactly a crack at Broadway. Finally, Van discovered that the Cherry Lane Theater wasn't on Broadway at all. It was down at Greenwich Village. And next morning when he showed up there, it was hard to mask his disappointment with that winning smile. The Theater—a favorite breaking-in place for intense Greenwich Village hopefuls (Jennifer Jones and husband Bob Walker used to act there in their hungry days), was a tiny, dark little box where roaches and rats chased around at will, it seemed to Van.

But the tiny stage was lighted, and the cast members were already rehearsing. All had been chosen except Van. When they stopped the rehearsals for his audition, Van felt curious eyes burn on him.

The piano player banged a chord. "Okay, kid," he said. "What will you sing?"

Van sang "I'm in the Mood for Love" with his hands awkwardly in his pockets. His throat felt dry and cracked, and he was sure he squeaked.

"Try it again."

tempest in a teacup . . .

Van did. Then he sang a couple of other songs, and his voice came back to him. He kept smiling, too, bravely, although he was scared silly. But he got by.

"Okay," said the director curtly. Then he turned his attention to the others. Maybe because Van's spot wasn't half as important to the show as it was to Van. "Entre Nous" was the name of Van Johnson's first stage job. It was a series of sketches and skits, blackouts, jokes and songs. Most of the cast were eager, anxious kids just like Van Johnson, pathetic kids who thought, like Van, that "Entre Nous" would unlock Broadway's gates pronto. They all worked like beavers, hauling up the curtain, shifting scenery, doubling in the ensemble between their specialties. And all of them found themselves without a job in four quick weeks.

It didn't discourage him. Far from it. Looking back, Van can see what a small-time break it was, how pathetic and struggling all the kids were, how tiny the tempest in a teacup. But he built it up in glowing terms to himself, and he wrote his Newport pals, Lois and Mary and Dorothy Gladding, and his father about his big "success." They thought it was wonderful, too, all except his dad. He wrote, "I'll expect you home soon."

"Entre Nous" did something else for Van. It initiated him into a little crowd of ambitious kids just like himself. His happy knack of making friends eased him in at once. He became a member of "The Penn-Astor Club."

That's what the bunch who hung around the Penn-Astor Drug Store on Broadway called themselves. Every member was deep in the business of making Broadway budge. All toted little kits of their photographs and address books with agents' phone numbers. All were broke and all were hungry. They'd gather there at lunch time, pass on job tips, gossip, describe good news and bad breaks.

Smile. . . . Smile. . . . Smile. Van was to get that every inch of the way to Hollywood. People liked him when he smiled. But sometimes it was hard to remember. Finally it got to be a habit, no matter how Van felt. Smile when the show opened, even if you were scared white. Grin when it flopped and closed, even if you were stony broke. Smile when the agents said, "Sorry!" Van had to kick himself in the pants more than once to keep pressing forward, smiling, shoving his way in, being aggressive like you had to be on Broadway if you ever expected to get a foot in that fame door. He was breezy and brash with his pals. He still said, "I'll do it!" to every chance that popped anywhere. But underneath Van remained the shy country kid from Newport, and he's still that way today. But he was lucky. On the rare times his nerve failed him, something would force his hand. Like his break in his first big show "New Faces."

tap-happy . . .

He was back from Boston only a few days and out massaging the pavements again when the Penn-Astor Club grapevine came through with an important flash. They were looking for youngsters who could dance at the Vanderbilt Theater. And the show was strictly big-time, a Broadway production. Van hustled up there—but this time, instead of his builder-upper brown brogues he changed to a pair of tap-shoes with metal tips.

When Van arrived at the Vanderbilt, it looked as if every hungry young actor in New York was on hand for a try-out. The theater was dark inside and gloomy. Van found a seat on the front row and propped his feet disconsolately on the orchestra rail. "I can't go up there and try out with all this mob," he told himself. "I haven't a chance." He was sitting there, deep in the dumps and ready to call it off when the dance director stepped out on the stage. He looked over the candidates before he said a thing. His eyes traveled up and down the rows. A metal gleam caught his eye—Van's tap-tips. They were the only ones visible. The director was in a hurry, and he had a big chorus to cast.

"Hey you!" he yelled. "You with the tap-shoes. Come up here!" Van found himself climbing on the stage, still dazed and surprised. "Do a time-step." Van did. "Okay." Van had a job—just like that.

Because "New Faces" was a big show on Broadway. It ran nine long months, and every week Van Johnson drew his forty dollar equity minimum. It was another pot-pourri of sketches, blackouts and song and dance numbers. Van hoofed in the "ensemble," which is polite for chorus; he stooged in a specialty number and helped out the stage manager.

But "New Faces" was more important to Van than just his first steady job on Broadway. It put him at last completely on his own. With a few frogskins in his wallet, he could afford to pull out from his mother's house, because that welcome was wearing off. She really didn't understand Van any more than his father did.

too busy for love . . .

Van found a room in a brownstone house on 45th Street—six dollars a week. Bed, bureau, basin and the bathroom down the hall. There wasn't much closet space, but that didn't bother him. He still had just his brown suit, a few theatrical costumes he'd had to buy, the straw suitcase and the red-and-black skullcap he wore in a collegiate number for one of Dorothy Gladding's Newport shows.

Van was still a rabid movie fan. After the evening's performance in "New Faces," he'd take in the midnite show at the Capitol, watching Lew Ayres in "Doctor Kildare" and a dozen others right after dancing before Broadway audiences. On odd afternoons sometimes he could squeeze in a matinee, look at other Broadway hits.

Van hadn't forgotten Newport. Whenever he had the price of a ticket he would run up for the week-end. Each time his father thought certainly he'd come back to stay, he'd be surprised again when Van went back to New York. Van still saw Beth and Ann. But Lois had left Newport and it wasn't until much later, when Van was doing all right in "Pal Joey," that he found a note nestling in his hotel mail box one night.

"If you are red-headed and can fry clams," it read, "call Such-and-Such." Van called the number and took Lois to dinner. They spent the evening, Van recalls, talking about Lois' husband and baby.

Romance had never entered Van Johnson's life halfway seriously since he left Newport. Pretty girls were on all sides of Van every day, and their charms were well noted for future reference. But there were two good reasons why he paid them little mind. Girls cost money—and Van couldn't afford them. They took time—and Van didn't have any to spare. Because Van Johnson hadn't forgotten that to get anywhere in show business you had to get better every day. He took dancing and singing lessons constantly, even when he had to put the fees on the cuff.

Van nursed no false pride about money. He'd take any salary if he needed the dough (and he usually did) or saw a chance to learn something. In lean periods he'd run off to a tank town and sing and dance with a pick-up unit for cakes and coffee, right after holding down a solid spot in a Broadway show. After "New Faces" his next New York job was at the Roxy Theater as a chorus boy at thirty dollars a week. He did a little stooging with Abbott and Costello, too, in a slapstick act. He wasn't purse-proud. And by keeping circulating regardless of salary Van managed to make his own breaks.

At the Roxy, for instance, an acrobatic dancer named Lucille Page spied him in the "ensemble" and liked the way he looked and danced.

"How'd you like to work up a dance act with me?" she asked. Van would, definitely, as always. "Sure." Lucille was the wife of Buster West, the famous Follies specialty dancer. In no time flat Van was on the road touring wth "Buster West and Company," wearing a sailor suit, singing "September in the Rain" and learning plenty about dancing from Buster. He hopped from city to city—new ones he'd never seen before—Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington at seventy-five dollars a week and expenses. But when Lucille discovered she was to have a baby, and the act broke up, Van was right back on Broadway snatching at a chance to join up with a new male harmony team at fifty dollars per. Work was work, and you could always learn something.

They opened at Buffalo, the Eight Men of Manhattan, as they called themselves. Van had a solo, and he was sharp in the swing arrangements. He stuck and came down with the outfit to the Big Town to be booked in the city's smartest sky club, the Rainbow Room. The Eight Men wore white dinner jackets and bow ties and followed a singing star named Mary Martin, who was then the toast of the town because she had sung "My Heart Belongs to Daddy" in a Broadway show.

Rainbow Room or not, he reverted right back to the chorus on his very next job. The Broadway producer, George Abbott, getting together "Too Many Girls," heard Van's inevitable audition and barked, "No—no—not the type—next!" That might have wilted anyone but Van Johnson. But what can you do with a guy who won't be licked and says, "All right—I'll try out for the chorus!"

It wasn't just a chorus job Van was after. But that was a way in to nab the understudy spot for Dick Kollmar, one of the stars. Van never let his chorus work slip an inch. He was the hardest worker in the ensemble, but he spent his spare time at rehearsals with Jerry Whyte, the stage manager, learning the script of the show and the Rodgers and Hart songs backwards. It was a long chance, but sometimes those are the babies that come through, even if they seem to pick the most awkward moments.

Because Van was stretched out in his hotel room with freight cars rolling across his tummy the day it happened. He'd got hold of some poisoned food in a Broadway eatery, and he was as sick as a horse with the heaves. In fact, he reached for the phone to call up and report that he couldn't make the performance that night. Just as he grabbed the handle, the phone rang.

"Dick Kollmar's sick," the stage manager told him. "You go on in his spot tonight."

"Sure!" Van promised bravely.

He went on that night in a daze, singing, "I Didn't Know What Time It Was." Van wasn't kidding. He didn't. He was so bushed he could have bawled.

Later, when Dick Kollmar took off two weeks to marry Dorothy Kilgallen, Van subbed again, and for the first time he hit the Broadway columns and Big League publicity. People knew who he was. When Abbott got "Pal Joey," his next show, together, Van was in with a song and lines. He pushed his luck with every tiny break that popped up, too. Like the time in rehearsal when Gene Kelly finished one of his wonderful fast dances and found himself out of breath. Gene was supposed to go into a song next. "I'm too winded for that song right after the dance," he said. He looked at Van standing nearby, achgoing up . . .

Johnson took it. Johnson took everything anyone offered. "Sure—I'll do it." He got a dance spot with June Havoc, too, and before "Pal Joey" had played a week on Broadway. Van Johnson was at last a Name—a pretty small one, but still a Name. Leland Hayward, the Hollywood agent, offered to manage him, along with Gene Kelly and June Havoc. Van knew he was getting somewhere.

At last, too, he was making respectable money, a hundred and fifty a week. Van could afford to have a few friends and see a little life. Gene Kelly had taken a fancy to the eager, ambitious, personable Van. Gene was courting his wife, red-headed Betsy Blair, then and Gene and Betsy and June Havoc and Van were a foursome.

But now Leland Hayward got busy on his clients, ripe for Hollywood with a hit show on Broadway. Gene Kelly's offer came first, then June Havoc's. One Saturday morning Van's telephone rang.

"Can you take a plane to Hollywood tonight?" Hayward asked. "Columbia wants to make a test."

He flew out that night after the show. Van had never been in the air before, and it was rough. He was sick. They whisked him to a sound stage bright and early Monday. Van sang a song and did a dance and then he did a scene they handed him from "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" with Janet Blair.

That night Van was back on a plane headed for New York, and he played "Pal Joey" Tuesday night. He had barely had a quick glance at Hollywood. He had rolled around on airsick legs most of the time. But the soft whirr of the camera stayed in his brain, and he knew something mysterious had happened. When the news came that Columbia didn't think he was worth the price Hayward was asking, Van's spirits sagged. "Pal Joey" closed about that time, too, and Van didn't bother to start snagging another job. Instead, he went home to Newport to visit his dad.

He had barely gotten there before the telephone in the big house on Ayrault street rang. "Long distance," the operator said. "Hollywood calling."

A businesslike voice came over the wire. "This is Warner Brothers. We've just looked at your Columbia test. Will you come out right away on a contract?"

Van took a train west this time. He piled on at Grand Central lugging a brand new suitcase, a portable typewriter, a bag of apples and a book. The book was titled "The Sun Is My Undoing"—and there were plenty of times afterwards that Van Johnson wondered how he'd ever picked such prophetic reading matter.

Because the band wasn't exactly lined up to welcome Van to Hollywood.

When he strutted up the ramp into the blinding sunshine, the only crowd was a mob of anxious travelers who bumped the suitcase out of his hands. The only music was the organ in the patio. "That can't be for me," thought Van, "or can it?" Van was just another forgotten man. He sat and he waited, and he haunted his mail box at the desk, and he asked the switchboard girl if there were any calls until she began to get nasty about it. Van knew his way around Broadway, but this Hollywood was something he had never run up against. It was like punching a feather pillow—nothing happened. All he got was a nice voice at the studio saying, "We'll let you know when we need you." His check came by mail right on time every week.

It was worse because Van didn't know a soul in Hollywood. Gene Kelly was on his way out to start at M-G-M, but he'd married Betsy Blair at last and was taking a leisurely honeymoon trip through Mexico. June Havoc was in town, at RKO, but busy as a ladybird. Van would go over, hang around the set and watch her, but he felt like a hanger-onner. They'd go out on scattered nights, but most of the time Van just sat and killed time.

After five months he got the news. His option wasn't taken up. He was fired. And then, just to show you how screwy Hollywood studios can be, right after he got the old heave-ho, Warners' hired Van for the lead in a picture!

It was just a programmer, a B or maybe a C, called "Murder in the Big House." It took 12 days to shoot, and Van worked from eight in the morning till eight at night. Faye Emerson and Van had the leads. He played a reporter, and he'd never played a dramatic part in his life. There weren't any songs or dances. He was raw and awkward in front of a camera; half the time he walked out of the frame. His face was loaded with make-up and his hair long. He wore an old suit of Dennis Morgan's. He went to see the dailies every night, and he crept out of the studio feeling low and lonesome, back to a little fifty-dollar-a-month apartment he had rented. When he saw his other Broadway friends, Desi Arnaz and Eddie Bracken, who had been with him in "Too Many Girls," Van was vague about what he was doing. They were all going places—June, Gene, all of them—except Van. When he finished "Murder in the Big House," Van walked off the lot and packed his suitcase. He sold the little car he'd bought, purchased a ticket to New York.

But Van's luck wouldn't let him down—not yet. Before his train left he went to dinner at Dave Chasen's star-favored dinner spot. Lucille Ball, who is Desi Arnaz's wife, had invited Van and June. In the middle of his steak Van heard someone say, "Hello, Van!"

It was Billy Grady, M-G-M's head talent scout. Once on Broadway he had spotted Van and suggested he try for an M-G-M contract, but to Van then that was a wild dream, and he didn't think he was ready. Now Grady looked like an angel.

"How are you doing?" he asked.

Van couldn't help laughing. "Great!" he answered, with his wonderful smile, "I've just been fired, and I'm going back to New York tonight!"

"You ought to have come out when I told you to," said Grady. "But come over and see me anyway before you leave."

"Sure," promised Van, "Okay." He turned to Lucille Ball. "He's just being nice," Van explained.

"Like heck, he is!" chorused the girls. "Don't you dare leave tonight. Get over there the first thing in the morning."

Mr. Grady wasn't being just nice at all. He knew a good picture bet when he saw one; that's his specialty. This time Van's test was set up right. Lillian Burns, M-G-M's dramatic coach, prepped him. He made the test with Donna Reed in a scene from "Seven Sweethearts." Two days later the contract was signed and sealed.

All in all, Van Johnson has had the warmth and understanding to which his own warm sensitive nature responds at M-G-M. He's still shy enough to creep into his own previews alone and modest enough invariably to be sure he's terrible. But that's a good sign. Starring in M-G-M's "Crime Does Not Pay" shorts, as Jimmy Stewart and Bob Taylor did before him, Van has climbed steadily up, through the "Dr. Gillespie" series to "Pilot Number Five," "The Human Comedy," "A Guy Named Joe," "The White Cliffs of Dover" and now, "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo." So it would indeed be a happy Hollywood ending right here to the success story of this Newport, R. I., native, if tragedy hadn't struck Van just when he was really starting to roll.

That was the night he went to dinner at the home of his pal, Keenan Wynn, and then decided, as he had a million times before, to take in a movie. They were running "Keeper of the Flame" at the studio. Crossing Venice Boulevard, only two blocks away, a fast car smacked into him broadside, and Van found himself in the gutter with blood streaming down across his eyes. "Is it raining?" Van asked.

I won't go into the gruesome details except to say that by all rights Van should have ended his wordly as well as his Hollywood career then and there. He lost three quarts of blood.

At that it was seventy-two hours before the doctor gave him a prayer to live. And even as kind as everyone was to Van at the studio throughout his brain operation and the long weeks of convalescence, he was still haunted by the deathly fear that he would lose his memory and never again be able to learn his lines.

But just to show you what Van Johnson is made of—no sooner had he set foot on the lot than three pictures wanted him.

"Sure—I'll do it," said Van, as always. And there he was, just out of his grave on a rain check, bicycling between three pictures at the same time!

But out of all tragedy peep some gleams of good, however small. In the hospital Van read "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo," the saga of Ted Lawson, that flying Yank with all the guts in the world, and because Lawson had spent plenty of time in operating rooms and looked death in the eye, Van felt that maybe his own crack-up, however uninspired, has made him have a better feel for the part that is his very best bid for stardom so far.

Because it looks as if Van will have to resign himself to being a Hollywood star for quite a while. His smash-up made him a pretty thorough 4-F. He has to take it easy from now on, and while making movies is no rest cure exactly, it's more in line with his current physical capabilities than lugging a rifle and full field pack.

But whether in uniform or out, Van Johnson stacks up today as quite a beloved Hollywood hero to a lot of people.

Metro's legion of star soldiers have earned a lot of things—rapid promotions and responsible posts, campaign ribbons galore and things like Distinguished Flying Crosses, too. Although when they went in, almost to a man they could agree with Clark Gable.

Clark stated it bluntly the day he signed up as an Air Corps private, got his long, black hair cropped GI style and his moustache obliterated. "I don't know beans about the Army," he said. And like Jimmy Stewart, he added, "I'm here to learn."

That's the attitude that has made first class fighting men out of most of M-G-M's silver screen variety. Take the case of Bob Montgomery, pardon, Lieutenant-Commander Robert Montgomery, U.S.N.R., Guadalcanal veteran, ex-PT boat commander, invalided home once, now back hunting Japs somewhere in the South Pacific. Commander Montgomery didn't get salty that way overnight or by rolling over in bed and calling up his favorite press-agent.

Jimmy Stewart—excuse—Major James Stewart, U. S. Army Air Corps, holds the "first to go" record at M-G-M. Jimmy signed up on March 22, 1941, nine months before Pearl Harbor. But actually, Bob DOCTORS KNOW that too many women still do not have up-to-date information about certain physical facts. And too many who think they know have only half-knowledge. So, they still rely on ineffective or dangerous preparations.

You have a right to know about the important medical advances made during recent years in connection with this intimate problem. They affect every woman's health and happiness.

And so, with the cooperation of doctors who specialize in women's medical problems, the makers of Zonite have just published an authoritative new book, which clearly explains the facts. (See free book offer below.)

YOU SHOULD, however, be warned here about two definite threats to happiness. First, the danger of infection present every day in every woman's life. Second, the most serious deodorization problem any woman has . . . one which you may not suspect. And what to use is so important. That's why you ought to know about Zonite antiseptic.

USED IN THE DOUCHE (as well as for a simple every-day routine of external protection) Zonite is both antiseptic and deodorant. Zonite deodorizes, not by just masking, but by actually destroying odors. Leaves no lasting odor of its own.

Zonite also immediately kills all germs and bacteria with which it comes in contact. Yet contains no poisons or acids. No other type of liquid antiseptic-germicide is more powerful, yet so safe. Your druggist has Zonite.

Montgomery got the first preview of World War II's triple feature horror bill. Bob was in England making a picture when Hitler's hordes swept like a bloody flood across France. In no time flat, Montgomery was at the wheel of an Allied ambulance, bouncing over the shell-pitted roads hauling shattered French poilus back to base hospitals. He was bombed and strafed, and once a Stuka swooped down on his ambulance to murder a patient within and leave Bob miraculously unharmed. Bob lived through the hell of the Fall of France.

What he'd seen made him fighting mad. What he craved to be was a fighting man. So in July, 1941, before Pearl Harbor shook America out of bed, Bob enlisted in the Naval Reserve and was commissioned a lieutenant. Next day he left for London assigned to Naval Intelligence as Assistant Naval Attache to the American Embassy. Before the war the Montgomerys had made many trips to England. Bob had pals in British government circles, and the Navy thought he could do a swell job there.

But like all Americans who put on Navy blue, Lieutenant Montgomery fretted at his cozy desk job. But like Clark Gable, Bob realized he "didn't know beans" about the Navy. You don't officer a U. S. fighting ship in war-time unless you know your Navy stuff from away back. Montgomery started looking around for ways and means.

At the Embassy he uncovered an old-time chief petty officer with hash-marks up to his elbows, a living handbook on the U. S. Fleet. He was stationed at the Embassy at night. Bob promptly applied for night duty and got it. In the quiet midnight hours he tossed his dignity aside, worked into the CPO's confidence and finally frankly asked him all he knew.

When Lieutenant Montgomery was transferred back to Washington, still in Naval Intelligence, he was a pretty fair book sailor, but nobody suspected it—not yet. There was one thing the chief hadn't been able to teach Bob—navigation. That's pretty mathematical and technical stuff, but Bob knew what he wanted and how to get it. He boned on navigation at night, and when he knew he was ready, demanded the examination for a deck officer. It was a pretty brash thing for a green reserve "wonder" to do, and there were plenty of sly smiles among Bob's gold braid Annapolis colleagues, which vanished when he passed the stiff exam with high marks. Bob applied then for the PT boat training school at Newport, R.I., got it—and at last he was a real fighting Navy officer.

By now Commander Robert Montgomery has a record any blue water sailor can be proud of. He has served on a British destroyer in the North Sea. He's acted as Liaison Officer between the British Admiralty and Vice Admiral Robert Ghormley. He commanded a PT boat before going into action aboard a U. S. cruiser in the South Pacific in the early days when the Japs had the upper hand there. He was operations officer with a destroyer squadron that raided the Japs in Kula Gulf. And when malaria sent him back stateside, he had plenty of battle stars on his campaign ribbons and a mighty impatience to get back to sea.

In fact, after he got better, Bob was put in charge of a naval shore unit in San Pedro near Hollywood, but he quickly wangled a way to get back out where the guns roar. That's where Commander Montgomery is today, back hunting Japs—and you can bet as long as there's any naval action going on in this war, he'll find a way to be in the middle of it. He tells one on himself when he was a shore skipper at San Pedro.

Among his duties there was the unpleasant business of disciplining his men. One day a sailor was up on the carpet for some regulation rap. At the same time, one of Robert Montgomery's old M-G-M pictures was playing at the local Bijou. The sailor had taken this in, and after Bob bawled him out in his best official manner, the sailor sighed, "Gee, Sir, I wish you were still funny like you used to be in pictures!" Bob had to laugh at that, which wasn't the thing to do.

Jimmy Stewart can match Robert Montgomery's rugged record card for card. Like Bob, Jimmy wanted to swap punches with the Axis in person and knew he could handle the job from the moment he took a voluntary induction way back in March, 1941, asked for the Air Corps and got it. But like Bob, too, there were all kinds of strikes chalked up against him. If anyone anywhere has earned his Gold Oak Leaves and the Distinguished Flying Cross which brightens his blouse today, it is Major James Stewart, who was just Private J. Stewart hardly more than a couple of years ago—going through all the GI tortures that ganged up on Private Hargrove.

Being the first major movie star to line up in khaki, Jimmy, naturally shy, found himself in a spotlight about as big as the one he'd left behind in Hollywood.

He got the deglamorizing treatment at once. Mustered for mail call at Jimmy's processing camp, the sarge called his name, "Stewart!" Jimmy stepped out and back in ranks, only to hear "Stewart!" again. It was kept up for a couple dozen times because Jimmy's mail stack was still Hollywood size, and that was the Army way to rag him for his swooneroo popularity. He did KP then, too, policed latrines, and when he got his first treasured stripes as Acting Corporal, he marched his squad right into a fence! But by taking it all good-naturedly, working hard and facing his drab duties as seriously as any colossal movie part, Jimmy Stewart did Hollywood a very big favor indeed. Because he was the first to show that an M-G-M glamour boy could take it in any company.

I saw him on a furlough when he had just got those Acting Corporal's stripes, and we talked about life in the Army. He was studying everything in the Air Corps book then between duties, but he wasn't too hopeful about ever getting what he wanted—combat flying. At that point he hadn't had a finger on a fighting plane control. He was drilling rookies like himself around dusty barracks grounds. "They say I'm pretty old to fly," he said gloomily. "But gosh, I'm only thirty-three." Old for the Air Corps just the same, but nevertheless, Jimmy Stewart beat that age rap. Next time I saw Jimmy, he wore lieutenant's bars, and he was instructing basic flying. He had some new gray streaks in his mop, but he said he wasn't worrying about that. "I'm just hoping I can keep my head on my neck, gray or not," Jimmy cracked with a twinkle. He was taking green pilots up six hours every day then at Mather Field, and anybody knows that's rugged work on the nervous system. But Stewart stuck it, and soon he was flying four-motored Fortresses and instructing Fortress pilots. Then he got attached to a Fortress Squadron himself training at the Sioux City field and was on his way. Pretty soon it was Captain Stewart, overseas, with a B-17 bomber squadron roaring off on missions over Berlin. Too old? Not Jimmy Stewart, pardon again, Major James Stewart, DFC.

[illegible]u won't be hearing much from Major Stewart about his exploits in the air blitz on Naziland. He's still the shy guy who doesn't talk much. War correspondents abroad have found him clam-like copy, the very opposite of what a reporter would expect to find in a Hollywood movie star. But Jimmy Stewart knows that this time he doesn't need publicity. He's making good as an American fighting man, not a Hollywood star—but don't think all of the ham has been processed out of him.

In fact, before he left for the war front, Jimmy sneaked into a movie at the post theater one night when they were showing his last hit, "The Philadelphia Story." He sat way in the back so the other soldiers couldn't see him and sat all through the picture, just to see what the GI's really thought of him as an actor. When they gave him plenty of applause, Jimmy was almost as pleased as he was the day he got raised to Corporal. He sneaked out before it was over, but his face was tingling with a bigger thrill than his first Hollywood première handed him. "The ham in me," Jimmy explained then. "I guess I'll always have it."

Clark Gable wanted real action just as bad as Jimmy or Bob Montgomery—maybe worse. Clark had a very personal reason to get away from Hollywood and lose himself in a rugged job after Carole Lombard lost her life gallantly winging her way home to Hollywood from a bond-selling tour.

dead-eye Gable . . .

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer had no idea Clark Gable had enlisted as an Air Corps private until he walked in and told them. He didn't want any possible favors or furor. He just wanted to get to work and get over there as quickly as possible.

Clark was no flier. He's well into his forties, and if Jimmy Stewart at thirty-three was considered too ancient to fight in the clouds, Clark was practically senile and falling apart. But you get action quick in the air, and Clark had an idea he had something war planes could use—a knack for guns. Clark's major hobby for years had been big game hunting in the West.

But the Air Corps had bigger plans for Gable than aiming guns—if he could prove he was still tough enough to take it. They obliged him on the hurry-up business, shooting him right down to Miami Beach, Florida, as an air cadet, in competition with young men in the prime of youth. He asked no favors, and he got none. They gave him the works.

There was a funny thing about that trip at the start. Right before Clark enlisted, he'd been invited to spend the season at a palatial Miami Beach estate. His expectant hosts thought it would be good for him to get away from Hollywood and get hold of himself after the Carole Lombard tragedy. They didn't know about his Army plans. When he signed up, Clark wired his regrets.

A few weeks later he was walking a night guard tour right past that palatial estate, in a militarized zone now, toting a rifle, obscure in his private's uniform, minus moustache, minus Hollywood haircut, minus identity. Inside, Clark could hear people having a gay time. He grinned to himself in the dark. What a gag if he'd walk in just like he was and say "Hello." But he shook his head. The people inside never knew that their star guest invited from Hollywood was guarding the joint!

Clark's popular in the Air Corps. He's a man's man, and he's trimmed off twenty pounds and about ten years so nobody dares call him "Pop."

A year after he got his commission, Captain Clark Gable stood up to be decorated with the Air Medal, for "courage and coolness and skill" in bomber missions over Germany. An "exceptionally meritorious achievement," the citation read.

Clark's unit brought back some fifty thousand feet of film, taken in air combat. Editing that with the First Motion Picture Unit in Hollywood into a dramatic Air Corps record of their private invasion has been Clark's job for the past few months, and aside from a few dates, he's spent most nights huddled over the reels of film at the laboratory. Any day now the picture he brought back will be ready for theaters, and then Captain Clark Gable will be off to a new assignment.

When people ask him if he'll be coming back to pictures when his war job is done, Clark grins and shrugs his wide shoulders. "Haven't even thought about it," he replies. But you can bet his old alma mater, M-G-M, has.

It's funny, looking back at the peacetime hobbies of these M-G-M stars, how they've paid off for America when the chips were down. Clark Gable's gun, camera and rugged outdoor living. Jimmy Stewart's puttering around in his pleasure plane. A few years ago they were good for chuckles—like the time Jimmy coaxed Katharine Hepburn aloft when they made "Philadelphia Story," and got so nervous with his precious passenger that he skittered all over the Burbank field on one wheel when he landed, to give M-G-M bigshots heart failure. Robert Taylor, on one of his first solo flights, sat his buzzer job down in a watermelon patch and had to talk fast to keep an angry farmer from beaning him with a hoe.

the gal behind the guy . . .

There's no joking about Lieutenant Robert Taylor's flying today. It's a dead serious matter, with both the Navy and Bob. His job is to teach naval air cadets their stuff at the Naval Air Station in Livermore, California. It's a full time job and a pretty responsible one, and he flops into his bunk at bachelor officers' quarters every night with the chickens, except every ten days when he draws forty-eight hours leave and a trip to Beverly Hills and Barbara. The Taylors are trimmed for wartime living as much as any Hollywood couple. Bob and Barbara used to live on a rolling ranch in Northbridge, surrounded by horses and all the comforts of country squires. Then they moved into a big Beverly Hills house, and when Bob left, Barbara closed most of it up, but she still rattled around in what was left. Now that's sold, and the home Lieut. Taylor visits is a mere matchbox as Beverly homes go, six rooms—so small that even the tourist bus drivers haven't discovered it yet and would be ashamed to point it out if they did.

Barbara Stanwyck deserves a certain share of credit for Bob's new career in Naval aviation green. She always has been deathly afraid of planes. She took one ride with Bob years ago. It was a rocky ride on a bad weather day. Barbara remained frozen in her seat all the way and climbing out of the plane afterwards, said, "Thank goodness I'm on the ground and believe me I'm going to stay here!" She has never been up again.

But in spite of her almost pathological horror of heights, she never let out a peep of protest when Bob told her his service plans. Long before Robert Taylor got a crack at his commission, he spent all his vacation time at a private desert plane training school, adding up his hours until he had a total of 110 solo—nothing to get worked up about these days—but a solid start which came in handy. By the way, Bob Taylor's air bug bit him away back in 1941 when he made "Flight Command" in San Diego at the Naval Aviation base.

Playing a make-believe Navy pilot and skimming the waves in the Navy's fast fighters made him crave to fly. But he never dreamed that one day he'd be wearing Navy wings himself.

Bob had the right background—a degree from Pomona College, a college athletic record and a manly personality that long ago smacked down the "Beautiful Bob" stuff which his super good looks hung on him. In his thirties, Bob knew he was too old to zoom Hellcats around. But he hoped maybe to be a transport pilot or instructor. He had his bags all packed when he got orders to wait—the class at Dallas was filled, and it would be twelve weeks before he could get going.

That's when he made "Song of Russia" —after he was sworn in as a lieutenant (j.g.). Maybe it wasn't the best picture Robert Taylor ever starred in—but you have to remember Bob had other things on his mind then, and it had to be a hurry-up job. Anyway, what should happen but the picture ran over schedule, and Bob found himself behind the eight ball when he finally showed up. Not only was his class all youngsters right out of college and sharp as tacks, but starting late gave Taylor an extra handicap.

He made it at last with flying colors, but there was a time or two when the escapes were squeaky indeed. Not the least of which being the day his class graduated. They scheduled him for a speech at the exercises before the class. Newsreel cameras were on hand for the big event, and Bob was all slicked, pressed and polished up.

A Navy captain, the guest of honor, spoke first. He'd spent a life in the regular Navy, remote from audiences, and he'd never seen a camera before. Just the same he gave a magnificent talk with perfect poise, and his stage personality was terrific. But when Bob climbed up on the stand he got the shakes, stammered, blew his lines and in general acted like a high school boy in the senior class play. The newsreels had to ask him to do it over and was Bob's face red! One of them cracked, "Are you sure you're the same Robert Taylor who used to be in pictures?"

"N-no," answered Bob. "To tell you the truth, I'm not." He wasn't kidding, either, at that point.

the hard way . . .

Another of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's Bobs—Bob Sterling—rates a special star on M-G-M's service honor roll, because of all the front-line stars in Hollywood who have earned their wings, he's the only one who made it from scratch as an air cadet along with the rest of Uncle Sam's raw nephews.

Bob left the lot quietly in November of that year, took his pre-flight training at the big Santa Ana Training center, which is just a jump from Hollywood, then his primary training at Thunderbird Field in Phoenix, Arizona, his basic at Pecos, Texas, and finally his advanced at Marfa in Lone Star land, where something new was added to his shoulder straps that made him Lieutenant Robert Hart (he uses his real name). That ate up a whole year of his young life, and now he's an ace instructor at the B-25 Transitional School, Mather Field, Sacramento, California, where he can run down to spend weekends with his wife, a perky blond gal you might know named Ann Sothern.

The year Bob Sterling spent remodeling himself from an actor to a pilot the hard way was rugged enough, but it was even tougher being a brand new bridegroom without a bride practically all of that

LOST: One husband's Heart

Another quarrel! Bill was drifting away from Kay. If only she could understand his coldness! Then she went to see Dr. S. Quite frankly, he told her about the "one neglect" most husbands can't forgive—carelessness about feminine hygiene. He advised Lysol, the method so many modern wives use. See what happened!

FOUND: A second Honeymoon

Bill and Kay—happy as newlyweds again! As Dr. S. told Kay, Lysol disinfectant is an effective germ-killer that cleanses thoroughly, deodorizes. Yet is so gentle used in the douche; won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues. Just follow simple directions. Lysol is easy to use, economical—and it works! Try it for feminine hygiene.

Check this with your Doctor

Lysol is Non-caustic—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. Effective—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). Spreading—Lysol solutions spread, thus virtually search out germs in the deep crevices. Economical—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for the douche. Cleanly odor—disappears after use. Deodorizes completely. Lasting—keeps full strength, no matter how often it is uncorked.

time. Bob and Ann met on the lot at M-G-M, fell in love and had reached what the old folks used to call "an understanding" just when he felt duty call.

When he reported at Santa Ana for his pre-flight, he told Ann, "It's right close to home. I'll be up every other night or so." The minute he got himself processed, he found all that was just a rosy pipe-dream. Pre-flighters at Santa Ana didn't even get one step off the base for eight weeks.

Well, that's the way it was most of the time—although the minute he wound up that hitch, Bob and Ann didn't take any chances. They eloped to Ventura one Saturday after Ann finished work in "Cry Havoc" and had a brief honeymoon, even if she had to act again on Monday and Bob had to fly off. Until her lieutenant hubby finally settled down (for awhile) at Sacramento, Ann had those lonesome wartime widow blues, with brief peeks at her old man every third or fourth month.

With all their separations, however, Bob Sterling and Ann Sothern have had a pretty cosy connubial time of it, when you have a look at what a jinx war cooked up for Greer Garson and Richard Ney—there I go again—Lieutenant (j.g.) Richard Ney. From start to finish, their romance has been a no-decision tug-of-war between Cupid and Mars, ever since Dick, in Detroit with a "Life With Father" stage company in 1942, decided it was time to quit acting funny and act tough. He enlisted in the Naval Reserve then and went off to Notre Dame and then on to New York to bone up for an ensign's commission.

All that was after Richard Ney and Greer Garson made "Mrs. Miniver" together in Hollywood and discovered their feelings for each other weren't strictly mother-and-son like they played on the screen. When Dick finished his training and came to the West Coast for sea duty, he had about forty-eight hours in Hollywood which he used to excellent advantage in persuading Greer to become Mrs. Ney. So they went right down to take out a marriage license and the clerk said, "It's good three days from now." Neither one had considered California's notorious "gin marriage," three-day-wait-law. At that point Dick had one day. He left the next night, a single and very desolate ensign, for the Aleutians, which isn't exactly the kind of bright and cheery spot designed to improve a case of absent lover blues.

Ensign Ney served ten months in the foggy Aleutians aboard a troop ship, he saw the bloody action of Attu, and when ten long, gray months had slipped by, Ensign Ney found himself on a second leave in Hollywood, and that's when he took Greer to a little church in Santa Monica and tied a sailor's knot. Right away—you might know it—he got orders to sail—so the happy bridal pair had a honeymoon of exactly twenty-four hours!

The next time they saw each other was in Boston, where Richard's ship was in port, and Greer was on a bond tour. It was Greer's last stop, and Dick had orders to ship out of San Pedro, next door to Hollywood, on his next cruise, with ten days to report.

That trip together across the country and the few days left in Hollywood is about all the happy home life Richard and Greer Garson, have had. Dick earned his j.g. half-stripe on his next mission to the South Pacific although Greer had to learn that good news from the Navy post office return address on his letters—he forgot to mention it!

When he returned from the Pacific, Lieutenant Ney asked for duty on small craft—he thought he'd see more action that way—so they shot him right on to the Naval Sub Chaser Training Center in Miami, Florida. Dick isn't counting on any home life until after the Japs and Germans surrender—unless Greer Garson turns stowaway.

Of all these stars, perhaps the best prepared for hostilities was Van Heflin, who had lighted in Hollywood just long enough to win himself an Academy Award in his first year on the screen. Van didn't have to adapt civilian hobbies or start a brand new life from scratch. He was already a reserve officer in the Field Artillery—had been ever since he fired 75's down at the University of Oklahoma.

He hadn't progressed much in all that time, it's true, because who thought we'd ever be in another World War? So Van was still a second looey when the shooting started. But he remembered enough trigonometry to have his commission reactivated, and got back in uniform in November, 1942, rubbing off his cinema studio rust at Camp San Luis Obispo, and landing a spot instructing new troops at Camp Roberts. Then he got stung by that fatal Air Corps bug and wangled a transfer. It paid off right away because last year Van got sent on a foreign mission that's one of those military secrets, and his wife, Frances, kept the Christmas tree up even if it dripped needles all over the rug until Van got home in February. He'd never missed a Christmas celebration with his daughter, Vana, before, and no war was going to ruin that record.

Van's still a second lieutenant in the Air Corps, at present sticking around in the States in a combat officer replacement pool awaiting overseas orders, which he's pretty sure to have with the shooting going on in Europe, if he already isn't in there by the time you read this.

War can't change Van Heflin's easy amiability and swell sense of humor, or the friendly personality that won him popularity prizes in Hollywood overnight. On his last foreign mission, Van was greeted at his military destination by an Air Corps colonel. Van saluted, and the colonel returned it. Then he stuck out his hand. "Hello, Van," he said, "remember me?"

Van looked blank. "No, Sir."

"Well," chuckled the officer with the eagles. "You were my commanding officer in the ROTC at Oklahoma. Yep, I guess you started me on my Army career."

Seems he had gone on to West Point after college, entered the Air Corps, won his wings and had risen to a full colonel while Van, who used to bark him around the field, was still only a shavetail. Nobody but a guy with Van Heflin's funnybone would ever tell that one on himself—but so far it's Van's favorite war story.

Bill Lundigan had an even more embarrassing moment blitz him in the Marine Corps. Bill's a corporal now, in training at Quantico, Virginia, with the Marine Cineschool, photographic section. When he gets through there, he'll probably be getting action films in the can like the Tarawa record that Captain Louis Hayward's marine camera unit brought back from bloody Betio and the Marines picked corporal Bill Lundigan to narrate.

But last June Bill Lundigan was a lowly "boot" at the recruit depot in San Diego. Marine boots hold the record for enduring the ruggedest smacking-down treatment of any outfit, and Bill was doing all right as honor man of his platoon, a featured performer on the "Halls of Montezuma" radio show and a quick raise to a Private, First Class stripe, when a certain picture he had made in Hollywood came to the base theater, and—er—sort of upset him. The picture was "Salute to the Marines." Bill had made it with Wally Beery about six months before he joined the Leathernecks. All he knew about Marines then was what he'd read in the papers. But his uncle was a Devildog in 1917, and that's why Lundigan decided on the USMC.

Well, being a young and handsome actor then, M-G-M had put Bill in the part of a dashing lieutenant who rescued all kinds of other Marines, gave orders right and left and turned out to be a hero of heroes. It seemed swell to Bill Lundigan on the set—but when he marched into the Marine Base theater with his buddies and saw himself swaggering around on the screen and heard the—er—caustic remarks they made, he wanted to crawl into some dark hole and die! For far from being a glorious officer braving shot and shell, Bill, at that point, was the lowest species of Marine—a boot, getting the pants swatted off him and quaking with fear at a sergeant's growl. It took him weeks to redeem himself!

As a matter of fact, casing the records of all the other fighting stars of M-G-M, you can't find a one who hasn't made a name for himself in the fighting service that any American can be proud of. Lew Ayres overcame a mess of unfavorable publicity because he had the character to stand up for his convictions, and despite a start that promised little, has risen to become a staff-sergeant in the Medical Corps in action somewhere in the South Pacific.

Melvyn Douglas, too, crossed up the critics who accused him unfairly of seeking a soft job in Washington by promptly enlisting as a private, distinguishing himself in Officers School at Washington and Lee College and quickly winning his captain's bars. He's in the Special Service Division of the Army, overseas. Jean Pierre Aumont abandoned the biggest natural Hollywood build-up any foreign sensation has had since Charles Boyer opened his hypnotic eyes into a Hollywood lens, to rejoin the ranks of the Fighting French, after Jean Pierre had already seen enough fighting in the big Blitz to satisfy the average man, with a Croix de Guerre to prove it. Lieut. (j.g.) Richard Carlson, Staff Sgt. Desi Arnaz and Seaman Richard Quine are star names that Leo the Lion likes to purr about, too.

And John Carroll, tempestuous, wild-haired John who loaded Hollywood with legends of his unpredictable antics, who blew star-making opportunities right and left and never in his life settled down to serious business, even when it meant thousands of bucks in his jeans—Lieutenant John Carroll is now serving with the Fourth Fighter Command of the Air Corps in Algeria.

They're all on the Victory team and proving every day to Tojo and Hitler that it's risky business to sell Hollywood actors short when the shooting starts. It seems you can make screen love to Garbo and Hedy Lamarr for years and years without necessarily turning into a cream puff. But some people, of course, will never be convinced.

Bob Montgomery was in London on duty once when General Bernard Montgomery arrived secretly after making himself Britain's number one hero with his brilliant North African heave-ho of the Hitler mob.

One night outside a theater a London crowd gathered on a tip that the General would show up. Gawking his own neck, Bob heard one Londoner inquire, "I say, what's all the fuss?"

"I think, old chap," said the other, "they're waiting to see Montgomery."

The first Briton snorted. "Dashed stupid, if you ask me," he barked. "All this bloody fuss over a movie actor!"

dressing room buildings on the M-G-M lot. One is for featured stars and the other is exclusively for the highest ranking women. When Lana went into "Marriage Is A Private Affair" she moved into a dressing room flanked by Greer Garson and Hedy Lamarr . . . Although this is John Hodiak's fifth picture, it will be the first time audiences will see his face au natural. Metro shaved off his beard, washed the oil and dirt from his face, dressed him in tailored clothes and present him for the first time as he really is . . . John, incidentally, didn't test for the part of Lana's husband in this picture. Miss Turner happened to see the test he made for "Lifeboat"—suggested him for the role . . . Keenan Wynn, a close personal friend of Lana's, returned from his South Pacific tour and asked to see the picture. Lana took him to see it, told him it was complete except for the sequence in the jungle where a Marine acts as interpreter for the vocal love-making between Lana and John Hodiak. Keenan asked to see the script, saw great comedy possibilities in the small part and begged to be allowed to do it. As it turned out, it's one of the high spots in the picture and Keenan added much to his screen credit by doing it . . . Lana, noted on the Metro lot for her self-designed hair styles, models several glamorous new hair-dos in this one. Her hair has grown eight inches in the year she has been away from the screen. It was her own suggestion that Hodiak give her pig-tails a hard yank in one scene to prove to fans that all the luscious blond hair is really connected to Miss Turner . . . Lana also introduces the new short evening gown to the screen. Her wardrobe in the picture is entirely Irene-designed—even to the aprons . . . It took Miss Turner and one maid exactly 45 minutes to get Lana into her wedding gown. This was caused mainly by the row of 78 tiny buttons which had to be undone each time Lana took off the dress. Even the studios are finding it impossible to get zippers . . . Cecelia Callejo, the castanet player, is world-famous for her clickity-clack rhythms. Has played everything from Bach to Boogie-Woogie with them—appeared several times in the Philharmonic Auditorium. She's married to Robert Presnell, a Lt. Col. on General MacArthur's staff . . . Rope-twirling Dorothy Hackley was discovered by Lana Turner as she was doing her act in a Hollywood night club . . . Alex D'Arcy returns to the screen after an absence of a year and a half. Alex received his medical discharge from the Army just in time to go into this picture . . . Biggest task of the entire picture was teaching Lana to flip pancakes. Studio cook was brought to the set to demonstrate the art to Lana. She'd think she had it mastered, the cameras would roll, Lana would begin her lines, throw the flapjack into the air—and invariably toss it into Director "Pop" Leonard's lap!

for both of us—"

He called her a few days later. M-G-M wanted a girl to play in "Tish."

"Not me," said Susan.

"Look, honey, you're free as a bird. They've got no strings on you. Come along for the ride. Come along for the fun of telling 'em to go jump in the lake."

So she went along and had the fun of being signed for Tish. And the fun of playing opposite a big, cute, easy-going Irishman named Richard Quine, who showed her round the lot and made her feel at home and listened to her squawks. Because all through "Tish" she was terribly depressed by forebodings that her Warner history would repeat itself.

silver threads among the gold . . .

"I don't want to be under contract again. What I think I'll do, I'll go see Mr. Mayer. 'Mr. Mayer,' I'll say, 'do you think I can be an actress? If not, will you please let me go because I'm getting old—' "

"That sounds like an excellent idea—"

"I haven't got nerve enough to go see a bus boy, don't be silly—"

One day came a message that Mervyn LeRoy wanted to see her. Despite two years at Warners', she was still a greenhorn. "Who's Mervyn LeRoy?"

Having been enlightened, she toddled down to the "Random Harvest" set, couldn't find any Mervyn LeRoy, couldn't see what he'd want with her if she did find him, concluded that the whole thing was a gag and went to lunch. On her return, people swooped. "Where have you been? Mervyn LeRoy's looking for you—"

"Look, if this is your idea of a joke—"

They convinced her it wasn't—half-convinced her, anyway. Still a little leery, she went off again, pushed through the heavy door, picked her way over cables and came face to face with a short, boyish-looking man. "Hello. You're going to play Kitty in 'Random Harvest'—"

"I'm nothing of the kind, don't be silly. What's Kitty anyway, and who says I'm going to play it?"

"I do." Her mouth opened—and shut. Her color turned from normal to red, to green, just like a stoplight. "I'm Mervyn LeRoy," he grinned.

Susan bounces back. The first shock over, her natural skepticism reasserted itself. "They've probably tested everybody from Ouspenskaya down, and now it's my turn—" (Actually LeRoy had had those despised Warner tests run off and picked her on the strength of what he saw in them. So the two years hadn't been wholly wasted.)

Her pretense of coolness lasted till she got the script home that night. Next morning, happy as a clam, she went flapping out to the set in search of Dick. His eyes looked heavy, but she was too full of her own affairs to wonder—just sat and babbled about this marvelous thing, and Dick responded the way he always did—

The assistant director came up. "You can leave for Detroit tomorrow, Mr. Quine—"

"You going to Detroit, Dick?"

"Yes." He looked away. "Just got word that Dad died—"

"And here I've been— Oh Dick, why didn't you tell me?"

"It's all right, Susan. This is my trouble. Don't let it spoil your happy day—"

Falling in love with Dick was such a natural process that she doesn't remember when it started, and starting Kitty was another kind of milestone, one of the many pushing-ahead steps that in three years, found her being co-starred with Jean Pierre Aumont and Bob Taylor. The family continued to be amused, though less hilariously. Mom still thinks it's funny that Susan should be an actress, but yields to majority opinion. Bob alone refuses to be budged, won't even admit that his sister's in pictures. All that bothered him about entering the service was, suppose the fellows should track down a relationship between Susan Peters and Bob Carnahan. On his last leave, he was telling Susan about a girl he'd met—

"Kind of cute and blonde. Only—"

"Only what?"

"She found out I was your brother."

"So what happened?"

"So I never went back."

She made up a song for him, called, "I'm the Blot on Your 'Scutcheon—"

Meantime, love flourished along with the career. Up to then, Mom and Susan had never seen eye to eye on men. When daughter liked them, Mother didn't and vice versa. But Dick took an apartment in Mrs. Carnahan's house, and she fell in love with him. Asked him to breakfast, dinner and lunch till he was eating more meals at her table than Susan. He'd take them both driving and never left the house without bringing back some silly little thing. "Bless his heart," Mother'd croon. "Most kids his age don't know where to hang their hats." Susan would have suspected Ma of throwing Dick at her head, except she couldn't because he was there already—

"don't let him faint" . . .

They were married last November in a Westwood church. For six days, Dick was in a daze. At the license bureau, he didn't have two dollars—at the wedding, he almost fainted. All Susan could see as she walked down the aisle was Dick's paper-white face and his pants-leg shaking in the breeze. She took his hand and felt all his weight against it. They knelt together, and he almost missed the step. Susan didn't have time to be nervous for herself. She was too busy praying, "Please God, don't let him faint—"

After the reception, Dick couldn't find the car keys. Susan had to go back and wait for an hour and a half, till the keys turned up in the middle of the street where he'd dropped them. They drove through a beautiful brushfire in Topanga Canyon to a beautiful week at Santa Barbara. Then six beautiful weeks in San Francisco, where Dick's Coast Guard unit was stationed, and they lived in a basement—pitch-black but divine. Then she had to go back to work—

Dick's stationed nearer home now and gets in quite often. For a while they stayed with Susan's mother and spent all their spare time at auctions, gathering stuff for the French provincial farmhouse they plan to build after the war. This stuff they'd send home to Mom, who got a lot of healthy exercise climbing over chairs and tables to reach her front door.

the mouths of babes . . .

Dick was an old hand at auctions. Susan was new and all of a dither. Her business manager, who'd never let her spend any money, said she could buy anything she wanted for the house.

So the first thing she wanted, of course, was the first thing she saw. Service plates. "What am I bid for these twelve lovely service plates?"

"Fifty cents—" called a voice.

"A dollar—"

Susan blushed for them. Only a dollar, that was terrible. "Five," she chirped.

There was a long and painful pause, during which every head in the room turned to look at Susan. Dick's face was a ripe scarlet, and she couldn't be sure whether he was going to protect her or crown her.

"I'm sure you don't want to pay five dollars a piece for these plates," said the auctioneer, and was kind enough to let her have them for a dollar and a quarter. For the rest of the evening, Dick did the bidding, though Susan recovered sufficiently to poke him when she wanted something—

As for the plates, they're the worst-looking objects you ever set eyes on and repose on a pantry shelf. But every now and then when Dick's around, Susan ogles them ostentatiously. "Aren't they the most beautiful plates you ever saw?"

"If they're so darn beautiful, why don't you put 'em on the table?"

"Oh, I don't have the things to go with them yet."

Pretty soon she's going to start breaking them accidentally.

She calls Dick Ichabod Crane because he's so long, and he calls her Little Mother because she's always got the neighborhood kids underfoot. They also call each other "Dear," because it's such an expressive word, conveying all known emotions and any combination thereof. Like, "Dear, where did you dig up those cigarettes, they taste like tired shoes." Or, "Dear, you're an awful dope, but I love you—"

Dick found their apartment while Susan was ill. It has an upstairs and a downstairs and a kitchen built by a man who couldn't cook, because you have to climb on a stepladder to reach the closets. Before she ever had a chance to set eyes on it, Susan was whisked to the hospital for a major operation. When the worst was over, Dick had their furniture moved.

"For which relief, much thanks," sighed Mother. "But don't you think she ought to convalesce at my place?"

"No, I've got a furlough and I want her home."

"That will last till you get tired of cooking."

She done him wrong, though. He fixed delicious trays every morning and served wonderful meals every night. Susan should know, being a super-cook herself. The only difference is, Dick has to start at noon for a 6 o'clock dinner. Susan whips up a meal in no time, including Dick's pet dessert, pies.

Certain things they agree on, and others they don't, which makes for stimulating variety. Both love the outdoors, swimming and horseback riding. That's what they used to do on Sundays. Then they'd come home, read the funnies and listen to spook stories on the radio. With Susan, it's spooks or nothing. With Dick, so long as the radio's on, he's happy—

"Dear, do you like commercials?" asks his wife.

"Huh? Oh—I didn't even know it was on."

"My dear mother," says Susan bitterly, "used to listen to soap operas. I thought I was lucky to get away from them. But at least she'd listen—"

His only other failing is slowness. It takes him exactly one hour and one-half to dress. It takes Susan exactly ten minutes. He thinks he's the world's best driver, and she thinks she is. He likes her in sports clothes and tailored suits, with her hair up. She likes pigtails and slacks.

He gets tired of her bringing home animals and makes her take them back. One Great Dane, he contends, is enough for any apartment. Thunder, the Dane, is almost as tall as Susan and a good deal heavier. She gave up a honey bear to get him. It was just that this executive at M-G-M didn't think she ought to have a honey bear—

"But he's mine, I bought him—"

"Well, you sell him again and I'll give you a Great Dane instead."

So one day she phoned her mother.

"I have a Mother's Day gift for you—"

"A Shetland pony?"

"No."

"A Great Dane?"

"Yes, and I hope you'll be very happy."

Mother'd been kidding. Her jaw dropped when Susan brought Thunder home. But she grew more than reconciled. In fact, now that her daughter's turned Indian giver, she grows indignant. "Mother's Day gift! You might at least have had the grace to let me keep him over the week-end."

Dick still brings her things like blue elephants with pink ears. If she doesn't have a baby to play with them soon, she'll begin to feel guilty. They exchange monthly anniversary gifts, but they've made a little ruling—nothing personal, it's got to be something for the house. Once he gave her salt and pepper shakers. Once she gave him a bean-pot.

"It's charming," he said, "if you'd just fill it up with beans."

Next time he came home, the bean-pot was full.

"Dear," he said, "did I ever tell you you're wonderful?"

"Yes, but tell me again—"

"You're wonderful."

"Why?"

"Because you cook the best beans and bake the best pies and some day, if you mind your Ps and Qs—"

"You mean Ps and Quines—"

"Who knows? You might get to be the best actress in town."

DUCHESS ON WHEELS

Greer Garson is a pedal veteran. She first began to ride when going to kindergarten at the age of five, her bright locks were the bane of her childhood and she ached under the taunting of her school mates who called her Copper Knob, or Rusty or Carrots.

Greer's profound consideration of this problem nearly cost her life some years later. She was cycling down the street when she caught sight of one of the boys who persisted in town-crying her coloring; quickly she wheeled behind a street car. In her haste to escape she failed to notice that her maneuver had placed her between two streetcars, traveling in opposite directions. She had presence of mind enough to lift herself, with a hand braced on either trolley, away from the bicycle, the handlebars of which were much wider than Miss Garson, and which were crunched in the collision.

Two horrified motormen, having applied emergency brakes, came gasping into the narrow breach, expecting to find at least mutilation and possibly death. The only casualties were Greer's bicycle, her books, and several square inches of skin scraped from the Garson arms and chin.

Despite almost having once lost her life she continued—but with less drastic action—to avoid those who might mention her coloring, until she had reached a post-adolescent period.

One afternoon, walking past a group of laborers she noted that all work ceased as she appeared; turning scarlet she marched hurriedly on, eyes clinging to the distant horizon. "Now tell me," said a cockney to the world, "wot's wrong wiv that?"

Abruptly, a redhead came into her own.

Her struggle with the matter of natural coloring, however, may well go on forever. When preparations were being made to start her current picture, "Mrs. Parkington," Greer suggested that, since Mrs. Parkington must age from an extremely young girl to an ancient matriarch, she be allowed to wear a black wig. There was, she pointed out, a great make-up problem presented by attempting to age red hair. Black hair was something else again; it could be changed clearly and dramatically.

One of the men at the make-up conference shook his head. "But if you take away your hair, Miss Garson," he protested, "you take away everything!"

Miss Garson's eyes twinkled, a certain omen of a forthcoming wisecrack. "I resent very much," she retorted, "the suggestion that I am like Samson."

She won her point; she wears a black wig throughout the picture, and those who aren't afraid of being considered maudlin, stumble around the M-G-M lot uttering six syllable adjectives about the way Greer Garson looks in brunette guise, Samson or no Samson.

The sport of cycling, long absent, returned to the life of Greer Garson when she was working in "Random Harvest," the picture that she describes as "proving that I wasn't born with a bustle."

She was so good on the little bicycle used in the picture (having bought herself a "skimmer" with three gears) that Mervyn Le Roy presented her with a large white bicycle at the end of the picture which she promptly presented to Dick to use on those rare times when the Family Ney whisks off for a rationless ride.

If Your Child
EATS POORLY
try giving him Ovaltine

SCIENCE has proved there are certain food elements everyone needs for health. If there aren't enough of them in a child's food, serious things happen—such as stunted growth, soft bones, poor teeth, faulty nerves, loss of appetite, defective eyesight.

Ovaltine supplements the diet with elements frequently deficient in ordinary foods. Three glasses daily, made with milk as directed, provide a child's full minimum requirement of Vitamins A, B_1, D and G, and Minerals Calcium, Phosphorus and Iron—also supply niacin, pantothenic acid, pyridoxine. In addition it provides the basic food substances—complete proteins to build muscle, nerve and body cells—high-energy foods for vitality and endurance. It thus acts as an insurance against food deficiencies that retard normal growth.

So—if your child is thin and nervous or eats poorly, why not turn to Ovaltine?

calliope comrades . . .

Greer has always been mad about the circus . . . the aerial acts, the wire walkers, jugglers and acrobats, Clyde Beatty's thrilling act with the great cats, and of course, the clowns.

The clowns at Los Angeles' most recent circus were the best she had seen for some time. Greer told her husband, "They are really as funny as I think I am when I'm cutting up."

In one portion of the nonsense, one clown was being pursued by another carrying an outsize croquet mallet, clearly bent on mayhem. The escaping clown leaped through the windows of the trick house which was being moved around the ring, and made for Miss Garson, who was excitedly leading the cheering section, calling, "Come on, Horace, come on," impartially to both pursuer and pursued.

It would be difficult to say whether the audience enjoyed the clowns as much as they did the sight of the allegedly-aloof Greer Garson mixing in with the fun.

As the Neys and Mrs. Garson had arrived somewhat late and without proper reservations, the indulgent management had placed chairs for them in the front row where neither they, nor the oogling audience, would miss anything.

Halfway through the performance, the manager gifted the trio with three giant cones of cotton candy. Greer accepted with a juvenile's shout of delight and ate the final elusive wisp with pleasure. That finished, she turned her attention to the clown's burning house act, complete with buckets of water. One of the clowns rushed over, tilted his bucket and swung toward Greer, who leaned back, covered her face with her hands and shrieked. Of course the bucket was empty, but the whole thing was a wonderful gag, a gag almost as sure-fire shriek-producing as Lieutenant Ney's asking, "When are you going to shear Gogo again?"

It seems that one day, Greer looked at her large white French poodle and decided that he needed a haircut, so she marched him out to the back yard and set to work with the clippers. Gogo kept seeing imaginary rabbits that he should chase, and Greer had to hold him very closely. At last she finished, and backed away to view the result. Gogo's appearance was sleek; so, unfortunately, was the left sleeve of Greer's white lambskin jacket; in her preoccupation with Gogo she had run the clippers from wrist to shoulder in one narrow, but hide-baring swathe.

good samaritan . . .

Greer's love of animals of all kinds had a hectic beginning. As a small girl she used to be a consistent summertime guest at her grandfather's place in Ireland, and one day Greer decided—being naturally neat and anxious to be of assistance—that some new-born kittens needed a bath. She took the first, blind and mewing, to the trough where the horses were watered, and turned on the faucet. She was giving the small cat a thorough-going shower when she was caught by Mrs. Garson. Greer's mother explained a cat's aversion to water and rushed the kitten into the house where it was wrapped in heavy towels and placed behind the stove.

That night, Greer was ordered to include this sentence in her prayers, "And please, God, make me kind to animals." Feeling, however that her intentions had been misunderstood, she refused to repeat the supplication.

But whether she would repeat the sentence or not, since that time she has been too tender to kill even a beetle in her Victory Garden.

"The gleam in your hair puts that gleam in his eye" . . .

The action-lather cleanses thoroughly, leaves hair easy to manage—and no other shampoo gives your hair such gleaming highlights.

no pinky-lifting . . .

In addition to circuses and animals, Greer Garson has another love: parades. She arrived in Boston on a recent bond tour, and there—without being quite sure that the gods would grant the benison—met her husband, whose ship had luckily put into port. They had just finished their first eager burst of conversational "catching-up" when the blare of bugles and the shrilling of fifes floated up to their twelfth story hotel suit. "A parade," burbled Mrs. Ney to her husband and made for the nearest window.

"But you've been the chief interest in dozens and dozens of parades during the past few weeks," he protested in surprise.

Miss Garson, by that time, was leaning as far as possible out of the window, waving frantically. "Exactly," she found a moment to call over her shoulder. "I've been in the parades. I haven't been able to watch or to wave at them," and she hung there in extreme enjoyment until the last caisson, the last tank and the last straggling urchins had passed.

Those who know Greer Garson well grow lyrical about, not only her bounding enthusiasm and unfaltering good-sportsmanship, but about her spontaneous warm-heartedness. While on a bond tour last spring, the troupe appeared in a Canadian city which honored Miss Garson by presenting her—when she appeared upon the platform—with a corsage-spray of rare and lovely orchids.

Also on the platform were two elderly, workworn women who had been introduced as gold star mothers. After having expressed her thanks for the flowers, Greer moved swiftly across the stage and pinned the corsages upon the mothers.

Incidents like this explain why the Cinematic Grand Duchess is referred to on her home lot as "just a swell girl."

magic heels the way Kelly did in "Cover Girl," they had to whip up one of those quick rivalry rumors between Gene and Fred Astaire. Hollywood has had to have a phony feud of some kind since the days of Pola Negri and Gloria Swanson, and the Bing Crosby-Sinatra one was expiring for lack of legs to carry it along. Somebody asked Gene what he thought of Fred Astaire. (They're good friends, by the way, and right this minute Gene is working out a routine with Fred for the Ziegfeld Follies.)

Gene spoke right up: "Fred Astaire? I think he's a great artist. There's a lot of things in his dancing I wish I had. And," he added without a speck of false modesty, "I've got a lot of things Fred could use, too." Just like that.

Gene Kelly can take some scaring to shake his faith in himself. Take that "Cover Girl" miracle dance. It's quite a story in itself: And it shows what brand of stuff this Kelly guy is made of.

Gene had been laying for just such a chance since away back. When he was dancing on Broadway and even before in his home town, Pittsburgh, his mind was ticking off dreams of things he'd like to do some day on the screen with its swell possibilities for trick effects. Gene shoots at the moon in his dreams, and for his money the highest type of dancing is to express an inner struggle by active rhythm. All great ballet dancers, Nijinsky and all the rest, have put across a mental or spiritual theme when they tied into the pinnacles of their art. It isn't easy, even on a stage where there's a flesh and blood contact between a performer and his audience.

It had never been done on the screen, but Gene Kelly didn't see why not, being a Kelly.

double-exposure . . .

When "Cover Girl" came up, Gene said, "This is it!" He played a guy with a love problem, and the script called for a dance. Why not fight it out with his inner self in a double-exposure dance?

"Because," said the Hollywood wise men, "for one thing, you can't pan and dolley in double exposure." "You can't do this and you can't do that. It's never been done." "About time, then," answered Gene. But they had another argument: "Besides, waltzing around with your shadow like that will make audiences scream. They'll give you the old guffaw, the belly laugh, the yack-yack."

"Not if it's artistic," argued Gene.

Gene Kelly found a big shot willing to take a chance in Harry Cohn, Columbia's boss. He went home and stayed up a couple of nights until 5 A.M. sipping coffee and working out his dance and his ideas how to do it. He huddled and checked with cameramen and technicians. And he came up with a test that made Harry Cohn say, "H-m-m-m-m. Well, okay. Go ahead. Let's see what you can do." From then on it was up to Kelly, and he knew it.

It would take a scientific thesis on movie camera and sound technique to explain how Gene Kelly came through. How he mastered problems like jumping over himself, sliding down a fifteen-foot pole with his shadow, dancing up and down stairs with the little man who wasn't there and whirling around lamp posts and things with his alter ego, right on the off-beat.

But I can give you some idea of the aspirin-quotient Gene Kelly tied into: He had to match one dance with another on a pre-recorded sound track, synchronizing every muscle he moved to beats of music. Every time his toes lit on the stage, they had to light on a certain spot marked off with chalk and tape to a quarter-of-an-inch exactness! He had to practice it all until he could do it blindfolded. Because the stage Gene marked off personally looked like a lesson in geometry which had to be covered with a black velvet cloth when it came time to shoot. There were a million technical angles—split-hair camera frames, scores of critical moments that had to jibe to a gnat's whisker or the whole thing would be ruined. When Gene tries to explain it, it sounds like a Rube Goldberg wacky invention—and even when he made it, he'd look up at juicers and gaffers and veteran set workers in the rafters, and see some of them shake their heads like they thought he was stark nuts! In the scene where Gene and his shadow grab a lamp post at exactly the same time, the cameraman who filmed it said it was impossible to get. And even when he saw Gene's timing work out on the print right before his eyes he gasped, "I still don't believe it!"

That's the kind of thing Gene Kelly put across for the first time in movie history. He never knew until three weeks after he made it (it took three weeks to develop and print the Technicolor double-exposure) whether any of it was worth a match to burn it up, either. But I think the best indication of the Kelly character came on the very last moment of that master dance.

three strike homer . . .

If you saw "Cover Girl"—(and you'd certainly better after all this if you haven't!)—you'll know that's when Gene ends his dance tussle with his inner self by hurling a garbage can smack through a window and shattering the image along with the glass into a million pieces.

FACE MOULDING
Department C.—P. O. Box 341 Houston 1, Texas

It was the last half of the ninth with two out and the bases loaded to Gene when he made that scene. And he had three strikes in the form of three panes of plate glass to win the ball game. If he made that scene successfully, he had reason to believe the rest was okay, and he had made screen history. But what a scene!

They called in a glass-expert. "Can't do it," he judged. "If you hurl that heavy, weighted can through that plate glass, it will cut you to pieces, put out your eyes." He figured it out scientifically, and the answer was that Gene was due to get punctured by a million glass bullets.

"I'll put up my arm," Gene argued. "I'll close my eyes when I throw it." The expert shook his head. "That glass will murder you."

"Well," cracked Gene, "I'm sorry I've got only one life to give to my art. But I'm going to do it!"

The news got around the studio that day. Actors from other sets—cameramen, technicians, executives, secretaries—everybody who could get away sneaked on to Gene Kelly's set. He had an audience and maybe it was a little morbid. The news was, "Come on over and watch Kelly kill himself!"

They brought in three panes of glass—the limit in these war shortage days. That meant three takes, and if those didn't work, the whole dance was wrecked as far as Gene was concerned.

And Gene had to hit the glass in the exact spot where his double-exposure image made a bull's eye.

Well, the first time everything worked out fine—except that when Gene hurled the can, darned if it didn't bounce off the glass by some miracle and roll back on the stage! But the glass cracked—one pane down. Gene went through it all again, wound up and let fly. It broke in the wrong place and the jagged glass splinters shot angrily out around him. He threw up his arms to cover his face—and it didn't look so good to Kelly.

Charles Vidor, the director, said, "Let's print that one, Gene. What if you did flinch? Nobody will notice it, and it's natural anyway. Let's leave well enough alone. You're all in one piece, aren't you?"

But Kelly, the stubborn Mick, shook his head. "I'll do it right this time," he grinned, "if I get my throat cut!" And he did, hurled a schmeiser right on the button with his last strike, his last pane of glass, even though the stuff shot around him like a fragmentation bomb, any wicked splinter of which could have disfigured Gene.

Gene can't quite savvy how come a screen star can't take chances and be just like anybody else—a guy who does a job and leads his own life. His jaw still drops now and then with amazement at what goes on since he's made a few pictures.

hideaway tank in the aquarium . . .

In New York, for instance, where Gene heads after almost every picture, he was a pretty successful Joe around Broadway after earning his name in lights with "Time of Your Life," "Pal Joey" and such. But he could walk around Broadway without losing his cuff links, hanky and whatever else was loose. "Now it's just like Sinatra without the bow-tie," Gene cracks. "Like having a nice cozy hideaway tank in the Aquarium!"

After finishing "Christmas Holiday," Gene went to Manhattan with Betsy, his wife, before setting out on a USO tour of Army hospitals. He got mobbed. It made him sore at first until he saw a bunch of fans huddling in a pouring rain outside a theater just for a peek at him. Then Gene was touched. He got wet himself then, as a sort of penance, and signed his name until he was silly.

Gene stayed at the Algonquin, the small quiet, storied hotel far removed from the swanky Pierre, Sherry Netherlands or Waldorf Towers where most dazzling Hollywood stars rough it in New York. He didn't have an idea anyone knew where he was. But no sooner had he registered than the room phone rang, and a voice said "Hello, Gene! This is Rita Hayworth." Gene took it, straight, honest guy that he is. He chatted away telling Rita how glad he was she was in town—only to find out in the end it wasn't Rita at all—tee-hee—but Mamie Schultze or somebody from Brooklyn or somewhere. His wife Betsy fell for the same gags. A girl called saying she was Dorothy Kilgallen, the Broadway columnist, and both Gene and Betsy who know Kilgallen well, were fooled.

Of course, Gene Kelly has been a Hollywood celebrity only a short time, and he'll probably get used to being public property and stop being surprised at living under a magnifying glass—like he was when fans started writing and demanding. "Where did you get that scar on your face?" It's just a tiny scar, left of his nose, and Gene got it very unglamorously when he fell on his face one kiddie time. He'd never thought much about it; in fact, in his first pictures he never bothered to cover it with make-up.

But it's my guess that no matter how long it takes Gene Kelly to get hep to odd acts of Hollywood movie fans, he'll never start staging acts himself—that is, away from the camera. The only time on record so far that Gene has been guilty was the day his daughter Kerry arrived.

So today they call Kerry "M-G-M's $80,000 baby"—(as a gag, of course, she really didn't cost all of that). But it did so happen that the day she picked to make her entrance, Gene was lined up for a super-Hollywood scene in "DuBarry Was A Lady" with a couple dozen chorus girls, a thousand extras, bands, and what am I offered, hanging around as a background for Gene's cut-ups. Then at lunch he got the news from the doctor. Gene rushed out of the studio—extras, showgirls and dance bands notwithstanding—and he did all the things every hospital waiting-room B-picture papa ever did—like wringing his hands, wearing out carpets, chain-smoking cigarettes, pestering nurses, turning green at the gills and getting palpitations of the heart.

But that's what happens to the canniest guy at a time like that. So even Gene Kelly is human, I'm happy to state, though serious about his work and in general on the cerebral side about his fun and outside interests.

Betsy and Gene Kelly are about as perfectly matched a pair as you can imagine. Betsy's a slim strawberry blonde or gingery red-head—I can't quite make up my mind. She has freckles and one of those wistfully sweet, little girl faces that belie her brains. Betsy's charm reminds you of Janet Gaynor's in her early "Seventh Heaven" days, and by the way, one of these days, if Gene goes off to war or something, and she decides to resume her career, you're going to hear from Betsy Blair. Not many people know she has already starred in a Broadway play, "The Beautiful People," and has a personality that is pie for the movies—and Technicolor—wow!

Be that as it may, it's one of those pure Irish luckpieces that Gene and Betsy ever got together. Gene remembers he was a dance director getting together a floor show for Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe on Broadway when she came wandering in looking for a job. Gene was in shirtsleeves at the time, with a crop of whiskers and

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

looking like a stage hand instead of the boss who was picking the girls. When Betsy strolled up to him asking questions about the place, she didn't have any idea to whom she was talking. "I'm a very fine dancer," she told Gene then.

prize apple . . .

"Oh, is that so?" he retorted, stifling a grin, and advised her to come back tomorrow when the boss would be around. When Gene turned out to be the boss, Betsy blushed like a beet, and maybe that's why Gene picked her for the show, although she actually did turn out to be a "very fine dancer," the best in the crowd and the hardest worker. That intrigued Gene so much he started taking her out. Then to his amazement he discovered Betsy was not just a dancer but the girl with the highest I.Q. in her New Jersey school district. She'd actually graduated from high school at 14! Every time he took her out, Gene found Betsy wiser and sweeter, and when he got his Hollywood contract after "Pal Joey," he couldn't imagine leaving without her. Gene still thinks Betsy is twice as smart as he'll ever be, with the natural wisdom edge all girls know they have over men.

Gene and Betsy are always doing something worthwhile together in the self-improvement line. They learned Spanish and French together, and now Betsy goes to UCLA to Russian classes and Gene has promised to take it up with her. He already knows his economics and sociology, so Betsy's taking those courses, too, to catch up. I wouldn't call the pair dull intelligentsia, eccentrics or bookworm whacks, at all. But they'll never be behind the times, that's a cinch.

It's no pose, either. Gene has always resented social discriminations since his school days when he earned honors as an athlete, dancer and student, only to find snobby fraternities barred to him because of religious prejudice. He has studied all phases of political science and sociology—and just to show you how well he knows his stuff, Gene was invited back to his old alma mater, Pittsburgh University, not long ago to address the student body on—not show business, dancing or Hollywood—but current aspects of those two solid subjects above.

Gene Kelly's current ace enthusiasm is entertainment for service hospitals, which as anyone knows, are growing day by day as the war gets grimmer. Gene was up in Portland, Oregon, last year with Dinah Shore on a war bond rally when Dinah was called back to Hollywood, and he found himself with a few days on his hands and nothing to do. He got the idea of visiting a service hospital nearby and what he saw made him think. Then he volunteered for the USO-sponsored hospital tour that he just completed before going into "Anchors Aweigh." That convinced him, as follows: That those GI patients are the hero boys who need bucking up—that not only during the war but after it, for a long time. Ed Wynn and a bunch of other Broadway and radio entertainers discovered the same thing about the same time. So by now the ball is rolling to organize a regular actor circuit to handle that great and human need. Naturally, Kelly is right in the thick of that.

In fact, the other night Gene got a bright idea about the hospital circuit on the way home from a meeting where he and other Hollywood actors had met to talk over ways and means. He dropped into a delicatessen and brought three cheese sandwiches and a bottle of beer for himself and a pint of ice cream for Betsy. Betsy ate her ice cream and snoozed off, but

Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

Gene burned the bulbs until 6 A. M. working out his big idea.

That's about the only vice Gene Kelly has, night-owling—and the reason he's that way is because somehow he's mentally sharper when the sun goes down. It's no dissipation complex, because, like I say, he really loathes gyp-joint night life. Gene sticks to beer generally and right now isn't smoking at all. He does, though, when he gets into a tough routine or picture. "Just," he complains, "when I need oxygen, I chain-smoke carbon monoxide!" The "Cover Girl" dance practically asphyxiated him, and ever since he has sworn off. But he's afraid of a backslide when the going gets tough on a set.

Being a dancer and a former athlete of no mean rank, Gene is always conscious of, and respects, his physique. It's a swell one—smallish, but muscled and bouncy. Gene played football, baseball, basketball and about everything else in school and made the teams with no trouble at all. He's always been a swell skater and hockey player and swam like a porpoise, before a tricky sinus kept him out of the water. Besides, the kind of dancing Kelly does is no easy-chair exercise. He goes through no health regime that way either—keeps in trim, oddly enough, by playing touch-football with the neighbor kids in his backyard and in the noon hours with camera crews. The other day he disappeared and stayed away by himself all afternoon. Betsy asked where he'd been.

"Roller skating," replied Gene. He's pretty fancy on skates, so he'd been rolling happily around a public rink all by himself all afternoon.

dancing master . . .

Matter of fact, despite his keen noggin and adult thoughts, there's a lot of the kid about Gene Kelly. He likes kids, too, and spent much time with them in his dancing school in Pittsburgh which still bears the tag, "Gene Kelly School of the Dance" and which his sister runs in the Smoky City. He has the patience and know-how of a born teacher, as Judy Garland found out on the set of "For Me and My Gal." And in "Cover Girl," Phil Silvers, the funny man, who had never ripped off a step in his life, found Gene talking him into something.

He kept shouting "No!" when Gene suggested that he do a dance.

"Make a sap out myself stacked against you and Hayworth—are you crazy?" protested Phil. But Gene had a reason—Phil was in a gay street scene where the rest of them danced merrily and darned if he was going to let Phil spoil it. Phil danced, even though Gene worked his legs off and almost sweated him into a collapse.

When the picture came out all Silvers' Hollywood chums expressed their amazement. "Didn't know you were a dancer, Phil," they said.

"I'm not. Kelly hypnotized me!"

Gene's always anxious to see youngsters get a break, too. When he made "Christmas Holiday," he spied talent in his stand-in, Joe Thornton, and promptly staked him to tuition in the Actors' Laboratory, a swell dramatic training school in Hollywood, and talked Director Siodmak, too, into giving Joe a bit in the picture.

But about that kid-stuff and Kelly: Gene could double for Junior in plenty of ways around the house. He won't drink his milk, for instance, calls it a "boring drink" and can't understand why Betsy loves the stuff. He hates vegetables. His worst abomination is a tie, and when he goes to the city and has to wear a hat and a tie both, somebody almost has to get him down and put them on him. He hates to shave and dreams of living where he could grow a beard and get away with it. Gene's

SOMEDAY the War will be over.

Hats will be tossed into the air all over America on that day.

But what about the day after?

No man knows just what's going to happen then. But we know one thing that must not happen:

We must not have a postwar America fumbling to restore an out-of-gear economy, staggering under a burden of idle factories and idle men, wracked with internal dissension and stricken with poverty and want.

That is why we must buy War Bonds —now.

For every time you buy a Bond, you not only help finance the War. You help to build up a vast reserve of postwar buying power. Buying power that can mean millions of postwar jobs making billions of dollars' worth of postwar goods and a healthy, prosperous, strong America in which there'll be a richer, happier living for every one of us.

not too responsible about money, either—he's always running short and borrowing lunch money from an extra or somebody at M-G-M. As a handy man and householder he's pretty hopeless, too. About his only domestic achievements so far are a couple of lamps made out of wine bottles. Gene puts them up in the front room every now and then, but he notices they disappear pretty mysteriously and pretty fast.

Some of his more relaxed personal habits, Gene confesses, have been picked up since he came to California and started letting down in the sun. There are a lot of things you have to do in New York, like keeping dressed up, that Gene can do without, but he hasn't gone all California yet. Gene thinks New York is a great place to visit, and he definitely would not hate to live there. Matter of fact, that's just where he'd like to live, with trips to Hollywood instead of vice versa. But he's really not picky. Gene is convinced Los Angeles, or Hollywood, or whatever you'd like to call it, is due to be the biggest city in the country one of these days with all the arts—not just acting—centering around here. So he's getting himself resigned to the scenery. Gene likes the mountains and the seashore both—but what people see in the desert baffles him. He took Betsy to Palm Springs, and although they left to spend a week they came back the same night!

The Kellys just aren't the type to rusticate. Gene would look awful and feel still worse in overalls and a pipe. They're still city minded—no ranchos dancing in the back of their heads—chickens, cows, horses or any of that barnyard stuff. Gene admits it. He would like a dog for Kerry when she gets a little older. He likes dogs all right but not unless there's room for them to run. He had a mutt once in New York, but when he saw all the other pavement pups jogging along the concrete on leashes with a hothouse complexion, he took his up to a friend's farm in Maine and left him there.

Matter of fact, Gene Kelly isn't the least bit worried or anxious about his comforts or fun in the future. He feels there's a plenty big worry and all kinds of work to be done right now to get this world back on the tracks. If you merely mention the subject he'll go on for hours about the actor's function in wartime. He doesn't think it has been clearly defined, and that as a result there's a lot of fumbling the ball and checking signals with misdirected effort here and there. Gene is 1-A in the draft and was called up for a physical by his New York board when he was back there last. But he got a deferment to entertain the soldiers, and so he's back off the GI roll call for a few more months, anyway.

He's just as frank as honest and as intelligent about that situation as he is about everything else. "In my honest opinion," he'll tell you, "I think actors are worth more, in most cases, as entertainers. But it just happens that a lot of them like me want to get in there with everybody else and shoot real bullets. There's nothing wrong with my health. I'm young and I'm tough enough, and I want to get into a soldier suit."

Well—that's a new way to look at the draft, and incidentally, it's as refreshing as a breeze in July. There are some other Kellys from Pittsburgh, particularly one nicknamed "Commando," who has done all right with himself in this scuffle and wears the Congressional Medal of Honor to prove it. It would never do to let another clan of Kellys—especially right in your own home town—give you the back of their hand. You know how guys named Kelly feel when there's a scrap going on. Kelly is Gene's real name.

away is more like a blessed vision than an actuality.

Another thing that is keeping Maria busy is the sculpting of a bust of Jean Pierre. While she works, Maria's thoughts go over the letters he has written, the anecdotes he has told, the little things he says and does which make him so dear.

She hollows the eyes of the clay: Jean Pierre has deep-set eyes, blue and penetrating, that can see through spirit as well as matter. He wrote from London, after he had arrived and conferred with both British and French officials, "I like these people very much because they are mentally clever and straight in their ideals."

In perfecting the jawline and the mouth of the bust, Maria was careful to delineate the modesty of expression, a modesty continually being expressed in his letters.

reunion in Oran . . .

There was, for instance, the occasion when he reported to his commanding general at Oran. The general had heard a good deal about Jean Pierre Aumont.

He looked hard for a moment at Lieutenant Aumont and then boomed, "If you are as good as your friends tell me, we will win this war very soon."

Jean Pierre swallowed hard, blushed scarlet and finally produced a small voice which whispered, "Yes, mon général."

But on the whole, Jean escaped the "stigma" of his fame very well. The men in his outfit generously ignored his eminent past and treated him, from the beginning, like one of themselves.

With her palet knife, Maria was careful to mold the clay to the strong curve of humor about Jean Pierre's mouth, to the gaiety and whimsy he can find in any situation. A situation say, like the time, when lined up for general inspection in North Africa, he was recognized by a colonel who swooped down upon the modest lieutenant and embraced him with true French fervor. That this was a violation of military regulations amused Jean Pierre; that it was a spontaneous outburst of warm friendliness touched him—the colonel had been a technical adviser on a French Aumont picture.

Then there was the case of the Misplaced Major. Lt. Aumont was introduced to this officer, who proved to be very cordial, inviting Jean Pierre to be his guest for dinner on a certain night. When the evening arrived, Jean Pierre—in pressed uniform and polished brass—presented himself at the major's door.

After he had recovered from what appeared to be a momentary astonishment, the major was obviously delighted.

As the evening closed on a warm, comradely basis, Jean Pierre thanked his host for a lavish dinner and begged the opportunity to return the hospitality at some immediately future date. The major was charming. "We were so honored that you were able to drop in on us," he said.

As Jean Pierre strode back to camp he suddenly saw the light—he had called on the wrong major!

The Aumont humor repeatedly slipped past the censor as, husband-like, Pierre tried to let Maria know where he was stationed at the time. "I have just met so-and-so," he wrote. "He is a very clever guy—or, should I say chap, eh wot?"

In one of her letters to her husband, Maria wrote to say that a friend of theirs, a retired business man, was keeping his garden in thriving condition—when his moods allowed him to work.

This particular gentleman has a standing personal feud with anything Russian, regardless of Russia's place in the Allied war effort, and so, referring to the recent Russian successes, Jean Pierre wrote, "Is our kind friend still doing his gardening—or have the headlines upset him too much to hoe?"

In another letter, Maria wrote of the astounding case of the Masticated Spectacles. It seems that, in the Hollywood French colony, there is one gifted individual who—without ill affect—occasionally nibbles at a bit of glass. One day, at a gay holiday party, this guest devoured the eyeglasses of another guest who considered the feat less remarkable than rude.

Maria could just see Jean Pierre's blue eyes twinkling as he commented on this tid-bit with ". . . having lost his glasses, I don't see how V . . . could possibly have seen the joke."

In shaping the outline of the head, Maria was careful to emphasize the breadth and height of Jean Pierre's forehead, and the fine curve of his backhead—unmistakable clues to his tenderness and devotion.

love memory . . .

He spends a great deal of time with a friend who, knowing Maria well, is able to imitate her accent perfectly—even to her troubled "J's." As she has repeatedly told her lieutenant, "I have difficulty to say my yays," so the name emerges from the Montez treatment something like "Hon Pierrrrrrre."

And so, in far-away Africa, Jean Pierre asks over and over, "Say my name as Maria says it."

Jean Pierre has a great capacity for affection, deeply cherishing his brother, Francois (nicknamed "Poum") and his friends, Charles Boyer and Claude Dauphin. M. M. Dauphin and Jean Pierre are serving together, and Jean Pierre wrote, "between us is a warmer and deeper feeling than ever before. We have so much to say to one another that we speak together until four or five in the morning. I have shown him all of your pictures, and he adores you already."

Great as is his affection and admiration, Lt. Aumont also allows himself an occasional burst of husbandly criticism. On the boat going over, he was shown a rather cheap publication in which appeared Miss Montez of Hollywood, wearing a white bathing suit. It seemed to her husband that the suit was rather more brief than necessary, and it required several transatlantic exchanges of heated mail to explain the situation, reinforced by Maria's statement that she is never again going to pose for cheesecake.

One evening, when her precious clay sculpture was beginning to mold into a clearly-defined and satisfying likeness of Jean Pierre, Maria left it long enough to attend a friend's party. Afterward, she and three other guests returned to her home for an impromptu concert and to finish their chat.

After they had gone, she went to the small workroom and discovered that one of the guests—perhaps from prankishness, perhaps from malice—had taken palette knife and scraped the face flat s that the formation of the features wa reduced to a shapeless mass.

Maria spent an entire day crying bitterly over such unkindness. Then sh resoaked the clay and set to work onc more. There were more letters to be read more dreams to be dreamt—the wor would go swiftly.

A lovelier you... Skin's Softer, Smoother with just One Cake of Camay!

Tests by doctors prove Camay is really mild

A softer, fresher, more captivating complexion -for you . . . with just one cake of Camay . . . when you change from improper care to the Camay Mild-Soap Diet. Yes—doctors tested this care on over 100 complexions . . . on girls with skin like YOURS! And most complexions simply bloomed. They looked clearer, fresher . . . with the very first cake of Camay.

. . . it cleanses without irritation

These tests gave proof of Camay's mildness . . . proof it can benefit skin. The doctors reported, "Camay is really mild. It cleansed without irritation." No wonder Camay can bring such exciting new beauty to skin.

Go on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet!

So easy—you simply cream Camay's mild lather over face—forehead, nose. Rinse warm. Add a cold splash for oily skins. Repeat morning and night.

That's all—and with your first cake of Camay, your complexion takes on softer, sweeter appeal!

Mrs. John Louie
OF CLEVELAND, OHIO

"A lovelier complexion may mean romance—so do try my Camay," suggests Mrs. Louie. "I found my first cake brought delicate new softness to my skin."

Your Camay is precious—make it last!

Vital materials go into soap. Be patriotic . . . use just what you need.
★Whip up a lovely Camay lather . . . with just a few rubs on your cake. ★Return your Camay at once to a dry soap dish. ★Tuck your Camay slivers into a bathmit for grand lather!

Smile, Plain Girl, Smile..

A radiant smile wins admiration!

Let your smile bring new happiness. Help keep it sparkling with Ipana and Massage!

LET YOUR HOPES SOAR, Plain Girl! It doesn't take beauty to rate special raves.

Watch the girls who score the biggest hits—the girls who invite popularity and romance. See how often their appeal lies in their smiles!

So smile, plain girl, smile. Not a smile that hesitates, timid and uncertain—but one that is gay and flashing, bright as dancing sunbeams. Remember that such a smile needs sparkling teeth—bright teeth that depend so much on firm, healthy gums.

"Pink Tooth Brush" a warning!

If your tooth brush "shows pink", see your dentist! He may tell you your gums have become sensitive—denied natural exercise by soft, creamy foods. And he may, as many dentists do, suggest "the helpful stimulation of Ipana and massage".

For Ipana not only cleans teeth but, with massage, aids the health of the gums. Every time you brush your teeth, massage a little Ipana onto your gums. Circulation steps up in the gums, helping them to new firmness.

Start today to let Ipana and massage help you to have brighter teeth, firmer gums, a more radiant smile.

On Top of the World—that's the girl whose smile is a sparkling charm. Let Ipana Tooth Paste and massage help you keep the heart-stirring radiance in your smile!

The greatest star of the screen!

We made lots of promises about what to expect in this year of grace and the Number Twenty anniversary of M-G-M.

★ ★ ★ ★

One of the promises was "The White Cliffs of Dover". And from the success and the opinions, guess we've a right to say—promise fulfilled.

★ ★ ★ ★

Another—and what another!—is the forthcoming "Dragon Seed".

★ ★ ★ ★

You'll see "Dragon Seed" on the billboards. You'll see "Dragon Seed" on the express trucks. You'll read about "Dragon Seed" in your newspapers. You'll hear about "Dragon Seed" on the "M-G-M Screen Test" radio program.

★ ★ ★ ★

And all the shouting will be about something that deserves the shouting.

★ ★ ★ ★

Pearl Buck's best-seller is the story. M-G-M, you may recall, is the producer of her "Good Earth". But "Dragon Seed" makes this former remarkable production pale into whatever things pale into.

★ ★ ★ ★

Mask of Katharine Hepburn by famed W. T. Benda

Katharine Hepburn as "Jade" gives one of the outstanding performances of this or any year.

★ ★ ★ ★

But others—Walter Huston in particular—Aline MacMahon, Akim Tamiroff, Henry Travers—are right up there. As is the splendid direction of Jack Conway and Harry Bucquet.

★ ★ ★ ★

Pandro Berman produced. Misses Roberts and Murfin did the screen play. It's all a wonderful package.

★ ★ ★ ★

This tremendously dramatic, unquestionably tender personal narrative stands in the foreground of China's magnificent resistance to inhuman aggression.

★ ★ ★ ★

Other publications are calling "Dragon Seed" the Picture of the Month. Certainly that. It is really the Picture of the Year.

★ ★ ★ ★

But even more—it is the Picture of the Hour.

Fannie Hurst LOOKS AT "CASANOVA BROWN"

■ "Casanova Brown" finds its way, straight as the crow flies, to your funny bone, and your approval.

Cheers, International Pictures, for your first-born.

Here is farce without doors, a house afire without bells, all accomplished without mirrors or hokum. It's a foamy, pleasantly light soufflé that doesn't bog down.

If possible, corral a seat in the loges and sink in deeply because you are going to have a good evening. But don't worry too much if there are only ordinary seats to be had. Anyway you look at it, you'll have a good time at "Casanova Brown."

emerged, with Sam Wood waving his expert directing finger. The cast is the sort which once in a blue-moon causes an author to mutter into his beard: "They bring to my lines a darned sight more than I ever put into them!"

Notably heading the players is Gary Cooper at his Gary Cooper-ish best.

If you must know the story, all right, but it's far better that you wait and get it for yourself. The reason is obvious. "Casanova Brown" is zany! And first rate motion picture zaniness has to be seen to be fully appreciated.

It's about Casanova Brown, college professor, who can trace his lineage back to that cut-up Giovanni Casanova, whose proper noun of a name has become synonym for "improper."

Let us hasten to assure all, however, that our local Casanova commits his delightful indiscretions within the conservative framework of the American way. Let us also hasten to assure that Casanova Brown, college professor, ceases being scholarly almost before he begins.

In the opening scene he steps off a New York train and pleads with his waiting fiancée (Anita Louise) to never again permit him to visit New York. There is portent of impending events in "them thar words." And do they impend!

A father-in-law to end all father-in-law traditions, fabulously played by Frank Morgan, lurks around the corner. So do half-million-dollar houses afire, maternity wards, kidnappings, altar hit-and-missings. It's all literate, high-grade nonsense, as epicurean as Casanova Brown's famed ancestor himself, which starts early and is sustained throughout.

"Casanova Brown" succeeds in packaging a juicy 1944 version of his ancestor's goings-on that is certain to slide uproariously down the American gullet.

Trapped by something known as love, Professor Casanova, while on this visit to New York, which was originally for the purpose of selling a manuscript on the spicy subject of his Venetian ancestor, meets a Barnard college student and almost immediately ups and marries her. All this, mind you, while back home he has a very beautiful and very blonde fiancée, who is going to be waiting at the train when he arrives home and to whom he is going to say portentously, "Never, never let me go to New York again, my darling."

Clutch your brow along in here. But there's a flashback sequence which will straighten things out for you. At the point where Casanova Brown steps off the train, neither the audience nor his fiancée know that he has been married, and that all in that same brief interim, the marriage has been annulled.

a'waitin' at the church . . .

The major complication sets in on the day of his impending second marriage when a letter summons him to a maternity hospital in Chicago. This letter falls into the hands of that outrageous old bounder, his nearly-but-not-quite father-in-law.

Desperate, Casanova Brown is forced to take papa-in-law into his confidence. Together they figure out, that by plane and grace-of-God, Casanova can make-it and sneak-it to Chicago and back, before the wedding ceremony that afternoon.

The story, by way of Casanova taking father-in-law into his confidence, moves, via flashback, into the story of marriage number one to the smoky-haired Barnard student, which is played for all it is worth by Teresa Wright.

The arrival of young couple number-one at the half-million-dollar home of the Barnard college bride, is the scene of as comic a fire (which incidentally razes the house to the ground) as you will find in a celluloid library of motion pictures.

The sophomore bride's mother is played by Patricia Collinge in the key of mild and delightful dementia. An ardent disciple of astrology, she reads no good in the stars' version of her new son-in-law, and is instantly as opposed to him, and for just about as logical a reason as she is to cigarette smoking.

In his anxiety to propitiate his new mother-in-law, Casanova, caught smoking, inadvertently crams the lighted fag into his coat pocket. After a while his father-in-law leans sniffily forward to casually inquire, "Aren't you on fire, my boy?" Thereafter ensues . . .

It is after this marriage is annulled by way of parental interference between two young people who basically love one another, that Casanova steps off the train and is met by his waiting fiancée.

We now emerge from the flashback to marriage number-one and catch up with Casanova Brown on the day of his impending second marriage.

Only a few movie hours from the altar, Casanova makes his hurried dash for Chicago to ex-wife and child.

His arrival at the maternity hospital; the devices of bride number-one, who has lured him back to her side as she lies on her hospital bed after having borne him a daughter; the processes by which father-love came to Casanova; the kidnapping; the ultimate calling on-again of a called-off marriage while the infant daughter of these two reunited lovers gives an exultant little belch, tells as inadequately on paper as the story tells brilliantly across the screen. You've got to see it to appreciate it.

Never mind about lovely fiancée waiting at the church. You still like Casanova Brown, and you know that beauteous betrothed number-one will find quick compensations.

Even in those rare moments when all this farce widens and ever-so-slightly thins out, it is sustained above the danger line by consistently good direction and acting, which starts with Sam Wood, moves brightly through such principles as Cheers-for Gary-Cooper, Bravo-Frank-Morgan, Swell-Trouper Teresa Wright, Applause-for Patricia-Collinge and for Sweetness-and-Light Anita Louise and so on down through a competent list that hasn't a black mark against it.

From all of which you will deduce that "Casanova Brown" is a honey of a movie. Which it is!—Int. Pictures released by RKO

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Nancy Kelly and Preston Foster were scheduled to appear at a Bond Rally being held at the Monesson, Pa., railroad station. In view of the fact that it was getting late and the stars had only a half-hour to spare between trains, the Master of Ceremonies decided to start reading Mr. Foster's speech about the three wounded soldiers who were present as guests of honor. When he got to the middle of the speech, the stars arrived and dashed up to the platform—with Preston Foster going right into the same speech, word for word, but with much dramatic inflection!

I wonder if Mr. Foster knows yet why that hysterical, but very appreciative, audience went into such gales of laughter at his truly moving rendition!

MOVIE REVIEWS

By Virginia Wilson

MR. SKEFFINGTON

"Mr. Skeffington" is a long and elaborate picture founded on a very simple theme. The theme is one our grandmothers were fond of stressing—"Beauty is as Beauty does." In this picture, beauty does very badly indeed. Fanny Skeffington is beautiful as all get out, but she's an extremely unpleasant person. You want to hit her over the head with a vase of the flowers her admirers are always sending her. That is probably a tribute to the convincing intensity with which Bette Davis plays the part.

Fanny does have one person she cares about—her brother, Trippy (Richard Waring). It is to protect him and give him the wealth he has always taken for granted that she marries Job Skeffington (Claude Rains). Job is a clever, patient man, the head of a large Jewish brokerage firm. He knows Fanny has married him for his money, but he hopes to win her affection. Fanny however, continues to have a string of adoring beaux and treats Job with casual indifference. She does have a daughter by him but is more annoyed than anything else by the event.

As time goes on, it becomes more and more difficult for Fanny to remain a great beauty. It takes more time and work, and she needs more admirers to bolster her ego. She has no time left at all for Job. Anyway, she blames him for the death of her brother and for the fact that she has a growing daughter. When she finds that he is unfaithful to her, she is genuinely surprised. But she promptly takes that chance to divorce him and even persuades him to take the child.

Eventually Fanny becomes something of an institution—"The Beautiful Fanny Skeffington. How ever does she do it?" Her taste in men runs to the very young, very athletic type now. Such as Johnny Mitchell (Charles Drake). Then her daughter (Marjorie Riordan), a grown woman now, comes home. And at the same time, Fanny gets diptheria and loses the beauty that has enabled her to get away with so much. The results of that loss are far reaching indeed.

"Mr. Skeffington" is a fascinating picture. Claude Rains, Walter Abel and young Richard Waring are particularly good.—War.

P. S.

Bette Davis requested Vincent Sherman as director for this one. Argued with him intelligently and at great length, once production started, as to how Fanny Trellis should be played . . . If you'll take a good look at the picture of Bette that hangs over one of the mantel-pieces in the veddy formal home, you'll be seeing the very first painting Bette has ever commissioned to be done of herself. The role of Mrs. Skeffington interested her so much, she had the portrait painted, then loaned it to the studio. After the picture finished, she shipped the painting to her New Hampshire farm house . . . Claude Rains, portrayer of the title role, came close to the finger-nail chewing stage when production on the picture dragged out to twelve, finally fourteen weeks. Rains had a commitment to go to England for a picture with Vivien Leigh, and with every day that passed, chances for transportation to the British Isles grew slimmer. Finally made it, and will play half the title role this time, in "Caesar and Cleopatra" . . . One of the most charming performances in the entire film is a small bit by a ten-year-old girl during a scene in a crowded dining room. She is Sylvia Arslan, who so impressed Director Sherman with her work in an earlier picture of his, he had the little scene written in for her . . . Cameraman for "Skeffington" was Ernie Haller, one of the best cinematographers in the industry . . . Bette's hair-do and make-up took three, sometimes four hours to get ready, included sheets of facial rubber manipulated to form wrinkles and bags under her eyes. Extremely uncomfortable to wear, the harsh make-up nearly ruined the Davis complexion.

THE SEVENTH CROSS

This is the story of seven men, and of seven crosses in a concentration camp that wait for them. It is in particular, the story of one of these men—George Heisler (Spencer Tracy) and his fight for freedom.

Back in 1936 most of Germany was heiling Hitler with wild enthusiasm. But there were doubters, even then. Men, wiser than the rest, who foresaw the tragedy he would bring upon. These doubters, when discovered by the Gestapo, were put into concentration camps. Sometimes—not often—they escaped. Seven of them escape one foggy night from Westhofen. George Heisler is one of them. The break is led by a strong and determined man, Wallau (Ray Collins). He knows that their chances of reaching freedom are slight, but death is better than the concentration camp. Wallau is especially anxious for George to escape. George was a brilliant idealist when he came to Westhofen. He has been tortured until his mind is almost a blank. Still, a spark remains.

The seven men separate once they are outside prison walls. In that first breathless moment, they are hopeful. Then the siren sounds, dogs howl. George, lying half buried in the mud, hears a man scream. He knows that someone has been caught. But he doesn't know it's their leader, Wallau. Nor does he know that seven crosses are to be set up in the yard. Wallau is hung to the first one. The six others wait . . .

Day by dreadful day, George tries new avenues to freedom—and finds them blocked. Day by day, he reads of the capture of his comrades, until only one cross remains empty. Leni (Karen Verne) whom he dreamed of in prison, has married. She refuses—flatly, angrily—to help him. Still, there are others. Paul (Hume Cronyn) and his wife. A man named Sauer, who is afraid, (Continued on page 14)

BLIND DATE to WEDDING DATE

FOR THE GIRL WITH LUSTROUS HAIR

How thrilled I was when Kay called. "All set for a keen date? Bob and his buddy are home on a weekend leave." "Wonderful," I cried, "but my hair's so dull and dingy, I feel downright gloomy."

"Why Nestle Colorinse can help in nothing flat," Kay said. "Try it tonight after your shampoo." Did it work? I'll say! Just look at the sparkling highlights—the richer, warmer color, the glorious sheen it gave my hair. Besides—Colorinse leaves hair so much softer and silkier.

Jim Reed, my blind date, noticed too—says he's going to spend his whole life with my bright, sparkling head on his shoulder. I'll spend mine singing the praises of Colorinse.

but finally helps anyway. And Toni (Signe Hasso), who risks her life for George. In the background is the Gestapo always searching. But searching, too, is George's best friend, Franz, who can get him out of the country if he can find him. Which will get to George first?

The extraordinary cast of this inspiring picture includes Agnes Moorehead, Jessica Tandy, Katherine Locke, and Felix Bressart. Spencer Tracy and Signe Hasso are superb.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Signe Hasso spent most of her spare time in front of a radio mike—broadcasting her mother's poems to Sweden via shortwave. Signe's mother is Helfrid Larsson, famous Swedish painter and poet. Signe has also been contributing Hollywood articles to "Veckojournalen," the Swedish equivalent of our "Life" Magazine. . . Hume Cronyn sold his second short story to a Canadian publication. Has been commissioned to do a picture-story of Alfred Hitchcock. After a tour of Army Camps with the "Seventh Cross," Hume returned to the New York stage. . . . Ray Collins, veteran of more than 900 roles on stage and screen, is "the voice" in this. . . . Miss Hasso had the honor of being the last star to pose on the famous white bear rug of photographer George Hurrell which has been the background for most of the women stars in Hollywood for many years—George auctioned it for War Bonds. . . . One scene in the picture called for the sound of laughter of children at play. Director Fred Zinneman searched for likely-looking children—then couldn't get so much as a smile from them. As a last resort he took one of them for a "horsie ride" on his back, recorded the sound of the other three calling and laughing. Trouble came when he stopped—Fred had enough sound track, but the kids hadn't enough horsie rides. He spent the rest of the day giving each of the four a ride in turn. . . . Reproduction of the Cathedral of Mainz was the biggest task ever given the Metro prop department. Structure was 366 feet long, 150 feet wide, 89 feet high and was held up with 56 pillars. Was so real and awe-inspiring, cast went around the set on tip-toe, not speaking above a whisper.

ABBOTT AND COSTELLO IN SOCIETY

If you're in search of an intellectual evening, this is not for you. But it's funny, and it doesn't involve any mental effort, and it has Marion Hutton as well as the Sultans of Slapstick. Abbott and Costello play a couple of plumbers who are let loose on Society. They aren't even very good plumbers. You ought to see Lou Costello trying to fix a leaky drainpipe. He hits it a crack with a hammer, the pipe breaks, water spouts over and starts filling up the bathtub. He cuts a hole in the side of the tub to keep it from overflowing. Final result: Abbott and Costello float triumphantly out of the bathroom in the tub, on something resembling the Johnstown flood. That gives you an idea of what to expect.

Their call to fix the drainpipe results in their being invited—by mistake, of course—to a week-end party at the home of Mrs. Roger Winthrop (Margaret Irving) veddy social. Their friend, Elsie Hammerdingle (Marion Hutton), lady taxi driver, is also invited—also by mistake. Young Peter Evans (Kirby Grant), who has more money than there is in the world, has fallen in love with Elsie, which irritates Mrs. Winthrop quote a lot. She had planned on marrying her daughter Gloria (Anne Gillis) to him and his bankroll.

Abbott and Costello are not equipped sartorially for a country week-end in the grand manner. But there are a couple of other guests, about the size of Bud and Lou, who mysteriously lose their luggage on arrival. From then on, the plumbers are the best dressed men in the place.

The boys' delight at all this is dimmed by the arrival of a well-known thief named Dexter. What makes it awkward is that they owe him a thousand dollars, and he is blackmailing them into helping steal a valuable painting. The boys refuse to help, and Dexter's pal starts making with the knives. Bud and Lou escape for the moment, but by then the painting has disappeared, and they are accused of stealing it. It is probably revealing no great secret to tell you that the boys capture the thief and turn out to be heroes. After all, this isn't a mystery story—it's a comedy and a good one.—Univ.

after an absence of more than eighteen months. Costello was seriously ill, and Abbott refused to make a picture without him. . . . Lou is the owner of a brand new producing company. His first contract actress was Anne Gillis (remember Becky in "Tom Sawyer"?) Lou, acting as Anne's agent, sold her contract to Universal so she could work with him in this picture. . . . Two of the most famous gag-men in the funny business worked on this one: Sidney Fields and Hal Fimberg. Sidney is the Mr. Guffey of the Eddie Cantor program. . . . Dance director George Dobbs spent weeks touring public swimming pools in California looking for eight beautiful girls. Wasn't necessary for them to be able to dance, sing or act—they were just to sit and look gorgeous in a bathing suit. . . . Cast and crew were taken on location for one week—to Pasadena, a half-hour's drive from Hollywood! In peace-time this is commuting distance. Gasoline shortage forced the studio to pack the whole gang into a bus and take them out for several days. . . . Arthur Treacher has competition in the person of Wm. C. Davidson in this picture, with the two men attempting to out-buttle one another. . . . Pay special attention to Kirby Grant, young romantic lead. Universal is grooming him for stardom—holds high hopes for his success in the movie world. . . . In case you didn't know, Marion Hutton—the gal who does such a terrific job on those three songs—is Betty's sister. . . . Villain Tom Gomez spent seven years on the New York stage with Lunt and Fontanne. . . . Edmund L. Hartmann was writer and co-producer, Jean Yarbough directed.

DRAGON SEED

You probably read "Dragon Seed" by Pearl Buck, and thought it would make a wonderful picture. M-G-M thought so too, and assembled a top flight cast to do it justice. Katharine Hepburn has the fascinating role of Jade. Walter Huston, Aline MacMahon, Akim Tamiroff and Hurd Hatfield make amazingly effective Chinese. But the one you'll probably pin your gaze to is handsome Turhan Bey.

Can you imagine a household where a woman who can read is not only a novelty but a problem? Ling Tan (Walter Huston) and his wife (Aline MacMahon) regard the educated Jade, who is married to their second son, with both awe and concern. It is better that a woman cook and wash and bear children than play with words printed on paper. The oldest son, Lao Ta, looks at his own lazy wife, Orchid, and thinks that at least she knows her place in the household. The youngest son, Lao San, says "If I had a wife like Jade, I would beat her." Jade's husband, Lao Er, is ashamed of his wife's unruliness, and yet he loves her and is proud of her, too. One day, to show his love, he buys her a book. That brings happiness to them both, and soon Jade tells him that she is to bear a child.

But the quiet farm with its rice paddies and grain fields is not as remote as it seems from world events. The Japanese are heading that way. "We are men of peace," says Ling Tan. "Surely they will not molest us." Jade and her husband disagree, and go to join a group of rebels in the hills. Ling Tan is indeed sadly wrong. The Japs come through, taking their usual course of murder and rape. Orchid falls victim to them. The sons of the house escape, eventually, to the hills. Ling Tan and his wife remain, although starvation and death hover like vultures. Their daughter is married to a merchant, Wu Lien, who is friendly with the invaders. He spies upon his wife's family and their activities. But before he can report his discoveries to the Japs, Jade

P. S.

Walter Huston was so impressed with the set of the Ling Tan home, he plans to build one patterned after it on his 1000-acre ranch in Potterville, California, after the war. In place of the pond in the Ling Tan garden, Walter will build a swimming pool. . . . While in production, Walter expected son John home from overseas duty, but John didn't get home till weeks later. . . . Wei Hsueh, technical advisor for the film, is a Chinese student. Came to America after the Japanese invasion of his homeland. . . . Frances Rafferty's fiancé, Lt. Dewey Barnes, came through 25 bombing missions over Germany without a scratch—was almost killed in a California bus crash on his way to see Frances at the studio. . . . They'd planned a double wedding ceremony with another couple. Came the war, and the two men were sent to opposite sides of the world. Friend's fiancé returned home first so Frances acted as maid of honor instead of Bride No. 2. . . . Prop department constructed an entire Chinese village on the desert near Calabasas, California, for earth scorching scene. . . . Tiny Winifred Woo (9 months old at the time) objected vociferously to chewing on machine-gun shell until bright prop boy (who used to be a baby himself) suggested coating it with sugar. . . . Katie Hepburn never misses having a swim every morning before breakfast. 6:30 a.m. studio calls didn't stop her. She was paddling around in the hotel pool some mornings as early as 5:00. . . . Parents of Hurd Hatfield feared the movies might make a "sissy" out of Hurd—changed their minds when they came out from New York to watch their son work in "Dragon Seed." Happened onto the set the day Hurd, surrounded by flames, was having great hunks of plaster dropped on his head. Mother thought they were trying to kill him. Dad, a New York attorney, had only one comment, "Let me know if you decide to sue!"

HAIL THE CONQUERING HERO

Eddie Bracken in a picture directed by Preston Sturges is getting to be a major event. This one is even funnier than "Miracle at Morgan's Creek." Eddie is still the fall guy in a tough spot—bewildered, harassed and rebellious. Ella Raines plays his girl, and William Demarest is wonderful as a Marine sergeant. A comparative unknown named Freddie Steele turns in a superlative performance as a Marine with a "mother complex."

Woodrow Truesmith (Eddie Bracken) was a Marine himself for all of a month. Then he was given a medical discharge. Reason: Hay fever. For a lot of boys that would have been disappointing but not tragic. For Woodrow it's a catastrophe. You see, his dad was the town's biggest hero of World War I, and was killed at Belleau Wood. Everyone, including Woodrow's mother (Georgia Caine), expects Woodrow to follow in his footsteps. So when he's discharged from the Marines, he writes his mother that he has been sent overseas. He goes to work in a defense plant but manages to have letters mailed to her and his girl from Guadalcanal. He even writes Libby (Ella Raines) that he doesn't love her any more, so she won't be sitting around waiting for him. Because that's the thing—he can't ever go home now and let them know he isn't a Marine at all.

At least he thinks he can't. But when he buys drinks one night for six Marines who are temporarily out of funds, they have a different idea. "You oughta go home," Bugsy (Freddie Steele) tells him. "You got a swell mother. Go home and make her happy." The Sergeant agrees with Bugsy. Before Woodrow knows what it's all about, he is home, in a handsome Marine uniform, with a flock of medals and six devoted buddies to tell everyone what a hero he was at Guadalcanal. Woodrow doesn't like any part of it, but he's outnumbered.

Only the thing gets out of hand. The whole town turns out with brass bands and flowers. They tear up the mortgage on his mother's house and even decide to make Woodrow mayor. That does it! Woodrow's got to get out of this mess, but fast. The trouble is, every time he tries there are six Marines to stop him. Until finally he thinks of a way . . .

You'll have an elegant time at "Hail The Conquering Hero."—Par.

P. S.

Eddie Bracken's first solo-starring picture gives him the chance to hit the height all comedians dream of—making a long, poignant, tear-jerking speech. His, at the story climax, runs seven minutes, and Eddie did it in one "take". . . . It was during production of this picture that Ella Raines announced her year-old marriage to Captain Kenneth Trout. MODERN SCREEN, incidentally, may take a bow for discovering Miss Raines when she first came to Hollywood. Doyle Brentano, a member of the Hollywood staff of M. S., met Ella and recognized star possibilities in her when others passed her by. Doyle introduced Ella to Hollywood and its Ways, guided her to the right agents and through the portals of the motion picture studios. Miss Raines finally landed a contract and now is headed for certain stardom. Mr. B. is in the Navy for the duration—has been in the South Pacific for nearly three years. . . . Production on the picture began with fifteen days on location at the Paramount ranch. Setting for the town of Oakridge, Calif., is the Morgan's Creek town with $1700 worth of changes. Store fronts were changed, and a church was added where the Morgan's Creek jail had been. . . . Working during the heat of summer, the crew guzzled 65 five-gallon jugs of water, 60 gallons of lemonade, 50 gallons of milk, 30 gallons of coffee and ten gallons of tomato juice. It took 1900 pounds of ice to keep these beverages cool. . . . Everyone rode to and from location in buses—sometimes as many as 15 were needed to transport the 175 extras. . . . The theater where Betty Hutton and Bracken held their morning rendezvous in the "Miracle," is still called the Regent. However, the bill has been changed from "The Lady Eve" to "The Palm Beach Story." Notice the statue in the park. It's supposed to represent Gen. Jacob Zabriski but is really the statue of Joel McCrea (The Great Man's Lady), with a new plaster beard!

THE CLIMAX

Universal seems very fond of a formula which combines opera with a "horror" plot. A sort of "Frankenstein at the Metropolitan" effect. Not that Frankenstein appears in this. The horror is supplied by that efficient purveyor of shudders, Boris Karloff. The opera department is presided over by lovely Susanna Foster, a swell actress and a handy girl with an aria.

Karloff plays Dr. Hohner, who is a familiar figure backstage at the opera. He was engaged to Marcellina, a great soprano who disappeared mysteriously ten years before. When he hears young Angela (Susanna Foster) sing, he is thrown into a turmoil of emotion. It is as though Marcellina's voice has come back to haunt him.

Other people, too, are impressed by the similarity in voices. Count Seebruck (Thomas Gomez) decides to star Angela. This delights the handsome music student, Franz (Turhan Bey), who loves her. But it infuriates the opera's present star, Jarmila (Jane Farrar). Dr. Hohner hears of a plan which is to go into effect the following week. He tells Angela she needs throat treatments and takes her to his home one night. There he shows her souvenirs of Marcellina, including a long string of pearls she wore the night of her disappearance. He winds them around Angela's pretty neck and would probably have strangled her there and then, had not his housekeeper Louise (Gale Sondergaard) appeared.

He does succeed in hypnotizing Angela into thinking she has lost her voice. The first time she tries to rehearse the star part, her voice breaks completely. Young Franz knows something is very wrong but isn't sure what. Then Dr. Hohner takes Angela home to "cure" her, and from that moment she is a bad insurance risk. The shudders are coming at regular intervals now—is everybody happy? If you like your creeps accompanied by music, this is your dish.—Univ.

P. S.

The mansion interiors may seem familiar to San Franciscans—the rooms and furnishings are actually part of the famous Mark Hopkins estate, formerly of Nob Hill, San Francisco. Universal Studios purchased the entire salon of the Hopkins home, had it shipped to Los Angeles in sections. The furniture is priceless—hand-carved in France, shipped around the Horn in the days of the California gold rush. . . . To make hypnotic scenes authentic, studio prop department rented the revolving disc, which hypnotizes Miss Foster, from a psychiatrist . . . discovered it's a dangerous instrument in the hands of an amateur when Susanna, after staring into it for several minutes, slumped in her chair. First Aid brought her out of the deep faint, left her with a terrific headache for several hours. . . . Edward Ward, musical director for the picture, was lavish with his praise when Susanna reached A above high C while recording vocals. . . . Dot Lawrence, so anxious to make a success of her biggest role to date, kept hurting herself in fainting scene during rehearsals. Director Wagner told her to read the lines for the rehearsal but not to faint again until the final shooting. Came the "take," the lights were set, the cameras were ready, the actors took their places, and Wagner gave the command to "roll 'em" . . . Dorothy was cued, "You will sing tonight." She picked up her line, "Tonight??" then slowly turning to the director, "Do I faint now, Mr. Wagner?" . . . Boris Karloff's five-year-old daughter has never seen a picture of her daddy. She's not allowed to see the spooky movies he makes, and all his stills are so gruesome Mrs. Karloff won't have them in the house. . . . Production was held up a whole day when Boogy-man Karloff lost his teddy-bear! Boris won't go before the camera unless the ragged bear is sitting on the script in his dressing room. He left it home one morning and refused to work until it was brought to the studio!

MODERN SCREEN QUIZ

Remember the way it goes? Here below are 20 clues. On pages 93 and 113 there are two more sets of clues, and on page 122 are the answers. If you can guess, after mulling over the first clue, the name of the actor or actress to whom it refers, score yourself 5 points. If you must turn to the second set of clues before you get the answer, score yourself 4 points. And if you guess on the third try, the question's worth 3. For a perfect score, you'd have to guess all 20 questions on the first set of clues. 20 questions . . . at five points each . . . adds up to 100, and a shiny gold star for you. Simple, no? Go ahead, you quiz-ical brighties, and no cheating! 71's average this time, 78's good, 85 or so is in our class this month, and anything over is strictly genius. No fair peeking at page 122 for the answers, either.

I LOVE A SOLDIER

Paulette Goddard and Sonny Tufts were a "natural" in "So Proudly We Hail." You fans demanded that they be starred together, and here they are.

Sonny is still playing a big, lumbering, good-hearted guy. Paulette, as Eve Morgan, is the wise-cracking type who goes out with a different soldier every night, and has no intention of getting involved with any of them. But when she meets Dan Kilgore (that's Sonny), her resolutions weaken. Dan and his friend Stiff (Walter Sande) have come on a solemn mission. Their buddy has been killed, and he left his dog tag and watch to Eve. Dan is furious when he finds that she doesn't even remember the guy. He gets into quite an argument with her, but somehow it ends with their going dancing. When Dan finally gets on the train that's to take him East, Eve realizes that here is one soldier she won't forget.

Fine. It looks like a promising romance, doesn't it? But Stiff, who has gotten very friendly with Eve's pal, Sissy (Mary Treen), happens to mention that Dan has a wife in New York. So Eve decides to concentrate on her welding job and never think of Dan again. Even when he comes back from New York with word that his wife has started divorce proceedings, Eve isn't having any. A girl is a fool to get married in war time.

One reason she feels that way is because her roommate's husband is missing in action. The roommate is going to have a baby, and the whole thing, Eve reasons, is the result of letting your emotions run

MUM TAKES THE ODOR OUT OF PERSPIRATION

Are You in the Know?

In WAVE slanguage, she's —
☐ A destroyer
☐ On see duty
☐ Being convoyed

WAVES have words of their own! For instance, "being convoyed" means being on a date. "See duty" means the movies. The girl above is a destroyer (pretty WAVE)—and busy at her job. Any girl can sail through dates or duty with confidence, on calendar days—when she chooses Kotex. Because Kotex is the word for protection in sanitary napkins. That special 4-ply safety-center gives extra protection where you need it most. And Kotex has no wrong side to confuse you and cause embarrassing accidents!

Is she headed for—☐ "Heart" trouble
☐ A high date quota
☐ Complexion blues

Snacks at the hamburger bangout are fun! But too many "fries" and double desserts may bring complexion blues. Go easy on rich foods. With sensible diet, daily scrubbing, your face can defy the keenest ogling. You can challenge costume closeups, too, on "those" days. Kotex sanitary napkins outwit telltale lines — for those patented Kotex ends are pressed flat — they don't show, because they're not thick, not stubby like some napkin ends. They're scientifically designed to keep Kotex snug-fitting...smoother!

Which is most likely to get the job?
☐ The girl on the left
☐ On the right
☐ In the center

Want to launch your life career, or land an after-school job? That first interview is important! Be alert, brief, frank. Show the boss you mean business, and look it—like the girl on the right. Then, stick to your job, every working day. You can, with the help of Kotex. Kotex is more comfortable—has enduring softness, so different from pads that just "feel" soft at first touch. No bunching, no roping, as flimsy napkins do. You'll find Kotex holds its shape . . . actually stays soft while wearing!

Know your napkins —

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

IT'S A WISE GIRL who discovers that a powder deodorant is best for sanitary napkins. Quest Powder, the Kotex Deodorant, was created expressly for this use. See how completely Quest destroys odors. It's unscented, safe, sure. *T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

away with you. She sends Dan back to the camp where he's stationed and tells him she never wants to see him again.

Of course it's easier to say those things than to stick to them. Eve finally weakens and goes out to camp. She finds that Dan, broken-hearted, is drowning his sorrows in anything alcoholic that's handy, so she decides she'd better stay around and keep him out of trouble. But the only way she can get an apartment in a military area is to be the wife of a soldier. So she poses as Mrs. Daniel Kilgore, which leads to more complications than you can imagine. Sonny will really get you in this one.—Par.

P. S.

Director Mark Sandrich took his cast and crew to the Bay City (San Francisco) for seven weeks so all exterior shots would be authentic. For seven straight nights they worked in The Mole, famous transportation center where trains meet both the ferry boats and the Bay Bridge. Because the Mole is rushed during arrival and departure hours, work could not begin until 10:00 p.m., had to be finished before 5:00 a.m. . . . Although a fun house set was built at the studio for close-up work, background interiors were taken in San Francisco's own Playland. . . . Sandrich had to use a cablecar on a hill. It was impossible to use an actual one and hold up traffic. Studio obtained official permission to use an abandoned cable line on Clay Street, ran their own cable and operated it themselves. This is actually the site of the first cable line in the world. . . . Several hundred University of California students were used as extras, playing men in uniform and their girl-friends. . . . Sonny started the picture 15 pounds lighter than he was in last movie. Lost them on personal appearance tours and doing camp shows. While in production, Sonny and his wife rented a small home in Stone Canyon, several miles from the studio. Because of war restrictions, they couldn't have a telephone installed. Company had to send telegrams for any changes in working schedule. . . . Frank Albertson, playing a soldier, was allowed to wear his own uniform which he kept after being discharged from the Signal Corps. . . . Sheila Anne Corrigan, age 21 days, who takes the part of Ann Doran's baby in the story, has a real soldier daddy in North Africa. At the time the pictures were being taken of small Sheila Anne, her own daddy didn't know of her existence—will see her for the first time when the picture plays the North African circuit.

SONG OF NEVADA

Here's a Roy Rogers' picture that opens in—of all places—a New York night club. But don't worry. It soon has you back riding trail with Roy and Trigger. It starts in New York because John Barrabee (Thurston Hall) has come there to get his pretty daughter Joan (Dale Evans). He wants her to come home to their ranch in Nevada. Joan, however, is engaged to a Park Avenue wolf named Rollo Bingham (John Eldredge) and wants no part of the great open spaces any more. Barrabee has to take the plane West without her.

Engine trouble forces them down in the desert. Barrabee goes for a walk and hears the haunting strains of an old cowboy song. That, and the smell of frying bacon, brings him to Roy Rogers and the Sons of the Pioneers. As a result, Barrabee misses his plane, and joins forces with Roy for a ten-day trek through the Nevada mountains. When they get back to civilization, Barrabee finds that his plane had crashed, and all the papers have carried accounts of his death. Joan and Rollo are at the ranch, grief-stricken, yet anxious to settle up his estate.

Barrabee at first intends to go and tell them that he is alive. Then he decides that perhaps by being a little more subtle he can keep Joan in Nevada. So he sends Roy to see her, with a contract dated the day of Barrabee's supposed death. A contract to drive the Barrabee horses in the big coach race that's held at this time every year and which will have every other big cattle man out there do or die-ing.

Joan, suspicious at first, soon becomes very friendly with Roy. Far too friendly to suit Rollo. They go on rides and picnics together, leaving Rollo, who is not the athletic type, to bite his nails at home. But Rollo is no dope, and he pulls a trick out of his Park Avenue top hat that discredits Roy completely. Joan, disillusioned, agrees to marry Rollo and leave for New York immediately. Then Barrabee "comes back to life," and things take another sudden turn—this time in the right direction.

Roy's homespun charm comes through to you in this picture more effectively than ever before. There are several big singing and dancing numbers, too, to help lift it above the level of the ordinary Western.—Rep.

INFORMATION DESK

(Questions of the Month)

By Beverly Linet

Well . . .

Fancy meeting you here! Or didn't you know that I'm practically a native Hollywoodite? Well, I am—or was for the past two weeks. You see, here I was at my Information Desk, dripping with dirt (the gossip variety) and packed to the gills with odd items to soothe your fevered brows, but somehow I felt guilty—how could I be your Cinema-Snooper-In-Chief without ever having been THERE? So I went. And now I'm back. And, oh my, if you thought I was on the beam before, well, just you send in those toughies this minute—I'm so heaped with hep I feel like the granddaddy of all Encyclopedia Britannica's!

Remember the address: Beverly Linet, Information Desk, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

Charles Shore . . . HOW CAN I OBTAIN PICTURES OF BAND-LEADERS AND BAND VOCALISTS? Oops, now that is a problem. If they are biggies as popular as Harry James, Tommy Dorsey, Kay Kyser, etc., you just address your requests to the studio where your hero last appeared in a pic, or else to the network they broadcast from. However, if they are neither picture personages nor radio headliners, then better watch Downbeat mag for their schedule, and write them at the theater at which they are appearing.

Arlene Krasnoff . . . ARE THERE FAN CLUBS FOR GENE KELLY AND VAN JOHNSON? Uh, huh—Dorothy Caton, 3317 Lake Avenue, Rochester, N. Y., has the Kelly Club and Renee Lee, 25 Lefferts Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., prexies the Van Johnson Club—and gosh, I think you may be interested in the swell organization for Bob Walker started by Joan Humphreys, 7 Porter Road, USNA, Annapolis, Md.

TRUSHAY* . . . THE "BEFOREHAND" LOTION

Smooth it on before you tackle daily soap-and-water jobs! Helps keep busy hands soft!

A marvelously different idea in lotions! Trushay, used before you wash undies—before you do dishes—guards smooth, white hands. Helps prevent soap-and-water damage, instead of trying to correct it after it's done. This rich, creamy lotion's grand for all-over body rubs, too—soft and soothing for chapped elbows and knees. Trushay's economical, so you can use it all these ways. Ask for it today—at your favorite drug counter.

*Trushay was formerly called Toushay. A different spelling

Picture was held up several days while studio searched for three of the few remaining Old West men who can handle a six-up team (Note to dudes: A team of six horses). . . . Finally found Joe and Bill Yrigoyen and Post Parks to do the job. . . . Took five days of hard and dangerous riding at the Republic ranch to film the sequence. . . . Roy, who left on completion of the picture for a War Bond tour in the East, obtained special permission from the ration board to use his butane-driven truck and trailer for the trip. Last year Roy went by train, shipped Trigger in a baggage car, with Trigger so ill at the end of his train ride, Roy had to cancel all shows for three days. Seems Trigger is used to his specially built trailer—enjoys traveling in it and none other! . . . Roy's fan mail reached an all-time high while this picture was being filmed. Received an average of 55,000 letters per month (160 of them addressed to Trigger)—a Hollywood fan mail record. Answering kept six secretaries going continually. Roy now has to buy his photographs 100,000 at a time. . . . That's a blond wig on auburn-haired Dale Evans when she sings, "Her Golden Hair Was Hanging Down Her Back". . . . Studio won't permit Dale to change the color of her hair—afraid they may never be able to get it back to its lovely natural color. . . . Paul St. Croix and Ray Burwick, champion ropers, spent long hours teaching entire girl chorus the fine art of roping. Incidentally, Tom Garrett, featured in this number, holds seven roping championships—is one of the few men who can do the Butterfly, Ocean Wave and Rollover. . . . Thurston Hall climbed on a horse for the first time in eight years—spent entire day in bed, flat on his stomach!

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Dear Gang:

I don't know whether you'll remember me or not, but I'm the gal in the mail room who used to drive you slightly bats when I went around moaning, "Roy Rogers . . . Roy Rogers."

Well, about three months ago, I was in an auto smash-up that cracked the old cranium and laid me up for three weeks. I was feeling pretty down-in-the-dumpish, wasn't allowed to read or write, so all I could do was languish on my bed of pain and go over and over in my mind the two meetings I'd had with Roy—the one at the Rodeo last October and the second time when you sent a squad to fetch me because Roy was in the building, and you didn't want me to swoon if I bumped into him accidentally.

One day, I was right in the middle of reel two of my Rogers memory movie, when the nurse came floating in with a huge, tremendous, colossal—well, big, bouquet of the reddest, longest-stemmed, most—well, beautiful, American Beauty Roses. You guessed it, Roy had heard of my accident (did the little bird that told him come from 149 Madison?) and sent over the flowers with a lovely card saying he hoped I'd be well soon and that . . . well, the doctors still don't know how I cut my expected four-week convalescence to two-and-a-half—but we do, don't we?

So, thanks, Roy Rogers. I thought it was impossible, but you're even sweller than I'd imagined.

Ann McVey,
Springfield, L. I.

BRIDE BY MISTAKE

Suppose you were young, beautiful and had several million dollars. Good, eh? You like that. All right. Along comes a guy, very attractive, and apparently falls madly in love with you. You fall, too. Your heart goes bumpety bump and all the rest of it. You can see that he's working up to a proposal. But then you think "Does he really love me? Or is it the money that's putting that glow in his eyes?" And you have no way of finding out.

It's to avoid just this situation that Norah Hunter (Laraine Day), lovely heiress, has her secretary Sylvia (Marsha Hunt) pose in public as Norah while she pretends to be Sylvia, thereby eliminating all fortune-hunters in a hurry. Of course, the whole thing is a bit hard on Sylvia's new husband, Philip (Allyn Joslyn). He objects to having his wife act as a sort of amatory test tube. But Norah likes the arrangement for various reasons. One of them being that it leaves her free to shoot pool—her favorite pastime—instead of appearing in public.

There's an Air Force base near Norah's home, and one day she has Sylvia invite some of the boys over. They are all nice guys—handsome and pleasant. There's really no reason why it should be Tony (Alan Marshall), instead of one of the others, that Norah falls in love with. But since when has love needed reasons! She shoots pool with him, beating him very badly and then suggests a walk. Unfortunately, while she's getting a coat, Tony meets Sylvia—"the rich Miss Hunter" to him—and forgets about the walk entirely.

Norah invites him to their beach cottage for the weekend. He has eyes only for Sylvia. Norah is furious, and husband Phil is equally furious. "Tell him who you really are," he says. "You can't expect Alan Marshall is giving the downbeat to all the girls' hearts lately. He's so-o-o attractive!—RKO.

Saying you didn't rightly care whether or not your Bill came home earlier than expected? Or came home at all?

No. No, couldn't have been.

It couldn't have been you because you and every other gal like you has *some*body out there doing the dirty work. And let's not kid ourselves—it is dirty work. Vicious, heart-breaking, lonely sacrifice.

But then, that isn't news to you, is it? Maybe this is.

■ Have you a problem parent? Oh we know you wouldn't swap your Mom for a million all-wool sweaters, but frankly—occasionally isn't she a bit of a drool? And Pop—salt of the earth and all that—isn't he just a touch young about some things? From your letters we gather as much, and we decided it was time, but high, to discuss the situation. Draw up a chair, tot, while we draw up a plan of attack.

NO CAMOUFLAGE! We know, you're fourteen, and all the other gals look so smooth and grown-up, and you look like something out of 5-B with no lipstick, no zing, no nothin'. When is a girl old enough to use the stuff? Well, we've buzzed around and asked people, from math teachers to Marine Captains, and 13½ to 14 would seem to be the general consensus. We even got the leading magazine on child-rearing to agree with us, which makes it practically official. Now how to get Mom's okay? THE CONSPIRATORS

Did you ever try to visualize the romantic feminine spy of fiction? If you did, it's ten to one your vision looked like Hedy Lamarr. And that's just the kind of part Hedy plays in "The Conspirators." The whole cast is terrific, with Paul Henreid doing the male lead and Sydney Greenstreet and Peter Lorre in supporting roles. The scene is bustling, crowded Lisbon, where everyone waits for a plane to any place that's free from Nazi domination.

There is espionage and counter espionage. Perhaps the most powerful group is the Underground, led by an enormously fat and clever man, Quintanilla (Sydney Greenstreet). But the Nazi spies are powerful, too. As soon as Vincent Van Lyn (Paul Henreid) steps off the plane, they know he's the "Flying Dutchman," who has hounded the Nazis in Holland. They watch his accidental meeting with the beautiful Irene (Hedy Lamarr), with Quintanilla. They are amused at the conflict aroused in him by the discovery that Irene is the wife of Hugo Von Mohr (Victor Francen) of the German Embassy.

Vincent spends his first night in Lisbon at a nearby fishing village, where he meets wise old Migual (Vladimir Sokoloff) and his lovely granddaughter, Rosa (Carol Thurston). The next day he sees Irene again and knows that he is really in love with her and that she loves him, too. But when he leaves her and returns to his hotel, he finds a member of the Underground in his room—murdered!

Vincent is taken to jail as the murderer. There his doubts of Irene grow. And outside, the Underground has doubts, too. The evidence against Vincent is almost conclusive. When he escapes from prison, they are sure the Nazis must have helped. And the Nazis are equally sure he was helped by the Underground. Vincent is in danger now from every direction. Only Irene believes in him. But Quintanilla discovers that one member of the Underground is a traitor—and it can't be Vincent.

The rest of the picture is equally divided between suspense and action, and you won't want to miss a moment of it.—War.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

A boy walked into the photo lab at the Sam Goldwyn Studios, and on being told that the prints he was supposed to pick up wouldn't be ready for some fifteen minutes, he announced he'd wait around outside. Well, one hour passed and then two, and finally, in popped the boy, breathless and apologetic. After taking a severe reprimanding from the lab head "because boys are not allowed on the set during shooting," the boy responded with only a bowed head and a sheepish grin.

The moment he was gone, we turned to the supervisor and screamed, "In case someone should ask, that so-called messenger boy you just bawled out happens to be 'California', who's been knocking them dead in "Stage Door Canteen." That happens to be Lon McCallister!"

We haven't been reprimanded for the past six months!

To our Readers...

■ An angel of mercy flew in from Hollywood the other day (by plane, of course), and asked me for a million dollars . . . angel by the name of Mrs. Darryl Zanuck. But the million is positively not for 20th Century-Fox. It's for Naval Aid Auxiliary, a warm-hearted gang out on the Coast that seems to have adopted the whole darned U. S. Navy.

To get on with my story—I must admit I was stunned. I reached dubiously into my pocket, wondering who the heck Mrs. Z. thought I was. Then she explained.

She broke out a list of stars' names so long that I wore out two pairs of glasses going through it. Dozens and dozens of Hollywood's biggest stars have autographed cute little cards with the Naval Aid emblem in color on them. Each card with a famous signature on it can be bought by a MODERN SCREEN reader for a quarter. And the supply is unlimited!

Your quarter will work like a dog for the Navy. Your quarter will buy milk for sailors' babies, roll bandages, organize canteens and nurseries. Your quarter will do so much that you will be embarrassed to take any return for it.

But that's the way the blessed Mrs. Z. wants it. Payment in full for each and every good deed. You can't beat those angels! Anyway, here's how I see it. Roughly, MODERN SCREEN has a circulation of a million. Roughly (or tenderly) four persons read each copy. And four million quarters makes up that million I was reaching for when Mrs. Zanuck so thoughtfully interrupted me.

All in all, it's the best bet since the Fifth War Loan!

Alan Ladd

modern screen spends a day with Alan Ladd

■ Grand Central at rush hour is quiet by comparison with the Ladd menage. Alan was being kodaked by a passing G.I., and a lonesome looking guy with a lamp was wandering around the garden when Sue spied the M.S. gang. She shooed Laddie up to shift into his longies and then scurried off after an "atmosphere" slouch hat (which you won't see, 'cause there's wasn't any). What with the outdoor shots having to come first to catch the sun 'n' stuff, Photog Gus Gale was having a merry time chasing after Jezebel till Steve Brooks, of the Paramount publicity staff, gave out with some puppy noises—with the poor hound falling for the gag every time! Then there was the day-too-early interviewer and the kibitzing naval house guest on leave who popped out of dark corners and—well, the pix were shot, the info got—and Al and Sue send you all their love.

Home is swell, but Al's still G.I.-ish, hoarding headlines and buying Alana bonds with his loot from a D-Day pool.

An ardent Victory Gardener, Laddie is slightly frustrated 'cause no matter what he plants—it comes up onions! He likes 'em, tho, plus 6 other courses!

Alana's first disillusionment was learning Alan placed second on M. S. poll. She's positive all pix of men are Alan, even to pointing to Crosby and yelping, "Dado!"

Patient to the point of (Sue's) exhaustion, Alan objects to questions on sleeping habits, thinks that's going too far. Admits he and Sue can and do talk till cock crow.

Alan got a sentimental urge to peek at his uniform, found a moth had once had same idea! Item: The G.I. wardrobe will have to start from scratch comes the happy re-entrance day.

Alana, whose first word was "pretty," is a gold-digger from way back, makes a grab at anything as long as it glitters and thinks heaven means jiving to Daddy's "Pistol Packin' Mamma."

modern screen spends a day with Alan Ladd

A. Walbridge hates dressing or discarding ties, esp. those from fans. Once shared upper with Sue for 3 days—fully clothed!

Though Sue's hog-tied the "bad-man" into home front K.P., Alan keeps up with G.I. gossip, nearly blows a fuse each time a pal moves up a notch or gets himself be-medaled.

As a Pappa, Alan scares easy. Not so Mama, who had baby at 2:30, phoned friends at 3:00—and when her sec. called the next A.M., chirped, "Oh, I just had a baby."

modern screen spends a day with Alan Ladd

Alan had over 300 stills of Alana before she was a year old but though he's shot hundreds of feet of her with Sue's gift, a movie camera, he's never seen "the little animal"—no projector!

Two birds, one stone idea: In "Two Years Before The Mast," Bill Bendix beats the tar out of Al while the cameraman gets seasick and Donlevy, Dekker and Fitzgerald sing! A fella's gotta rest sometimes!

It's really big-time, the Ladd marriage, with, if it were possible, Sue being ever more sociable than her better half. Save for Army interlude, they've missed just 3 luncheon dates in 5 years together, still haven't run out of dialogue!

Alan gets meemies at signs of swank so comes mess, Sue pretties dining room table, Al pronto shifts stuff to kitchen. Will give in though for formal dinners.

Sue's intent on padding the Laddie chassis, a wee bit on the willowy side since his illness. Those shoulders are the real stuff, though, developed from high school shot-putting and studio grip days.

About the only Ladd squabble to date has been on post-war plans, with Al holding out for a cross-country sightseeing tour against Sue's insistence on a shopping spree of the Scandinavian countries: Danish china, Swedish crystal, etc. Compromise may result in a flying jaunt to S. America.

That heavy ring Al sports is camouflage for the wedding bond he refuses to remove. Completely relative-less, Al's whole life revolves about his "girls," so he's still crushed over Alana's first reaction to him—hysterics—and discards idea they were due to fact he was first male she'd seen.

Though he's been angling for re-induction, Al's Army status is still uncertain. In the meantime, he's being coached by a prominent psychiatrist for his role of a paranoiac in the B'way hit, "Guest in the House," his next Par. pic.

Kay Kyser and the new and very umm Mrs. K., Georgia Carrol, are frequent guests, with Amateur Alan reducing gin rummy to strip poker. Kay insists that just a few intense sessions made it possible for him to afford a wife!

Well, it's been a good life and a long day. There's nothing to do and nothing to worry about. Will Cook's youngster pass her measles on to Alana? . . . Wonder if we'll find that house with 5 bedrooms? . . . Is Joel McCrea really going to find me a ranch? . . . zzzz . . .

Al's not the talky type, so this one's straight from former director Ken McGowan. 3 years ago, Ken contributed moral support to Al's interview with Frank Tuttle for "This Gun For Hire." Now that he's turned actor, guess who boosted him to Tuttle for "The Great John L.?" Yep!

Twenty years ago this man fought so that we might have peace. His is the story of a mighty soldier . . .

3. He stumped the state, fervently speaking for what he believed. Struck by his sincerity, the voters elected him.

4. In 1912, he, wife (Ruth Nelson), and daughters (Mary Anderson, Ruth Ford, Madeleine Forbes) moved into the White House.

5. Tragedy struck when his wife died after a slow, painful illness. In the midst of torturous grief, he worked to keep us out of the European war. Happiness came when he met gay Edith Bolling Galt, whom he later wed.

6. In 1916 he was re-elected because he had kept us neutral. But he knew jig was up day Sec. of State Lansing (S. Logan) and German Ambassador (T. Selwart) came to him with Kaiser's orders for resumption of sub warfare.

7. War came, but Wilson continued his crusade for peace. Preached to soldiers his doctrine of post-war world league. All nationalities had blended here in America, why not in the world?

STORY: He was a slight man, thin and small boned, a quiet man. If you noticed anything at all about him, it was his eyes; there were lights in his eyes, a deep burning fire that sometimes flashed with all the sudden violence of summer lightning. Frank Sinatra

By Jean Kinkead

He'd had a drag on a cigarette, sworn a few times. At 4, he was a man—almost!

■ If you haven't heard of The Voice, you simply don't know. You're not "with it," as the kids say. You are, in a word, obsolete. At twenty-six, this skinny, big-eyed youngster with the ever-so-slightly Hoboken accent, is the biggest thing in the whole darn entertainment world. People talk about him in New York and Montreal and Mexico City. They talk about him in Italy and Australia and North Africa. They even talk about him on those tiny Pacific islands that are just specks in your Atlas, if you can believe this tale brought home by some Navy boys.

Seems replacements had just reached this one island, and one of the new lads had a vic and a stack of records. "Look guys," he said, "some swell Sinatra!" One of the kids who'd been on the islands for ages spoke without looking up from his magazine. "If it's anything like that lousy sherry your pal just tried to sell me, keep it, chum." The first boy stared at him, a long incredulous stare. "You've never heard of Frank

The Voice at the age of 3. Sentimental, he still carries a gold mezzuzah (tiny cylinder with Ten Commandments inscribed) from neighbor who tended him when parents went out.

In pipe-and-ukulele era, he was ardent Vallee fan clubber. Attributes his singing technique to two influences—T. Dorsey's "sliding" trombone and Ziggy Elman's "plaintive" trumpet.

Sinatra," he intoned in a low, awed voice. Then he banged his fist into his palm. "I wish I were home," he said. "I could exploit you." And don't think he couldn't.

Funny, you'd never have thought in the old days that Frankie Sinatra was eventually going to knock the world for a loop. In fact, one morning not so very many years ago, you wouldn't have thought he was ever going to brush with the world at all.

It was a little past midnight on December 12, 1917. The doctor wiped the sweat from his forehead and looked out of Nathalie Sinatra's bedroom window for a long time. Snowflakes swirled through the darkness, rested briefly on the window-pane and then were gone. A second of existence, then nothingness. How like this little boy, he thought, looking at the still face of the child he'd just delivered. A flicker of a heartbeat at the end of his stethoscope, then no sound at all. How to tell the (Continued on page 49)

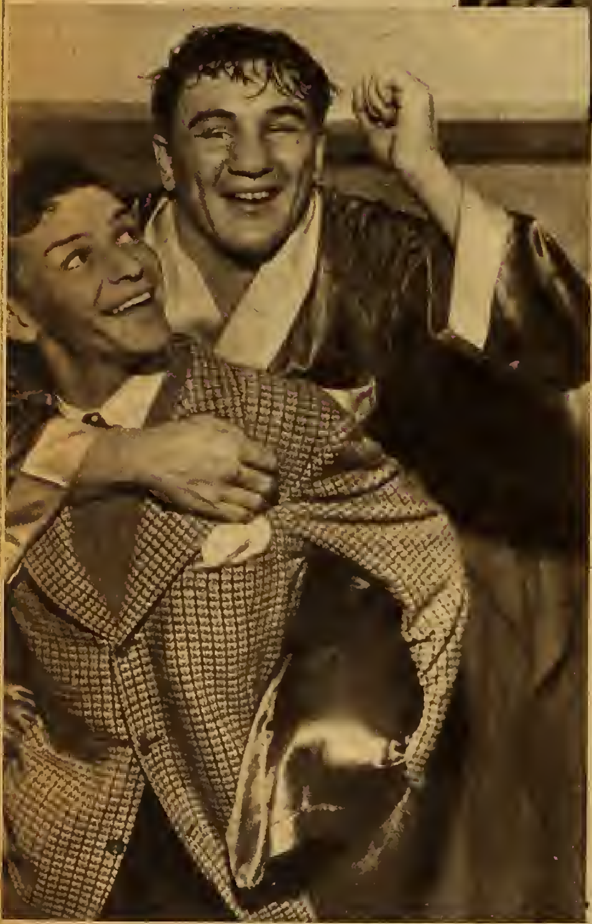
His Career—Took first crack at it in high school renting out orchestrations to local bands, provided he was hired to sing! Business grew with acquisition of public address system. Arrived when he joined T. Dorsey's Pied Pipers.



His Pal—197-lb. boxer Tami Mauriello is his idol, with whom he'd gladly swap jobs. Tami'd rather croon! Sinatra gives chums and family credit for his success.

father who was waiting on the other side of the door; and the mother, the brave little mother, smiling now as she slept.

And then beautifully, incredibly, it happened. The still face puckered, and a yell heard all over Hoboken came out. Awed, the doctor picked him up again and looked him over. Sound as a dollar. It couldn't be, and yet it was. Science had no explanation for it; it remained for Frankie himself to grow up and give the answer. "Heck, any cluck can be born," is how he figures it, "it takes a ham to do it dramatically."

His dad heard the yell and dashed into the room, wild-eyed. "What was that?" he croaked hoarsely.

"Your son," the doctor told him, placing the bundle in his arms.

"Our little boy," Mr. Sinatra breathed, doting on him, "our beautiful little boy."

Beautiful was stretching it a little. Frankie was not too smooth as an infant. It had been an extremely difficult birth, and his head was slightly battered. One of his earlobes was missing. In addition to which he was very fat—all of fifteen pounds—and very red. For his father's dough, however, he was okay. He was handsome and good. He was the king. For the old man's dough, he still is.

His Baby—He's wild about both kids, Nancy and Frankie, Jr. Latter came Jan. 10 in Jersey City when Frank was on Coast. Picture was wirefotoed few hours later to proud Pop chewing inevitable stogey.

His Family—"Nobody comes before my wife Nancy. When I was knocking out the gaudy sum of $20 per, she kept on grinning, making those bucks go a long way."

His Fans—He staunchly defends them against hecklers. They, in turn, go so far as, "I'd gladly give my life if it would mean his happiness." Less intense, Duke of Windsor invited him to table at Waldorf, confided, "I do a bit of singing myself."

One day before he was a year old, Nathalie was entertaining one of her cronies while Frankie was on the loose somewhere in the house. All breakable objects had been put out of reach, fire hazards had been removed, and he was quite safe. For thirty uninterrupted minutes the two gals chatted.

"Good child, isn't he?" the friend mentioned eventually.

Nathalie expanded a little. "Good as gold," she smiled. "Hardly know I have him half the time." Whereupon Frankie entered on all fours, his face smeared with butter, bits of liverwurst and dill pickle. It developed that he'd just discovered he could pull himself up on the icebox and maneuver the catch.

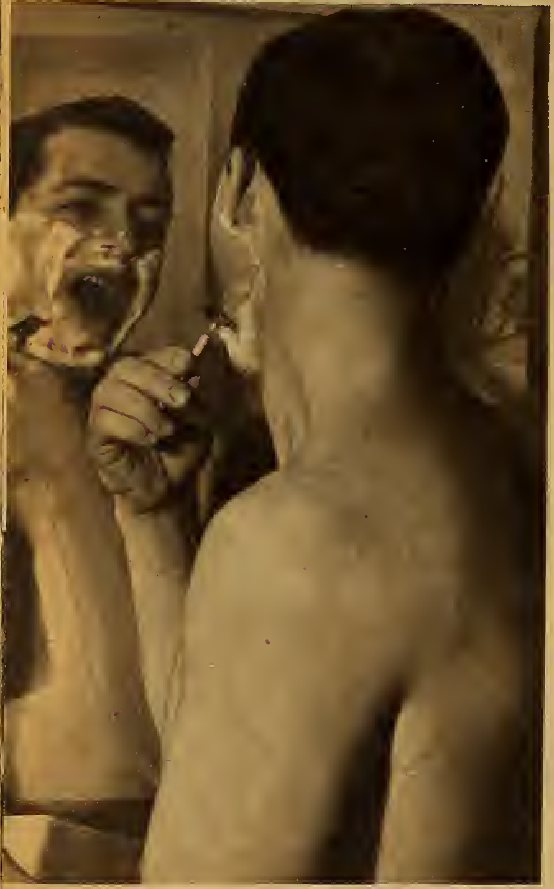
The star nobody knows, the heart throb with a Ty Power fan for a son—that's Dana Andrews!



Heavy pic schedule prevents Dana's indulging in riding, swimming, hiking so the ex-college athlete keeps down to 168 by hoeing.

■ One night recently, after a swank Hollywood premiere, a big, handsome, pleasant-looking fellow and his pretty blonde wife stood on the forecourt curb of Grauman's Chinese theater waiting for their car to be brought around. They listened to the loud speaker drone out the names of Hollywood's exalted big shots—"Mister Zanuck's car—Mr. Goldwyn!—Mr. Mayer—Mr. Cary Grant—Mr. Gary Cooper—Miss Greer Garson, please—" and on and on.

He had given the starter his name long before—"Dana Andrews." Then he waited and waited expecting every next name to be his. But the minutes ticked by, and nothing happened. Everybody got his car—everybody but Dana Andrews. Dana waited almost an hour, then he

So Dana went out to the parking lot and got it himself. He never told the starter that he was one of the stars of the picture.

Things like that are always happening to Dana Andrews. Hundreds of people still send him letters addressed "Miss Dana Andrews," not even being sure whether he's male or female. Terrible Tommy

He's a big boy now, this Dix fella, but the kid's had a hunk o' livin'—a movie star, a slugging boy soprano—almost a G.I. cantor!

Signed for one number in "Best Foot Forward," Tommy was long-termed after first rushes. Drawing raves on recent Major Bowes hour, he boomed WAC drive, is still awed over hit reception of his song, "March of Dimes."

"It's less painful not being in love," chirps Tommy, but admits he prefers blondes—and chocolate pudding! Mobbed in Ala., he sold 3 million bucks of bonds, will hit legit after war for "real work." (On "BFF" set.)

■ Sunday was tough on Tommy. Any other day you could race out of the house and find half a dozen guys around the front stoop pitching pennies or knocking each other's heads off. Sundays you'd just sit on the steps all morning and watch the kids on their way to Sunday school, all pressed and starched and cleaner even than on promotion day. Yes, it was tough, all right. Ten times a morning, Tommy'd whine, "Why can't I go to Sunday school, too, Ma, huh?"

"Because you're still too young, Tommy."

"Yeah? Then how come my friend Johnny goes, and he's younger even than I am?"

"Maybe he's brighter."

When Tommy had finally worn his mother down, the choir master pounced on him for the soprano section because his voice was clear and high and wonderfully true. For a while it looked as though it was going to be all right. Tommy liked to sing. He also liked not being alone on Sundays. Mrs. Dix began thinking maybe she'd been wrong about Tommy being too young. Then, one Sunday, just as she was sticking the roast in the oven, Tommy burst into the kitchen.

"Hey, Ma! I quit!"

"What do you mean, you quit?"

"Sunday school. I quit. I told them today I wasn't gonna be stuck in no soprano section with a bunch first-grade kids I could knock down with one finger. I told them if I couldn't be a baritone, I wasn't going to sing in their old choir. I'm not gonna have all the guys goin' around calling me panty-waist."

"And what did the choir master say to that?"

"He said I was a soprano and that's how I was gonna sing."

Mrs. Dix reached for the hairbrush. And Tommy, in spite of himself, went on being a soprano. "But of course," says Mrs. Dix, "a boy soprano's got (Continued on page 95)

Wistful guys from Tuskegee Air Base, prim Plaza patrons—they all say the same wonderful things about Lena Horne!

By Rosemary Layng

■ Lena Horne stood in the wings at Carnegie Hall, waiting to go on. Café Society Downtown was giving its first big boogie-woogie concert, and Lena had been with the troupe for just a week. She was scared numb.

Somehow she found herself out on the stage, and first thing she saw was a face in the third or fourth row. It was soft with sympathy and alight with encouragement. The deep eyes smiled. "Come on," the smile said. "We're for you." Throughout her four songs, Lena's eyes clung to Marian Anderson—whom she'd never met—like a kid to its mother's hand.

When it was safely over and no one had beaten her, the loveliest thing happened. Miss Anderson asked to meet her. She doesn't remember what was said. Only the voice and the face and the heavenly kindness. "She's like a queen," breathes Lena softly.

It's characteristic that the outstanding memory of that evening should be her meeting with Marian Anderson. Her own success? Of course it was important. But to say merely that she's ambitious is to give the story false emphasis.

For herself, she's pleased in a quiet way. "It was a beautiful engagement," she'll say. Or, "The kids are always good to me." But for her people she exults. Any tribute paid her is a gift she can bring to them. Such gifts are her treasures, whoever makes them. That's why her quietness blazes into excitement over Marian Anderson, over Paul Robeson playing "Othello," over George Washington Carver, the great negro scientist in whose

A young matron is perplexed

A charming wife and mother who is in her "40's" (although she doesn't like to admit it) has lately found herself confronted with embarrassing symptoms due to the functional middle-age period peculiar to women (often designated as the menopause).

What is she to do? This problem has bewildered many a woman!

In case you are annoyed by hot flashes and feel nervous, restless, irritable, highstrung, so tired, weak, and a bit moody at times—all due to this cause—why not try famous Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to relieve such symptoms?

For almost a century—Lydia Pinkham's Compound has been helping thousands upon thousands of grateful women—rich and poor alike—to go smiling thru such middle age distress.

Taken regularly—Pinkham's Compound helps build up resistance against such symptoms. It helps nature! Just see if you, too, don't remarkably benefit! Follow label directions. Worth trying!

■ You came through Summer on a shoestring—that is, if you were stringing along with me, you did. So by now you should have a little extra to invest in a suit or topcoat. And if you also happen to have a housetop handy, I'd like to get up there and shout, "Plunge, pal, plunge!"

I mean it! Spend a little more here and save somewhere else—because when it comes to a suit or a coat, you just can't fake. Especially if you've been convoyed by a lad with an eye for tailoring. So please—when you're tempted by one of those floozy "here-today-gone-tomorrow" jobs—just close your eyes and count ten. You'll count savings in the long run if you hold out for stuff that stands by.

A juke box blares, a G.I. razzes, "Icy showers, phooey!"—and Pilot Payne knows this is home.

■ You'll find John Payne at his favorite table in the corner by the juke box of the Service Club cafeteria at Buckley Field these evenings.

G.I. Johnny. Khaki cap sticking out of his pocket. Chair tilted back against the shiny red and chromium juke box. Tanned fingers softly drumming on the table in beat with the tune.

His usual cronies are with him. For like any other Joe, John Payne has his own buddies—his own G.I. gang. Privates Buddy Lawler, Hollywood dance director, Archie Hall, radio announcer, wiry little Tony Marano, Brooklyn welterweight, and Stanley Billingsley, often referred to politely by the rest of them as a "former civilian."

MODERN SCREEN'S FASHION GUIDE

to remember is: read your tags. Today they always tell you what's in the fabric (it's the law). When it says "100% wool," you can be pretty sure it will hold its shape. Manufacturers don't put their labels on things unless they're proud of them. The Printzess people, for instance, make a big issue of "fashions that live in fabrics that last"—which just about sums up what I'm trying to put across.

About that suit of yours—maybe you and I are going to have an argument. But I still hold that those baggy jackets that reach down toward the knee department don't do right by your pretty curves. After all, who wants to be styled by a juke box? Mark my word, the fad's going to leave everybody high and dry before long.

This doesn't mean you have to go around looking like something left over from last year. Novelty pockets and fancy-pantsy skirts with unpressed pleats are here to stay for a while. So are trick buttons (and if I'm wrong about that, you can always switch next season). You can also do things for yourself by going for a new torso slip-over blouse.

Companion toppers are made to go over suits, so of course they're cut generously through the shoulders. But no matter what kind of coat you buy, be sure you get the same kind of "room service." I don't have to show you what Chesterfields look like, but I'd like to point out that they look better than ever in bright new colors, like kelly green, or fuchsia or purple.

The new fitted reefer is another good example. Its shoulders are cut "Adrian" style, and wool melton's the fabric for it. "Flange" sounds like a $64 word but don't let it get you down. It simply means those front shoulder tucks that make you look wider up top and slim of waist.

In spite of all the furore over tunic-length coats, I'm scared of 'em for you. You see, I know you. When I'm not looking you'll be slinging one on over your full-skirted dirndl or somethin'. And nothing looks cornier. But, if you can remember to keep a neat, slim hemline underneath, then take a whirl at the short pea-jacket. The one our candid camera caught for you is tailored by the same outfit that delivers to the United States Navy.

Of course, the best coat or suit in the world will start looking drippy if you don't give it the right kind of a break. So—once more—won't you wear at least a ghost of a panty girdle to keep from "sitting this one out?" Also remember (the way men do) to unbutton your jacket or coat whenever you sit down. And look—I'll get down on my knees, if it'll influence you to put your outfits on hangers instead of on the chair—and to brush away all dust before it grinds in for keeps. One thing more—when your woolens get rained on, just let then dry off by themselves in an airy place. If they're the right sort, you'll find they come out of it better than if you hung them by the radiator or made with the electric iron.

The Don O'Connors may sing and dance and talk in jive, but they love in waltz time.

Bedded in Army hospital for several days, he may be medically discharged. Visited Peggy on set, met her dancing partner at age of 3, Bob Boniface.

■ It was 5:30 on a February morning in San Pedro. A car drew up at the camp gates, disgorged a boy and his bags and drove away. His face looked older than his eighteen years, as he stood watching the car till it disappeared. Then he slung three pairs of shoes over his shoulders, picked up grips and odds and ends, passed through the gate and started down the hill toward camp. Loaded like an Army mule, his progress was slow. The shoes kept slipping, and he kept hoisting them up. Once he had to trudge back for some stuff he'd dropped in the road. Finally the mists swallowed him.

Meantime, the car was heading back to Los Angeles, a boy at the wheel, a sleeping girl scrounged up like a kitten in her white fur coat. Presently she stirred, and her head felt for the shoulder on which she'd fallen (Continued on page 66) asleep, but the shoulder wasn't there.

Her eyes flew open. "Where's Don?"

Joe, who'd gone along to drive her back, said gently: "He's gone, Gwen. He kissed you good-by while you were asleep, didn't want to wake you, couldn't stand to see you cry any more—" wailin' woman . . .

She burst into tears.

"He said he'd try to call you before they leave," Joe put in hastily. The sobs only grew more convulsive. "Look, honey, that doesn't do any good. You'll just make yourself sick."

"I can't help it," she wailed. "Look—just look at these things I've got on—Don's slacks, Don's old plaid shirt. He made me wear them this morning because I wouldn't be warm enough in my own clothes. He's so thoughtful and sweet—and I never even kissed him good-bye." Her head went down on her arms against the dashboard and Joe let her blubber in peace all the way home.

Lots of words, pro and con, have been written about youthful marriages, lots more about war marriages. Gwen and Don O'Connor have read none of them, and if they had, it wouldn't have made any difference. From the first, it was as though they'd been swept to some magic island that held only the two of them. Everything else was like the murmur of far-off waters. From the first, they were serenely sure of themselves and each other. So long as they went hand in hand, nothing could touch them.

Don had enlisted in the Army Air Corps and finished his last picture at Universal. He'd worked hard in order to roll up a backlog for the studio that had given him his break—which turned out to be a break for themselves as well. He left with "This Is the Life," "The Merry Monahans," and "Patrick the Great" still unreleased.

There was one more piece of unfinished business to attend to before he reported to Uncle Sam.

"Wait," urged the mothers. "Wait till you're older. Wait till after the war."

"Why?" asked the children, "when we're in love now, and always will be."

So they were married on February 6th, and parted a few days later at the camp gates. Don, eighteen, and a Volunteer Flight Trainee, was shipped to Amarillo. Gwen, seventeen, finally stopped crying and went back to school.

"Your eyes look funny," said her best pal. "What's wrong?"

"Don's gone," quavered Gwen, "and you may now call me Mrs."

"Really? Why?"

"Because I'm married, Stoop!"

It was funny, being married and having everything just the same except that Don wasn't there. Nothing was different at school, only once in a while as she passed through the hall, she'd hear a stage whisper: "That girl's married to Donald O'Connor." Nothing was different at home except, when the phone rang, she knew it wouldn't be Don. Every afternoon she'd race home to look for a letter. He wrote every day, she wrote twice a day. His letters were all about how much he missed her, and life down there, and how much he missed her. In her letters, she had to tell him exactly what she did from the minute she got up till the minute she went to bed. Those were his orders.

He said the worst of camp was waking up suddenly at 5:30, and she could well believe it, because waking up slow is his favorite sport. He said he generally fell in in his underwear and overcoat and never had his socks or shirt off for four weeks. But he passed the psychological test for pilots—only twenty-six passed—

● Paulette Goddard retains her title of the Queen of the Unpredictables in Hollywood.

There are plenty of people who believed Paulette would never marry any man who was not rich—or influential—or both.

They said: "There's a girl who knows what she wants. And she'll always get it."

Well, apparently, what Paulette wanted was the man she loved and has loved for several years—Burgess Meredith. He is a grand person—a wit and a gentleman. But "Buzz" is far from rich, and being in the Army for the past two years hasn't made him any richer.

He is a fine actor—but his name is far from being as important as Paulette's.

Yet, soon after the wedding, Paulette told me, "I know this marriage will last. We are so congenial, so happy and companionable. Both of us have had unhappy marital experiences in the past. This is the third marriage for both of us. But I think you will realize how deeply we feel when I tell you that this is the first religious ceremony for either of us."

But suddenly—the little cigarette girl and the cashier behind the counter gave a gasp that couldn't have been more excited if a Robot bomb had ricocheted through.

Coming through the door was a skinny young man wearing a bow tie—and perched precariously against his shoulder was a four-months old baby in a blue cap, wrapped in a pink blanket.

"Hi, girls," said Frank Sinatra, grinning, "Want to see him?"

Whereupon, Frankie sat his son on the cigar counter and unbundled him so the girls could get a good look. You might think this would make Master Sinatra cross—but he just gave with the "goo's."

"That's enough of that," said Frankie, "who do you you think you are—Frank Sinatra?"

By this time, Benny, the popular waiter at the Derby and himself the father of four (with a brand new baby boy), dashed up to join the admiring group. "How about a quick plate of spaghetti for me?" asked Frankie, seating himself in a booth and parking the baby beside him on the seat.

"But Mr. Sinatra—don't you want one of us girls to hold the baby while you eat?"

"Don't be silly," said Benny. "We men know how to mind a baby, don't we?"

"Sure," agreed Frankie, "I'm minding him today."

Has the Lana Turner-John Hodiak romance dimmed before it even got started? Everybody was sure "Hi" Hodiak was Lana's secret heartbeat right after she and Steve Crane broke up.

Mebbe so. But he's stepping around lately with Judy Garland. Or is this just to throw the know-it-alls off the right track?

By the way—you MODERN SCREEN fans who have written to me show more interest in Hodiak than any other star. Where are you Alan Ladd devotees?

* * *

Speaking of Judy—when my doctor husband and I were invited to dinner at her home, he said: "How come we are invited to crash the younger set? I can't go because I can't find my bow tie!"

But did we live to eat those words! When we arrived at Judy's comfortable, rambling Brentwood home, there wasn't a jive hound in sight.

On the contrary—there was Charles Jackson, author of the best-selling "Lost Weekend"; Robert Nathan, who wrote "The Portrait of Jenny" and also Judy's latest picture, "The Clock"; Louis Brown, whose "See What I Mean" is much discussed; Marc Connolly and the Ira Gershwins, among other literary and musical lights.

But far from being arty or high-brow—it turned out to be a wonderful evening. Judy sang all her new songs including the "Trolley Song." Danny Kaye gave with some brand new numbers and routines and was never funnier in his life.

I think Judy is happier than she has been in a long time. She certainly looks better—and what a hostess! The food was divine.

PURELY PERSONAL: Joan Fontaine, I believe, inspires more "catty" remarks in other women than almost any other movie star. Maybe that is because she is young and beautiful and won an "Oscar." On the other hand, Joanie doesn't go out of her way to be cordial to women at parties. (And I don't mean me. I've always liked and admired her.)

Studio bosses haven't begun to realize the terrific popularity of Turhan Bey with girl fans. I sat next to an M-G-M executive at the sneak preview of "Dragon Seed," and he almost swallowed his gum at the demonstration that greeted Turhan's appearance. "And all along I had thought this picture would put him over," he grudgingly admitted.

Billy Wilder, Paramount's wonder boy director (he made "Double Indemnity") has an interesting idea—whether you agree or not, when he says: "No actress under 35 years of age should ever win The Academy Award. She hasn't earned it until she is that old."

* * *

Mickey Rooney is head over heels in love again with—surprise, surprise!—his ex-wife, Ava Gardner. Before he donned his uniform, they both admitted they might re-marry. If they don't, it won't be Mickey's fault.

Remember several months ago we printed in this column that Betty Hutton was dying to fall in love? Well, Technical Sergeant Walter Diel is willing to be THE man in Betty's life and encloses the following original poem to prove it:

"I wish you'd miss me when you're at a bar,
And someone's humming "Journey to a Star."
And someone's using Shalimar—
I wish you'd miss me.

I wish you'd miss me when you're One of Three,
And Two go dancing to a rhapsody,
And leave you staring at a Daiquiri . . .
I wish you'd miss me.

I wish you'd miss me when Sinatra sings,
And when they're playing any song of Bing's,
Or if they're zinging "Holiday for Strings" . . .
I wish you'd miss me.

For when the endless, friendless night is due
I want you to know . . .
I'm missing you, too."

Bill Eythe is such a nice boy, and he's carrying such a big torch for Anne Baxter that it is too bad that she won't change her mind about NOT marrying an actor!

Bill has other dates now and then, and there are other pretty girls in Hollywood. But Anne is the only one for him—anyway, at THIS writing.

* * *

Never can quite figure out Helmut Dantine. He's a moody young man. One minute—walking in the clouds. The next, down in the dumps. But he is always honest.

When I asked him if he were having trouble with Warners' about starring, in the remake of "Petrified Forest," he said frankly:

"I'm not happy. I didn't want to do the former Humphrey Bogart role. It's his part, and I didn't want to follow in his footsteps. But I am not pouting—or remaining away from the set as some people have said. I'm trying to make the best of an unhappy situation."

Some say he is still carrying a torch for his wife, Gwen Anderson. One of his steadiest "dates" in Hollywood is Myrna Loy.

* * *

Now that Alexis Smith is married to Craig Stevens—her real and legal name is Mrs. Gail Hughes Shikles, Jr. because that's Craig's real and legal name.

Steve Crane (he's Lana's ex) has been trying to date Betty Hutton. So far—not much luck.

Lon McCallister's back in town with the Army's permission to emote in "Winged Victory." But that didn't mean that Lon could go back to his own nice, comfortable little home and take it easy. No, sir—he moved right out to the camp barracks and went back on strict Army regulations with the 300 other soldiers of the "Winged Victory" unit.

Lon came over to my house one afternoon with two other boys from the "acting" Army. "They're former New York press agents," he explained, introducing Joe Heidt and Bill Doll. "They wanted to meet you."

"Since we hit Los Angeles," Bill and Joe told me, "Lon is the most popular guy in the outfit. He's got all the good telephone numbers."

"I suppose all the guys want to meet Hedy Lamarr, Lana Turner and Olivia de Havilland," I guessed. And believe you me—the answer was a surprise! Seems the kids are out and out scared of the "glamour queens." In the order named—the boys want to meet and ask for a date:

Peggy Ryan
Jeanne Crain
Joan Leslie
Judy Garland—even if she is "big league."

They used to say that the Frank Sinatra Bobby Sockers opened their mouths and squealed. Now they call it "opening their big Booby Traps!"

Just about the time you'll be reading this you will be seeing "Janie." And I'm wagering a guess right now that it is going to be the favorite picture of 1944 for all 'teen agers.

This movie about a sub-deb who accidentally becomes hostess at a hotcha party for service men, is a lulu and a honey. It's got everything including a "blanket party" which I wouldn't advise you kids to try to copy without a chaperone—even if it is all just good harmless fun.

Come to think of it—"blanket parties" aren't anything new. Back in the days of the Revolutionary War (no, I wasn't there) they went in for "Bundling"—which meant that it was perfectly all right for various and assorted people to wrap up in blankets and snuggle into one bed to keep warm!

Just try that idea on your Maiden Aunt sometime!

But the bright particular star of "Janie" is Joyce Reynolds who looks about 16 but who is really 20. She's as fresh and young and gay as the latest Dinah Shore song.

She was born in San Antonio, Texas, and came out to California two years ago to enroll in the University of California at Los Angeles. It was while she was playing in "Alice In Wonderland" on the campus, that a Warner talent scout saw her and signed her in a hurry.

Joyce worries about only one thing—bathing suit photographs. "I look so Dietrich," she told a surprised publicity man who thought she looked like—just a young girl in a bathing suit.

The following letter comes from Larry Adler:

"Several weeks ago a young sailor in to see our show confided that he mightily liked to play the drums. Always one to take a hint, I called on the gob during my act, and while I played the harmonica, he beat the skins on a little madrigal of mine called "Hand to Mouth Boogie."

The next day was "I Am An American Day" at Soldiers Field. I took the sailor out there with me, and before 60,000 people sitting under umbrellas, we conducted an intime jam session. The crowd loved it, and when the gob took six choruses of the boogie for a ride, they whistled and screamed their approval. The kid undoubtedly stole the show.

Would you be more interested if you knew his name was JACKIE COOPER?"

There was something very heart-warming and sweet about the baby shower Mrs. John Wayne gave for Loretta Young, who is one of the most ecstatic about-to-be mothers in Hollywood.

Everyone wanted to give Loretta a gift for that baby because we all knew how hard she had prayed that she and her husband, Lt. Colonel Tom Lewis, would be blessed with a child.

Jean Arthur, who so seldom goes any place, showed up for this event, bringing beautiful hand-embroidered pillow cases and sheets in pink and blue. "No," laughed Jean, "I didn't do them myself. Why, I can't even darn a sock."

But no one was more thrilled than Ann Sothern as the big, exciting-looking packages were unwrapped. Annie is "expecting" herself—and she said she was getting lots of good ideas. "I never dreamed a baby needed so much," she admitted.

But the gift that touched Loretta most was the one from her husband, who was overseas. He had cabled "Jo" Wayne to buy a handmade dress, and Loretta, with tears in her eyes, said the baby will wear it when it is baptized.

The Darryl Zanuck party honoring Walter Winchell was tres gala. The bright colored umbrella tables were set out on the sand at the beach house, and a sumptuous dinner was served while it was still daylight over the Pacific Ocean.

Olivia de Havilland, who has put on a little weight, I'm afraid, arrived with Major John Huston. These two are together everywhere when he is on leave, and they seem very much in love.

Gene Tierney, carrying a parasol in shocking pink, to match her dress, came with Lt. Oleg Cassini. They seem so happy, and it is wonderful to be able to tell you that their baby, who has been so ill, is getting better and stronger.

Joan Blondell, with a wonderful suntan, came with a well-known magazine editor. Joan Bennett came direct from a broadcast, and Myrna Loy, who is so slim these days, was lovely in a flowered print.

I had a long talk with Barbara Hutton Grant, who says that this time she is going to put up a fight for her little boy, Lance. Cary was on a hunting trip, so he wasn't with Barbara. On advice of her lawyer, Barbara is making no comments about her ex-husband's suit, but she adores her little boy, and she's determined that nothing is going to take him away from her. Cary is crazy about him, too, and calls him "General."

There were many other stars—but none more attractive than Winchell's own pretty daughter, Walda.

Sonny Tufts swears its true:

Several months ago his Macaw bird got a job in a Paramount picture at $25 for a day's work.

The other day, the casting office called and asked if the bird could work again. "We can't pay $25 this time," the casting director explained. "Would you be willing to take $20?"

"Sure," said Sonny—and lived to regret it! The Macaw, perched on his shoulder while he had talked over the 'phone, bit him! Guess that's one good way to take care of a nasty agent who's doing you dirt.

I have the greatest admiration for Ida Lupino. Whether it is a ladylike word or not, Ida has guts.

She has been worried almost out of her mind about her husband, Captain Louis Hayward, who came back a hero from that nightmare at Tarawa. When his nerves collapsed, and he was sent to the Corona Naval Hospital for a long rest; many friends were afraid that Ida would collapse, as well.

Instead, she has gone about her work, kept her chin up and, what is doubly hard for any woman—she hasn't talked about Louis' illness. It is as though she were pretending that he was not ill at all. Whenever I ask her about him, she always smiles when she replies: "Louis is just fine, Louella—just fine!"

A dressing room to end all dressing rooms is the new suite Paramount is whipping up for Betty Hutton. Raoul Pène Du Bois, who did the out-of-this-world dream sets for "Lady In The Dark," is the decorator. And believe me, girls, it's something!

Step into the room, and it seems to be a golden and green bower (Betty's favorite color scheme). But sections of the walls are on pivots and just by pressing a button, Betty can swing her golden bower into a complete wall of mirrors.

Hope the little bombshell star never starts swinging one of her songs in front of all those mirrors. WHAM!

If it turns out that you like Ross Hunter in Columbia movies, you can thank your boy friend, Frank Sinatra.

Maybe Frankie has never even heard of Ross, but he is indirectly responsible for his contract, and here is how it happened:

A talent scout was in Cleveland looking around for actors. He was bowled over one day when an entire parade of Bobby-Sockers paraded past his hotel bearing placards: "DOWN WITH SINATRA! UP WITH HUNTER."

Happily imagining there was a VOICE lurking somewhere, the scout investigated only to find out that the Hunter referred to was a school teacher! And what's more—he'd never acted, and he couldn't warble a note.

But he was good-looking, 23 years old and looked like a swell camera bet. The upshot was a test, and the result a long term contract with Columbia.

Listen, you 14 and 15 year old girls—don't diet too strenuously. Remember little Ann Gillis who used to play child roles on the screen?

Hadn't heard anything about her for a couple of years until the other day I ran into her in the beauty parlor. She's 17 now and a beauty. I asked her where she had been and what she was doing that she wasn't in pictures?

"I got too fat to work," Ann admitted honestly. "When I was about 12 I began to put on a lot of weight. I went straight up the scale to 135 pounds. I did everything I could to get it off. Almost starved myself and exercised violently—but still I stayed fat.

"Finally, about a year ago, the weight started to come off. Not all at once but a couple pounds a month. When I asked my doctor, he told me that what I had thought was excess fat in my early 'teens was just 'baby fat.' It is awfully hard to get off and seems to take forever!

"But now that I am grown up Nature turned the trick and practically did my reducing for me. Now I weigh 106," and Ann pivoted to show me her new streamlined "figger." Wish Mother Nature would turn a trick like that for me!

honor she christened a ship last year, over her visit to the Tuskegee Air Field. These are all symbols of the achievements of her race. "If I'm getting to be a symbol, too, in my very small way, that makes me happy."

In New York a group of colored children from the Billy Rose show called on her. They brought her a box of dusting powder. They were terribly sorry, they'd meant to bring her a better present, but their rehearsal checks hadn't come through yet. Then they looked pointedly at a small boy, who cleared his throat, stepped forward and said, like the Lady in the Dark: "I want to make a speech. I want to tell you that we're all very proud of you, Miss Horne."

She'll never part with that box of dusting powder.

There's nothing extravagant about her except her beauty. She has the gentleness and dignity of breeding. On her father's side, her people were educators—her grandfather was a high school principal, one of her uncles a college dean. She was brought up on books—still reads at the table when she eats alone. Her six-year-old daughter's going mad with excitement right now, because she's in the first grade and just learning to read. Lena feels for her, thinks there's no adventure quite like it.

Lena's parents separated when she was three. Part of her childhood was spent in boarding schools. At 11 she went back to Brooklyn to live with her father's parents. Her mother was an actress and, through her connections, Lena got a job at the Cotton Club when she was 15. Her grandparents, pretty old-fashioned folk, hit the ceiling. The kids she went to school with were terribly impressed. For two years her mother took her back and forth to the job, and she wasn't allowed to go to night clubs, though she worked in one. That was silly, she thought.

She also thought it was silly that the Cotton Club should have taken her in the first place, since she could neither sing nor dance. The dance steps she learned fast enough. And she'd sing in the dressing room, with the girls kidding her, but never in public. One evening Lyle Miller who, with Noble Sissle, had produced "Shuffle Along," heard this voice coming through the transom. It had a quality he liked—

"Noble's taking his band out on the road," he told Lena. "I'd like to talk to him about you."

That really made her giggle. "What would a band do with me? I can't sing."

"Are you willing to learn?"

"Oh—yes!! —But I don't think my mother'd let me go."

maestress horne . . .

There was an interview with Sissle—a very wonderful guy. He thought Lena had much to learn but was worth teaching. "I'm willing," said her mother, "but I'd have to go along. She's only 17." That suited Sissle, who's pretty old-fashioned himself.

He taught her how to walk onstage, how to wear evening gowns, how to use her speaking voice. For one number he put her into a full dress suit with sequined tailcoat and trouser-stripes, feminized by a high-ruff and a red jabot for the shirt-front. In white gloves and topper she did a tap dance routine while the boys sang. He went easy on her own singing—just two or three lines at first, with a boy singing behind her—then, as her confidence

WIN WITH A SMILE

By Carol Carter

■ How do you like your smiles? Let's see . . . there's Garland's pert grin, Durbin's gleeful chuckle or Turner's giggle. But howsoever you take 'em, the Hollywood versions all come sunny-side up. Which is my way of letting you know that teeth out around Hollywood & Vine are strictly in the white, healthy and gleaming class.

What's your rating? I hope all you MODERN SCREENers are candidates for the "brilliant smile" class. But if not, begin now, this day, to help yourself to one of those grins that sparkle and glisten a girl right into good looks. Let's think a bit about teeth and why yours should have a four-star rating. Poor molars are broken bearings which slow down the body machinery and can make it eligible for the junk heap. Cavities allow disease-bacteria to enter the blood stream . . . then you're liable to different ills. So I'm practically saving your life by this warning. Too, when a neglected tooth is lost, digestion goes haywire. Your speech may get blurred and develop static. Or the loss can upset the position of the remaining teeth so that your pretty facial contours are thrown all awry.

To prevent these horrors, give a thought to tooth care. All dentists are agreed upon three pointers. (1) Clean your sparklers regularly. (2) Visit the dentist every six months, or better yet, every four months. (3) Eat properly. Which means that you'll place your menu accent on raw fruits and vegetables, whole grained breads and plain meats.

Now about cleaning. Dentifrices are not new . . . only better. Egyptians mixed powders and paste. Ancient Hindus brushed their teeth with the frayed ends of twigs. The Arabs used the "siwak," a root of the "tooth-brush tree." And that completes our history lesson for today.

Step into the economics class, please. Ah, yes. We Americans spend over $50,000,000 yearly on dentifrices. Always ones to get our money's worth, too. Which decidedly proves that dentifrices are well worth the money. Take your choice of powder, liquid or paste tooth cleaners. Your dentifrice is an important protective against decay. And how it shines those molars!

A new broom sweeps clean . . . and so does a new tooth brush. Which means away with a brush whose bristles are broken or loose. Choose one with a small head and long, firm bristles that can get around all the "corners" of your mouth comfortably. The better to brush with, my dear. Never use anybody else's brush; have one for each member of the family. It's a bright idea to own two brushes, so one may dry while the other is in use.

When to wield your brush? Morning and night, and after every meal. And how's your brushing technique? Judy Garland, who owns a devastating smile, gives us this routine: Teeth should be brushed from the gums toward the biting surfaces, not crosswise. This massages the gums and sweeps out all food particles from between the teeth. Hold your brush at a slanting angle and brush the inner surfaces thoroughly, too. Don't cheat on time . . . a good job requires at least three minutes, taking three or four teeth at a time and doing right by each group.

Don't stick your tongue out at me! Instead, every time you wash your teeth, stick it out at your mirrored image. Then, go ahead, brush your tongue, too. The tongue catches tiny food particles which need to be scraped off gently. If left on your tongue, they decay and cause bad breath.

Gargle for glamour! Yes, really. Mouthwashes are important; they're cleansing, deodorizing and mildly germicidal. They help guard against unpleasant breath . . . ssh, we mean h-a-l-i-t-o-s-i-s! Don't be one of those gals who think "It can't happen to me." Be wise, like the Hollywood smoothies, and guard against any possible trace of tainted breath by using a good mouthwash. You'll like the refreshing, exhilarating tingle a fine mouthwash leaves. Take a good mouthful. Swirl it 'round and 'round and enjoy its pleasant effect!

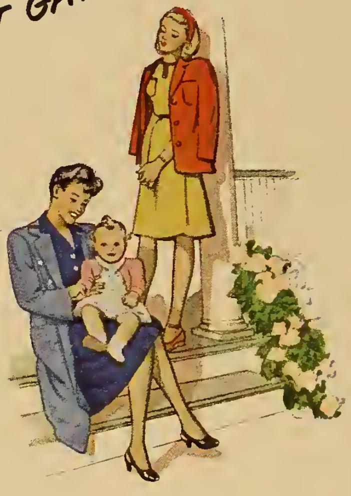
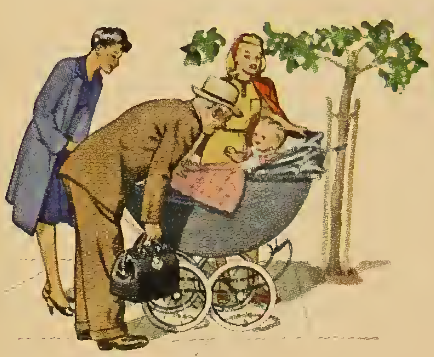
(IT GAVE MARGE THAT IVORY LOOK!)



"Life's a mess!" Marge said.

“Last night I met the nicest Navy Lieutenant at the club dance—then some glamour girl danced him away. Gee,” Marge said, pointing at me, “if I only had your baby's radiant complexion!” Mommy winked. “That's her Ivory Look,” she said. “You can have it, too—ask Doc.”



Doctor told her my beauty secret.

He just happened by in time to agree with Mommy. “Stop being careless about skin care,” he said. “Change to regular Ivory cleansing! Ivory Soap has no coloring, medication or strong perfume that might irritate tender skin. More doctors advise it than all other brands combined!”

Now she's getting all the breaks!

Yep, regular, gentle cleansings with my mild Ivory gave Marge that smoother, lovelier Ivory Look her Lieutenant loves. (He says every girl ought to know it's easy to have that Ivory Look—with regular, gentle Ivory care.)

step before the cameras. But cameras were a thousand miles from her thoughts: "This is it, Hedda," she said seriously. "This is the real thing. I'd trade all the career stuff in the world for one of their smiles."

the bluebird . . .

A writer once called Alice Faye "the girl who has found what we're all looking for." If he meant Happiness, he hit the nail on the head.

I'd driven out to Alice Faye's home in the San Fernando Valley over winding Laurel Canyon Road, leaving studios and gossip and stories of scheming ambition farther behind me with every mile. By the time I turned onto the tree-lined road which leads to Alice's and Phil's house, movies were forgotten completely. It was the sort of country-near-town spot we're all going to have when we get rich. You'll find it in Connecticut and in Michigan and in Virginia in its various forms. The city is just over the tree-tops—a twenty-minute drive—but it's shut off from you by Nature's magic, and you can forget it completely in the wink of an eye.

The tall iron gates swung open as the car approached. They're protected by an electric eye which is controlled from inside the house. A winding lane leads to the sprawling house of fieldstone which is the Harris' castle. It's actually Phil's house—I'd passed Alice's old one a piece down the road, the one she sold when she married Phil. There were vast lawns and flowers crowding one another in the garden beds—penstemon and bachelor buttons and snapdragons and late pansies and shadows of violets like blue scarves under the trees. Blackbirds hopped along the lawns, chirped in the tall shade trees that conceal the house even from the hidden road which leads to it. There isn't an inch of that estate that isn't intended for comfort and gracious living and fun for kids—even to the kidney-shaped pool built with one end so shallow Alice, Jr., can splash there on hot days.

It's a beautiful home, and just now the nursery is the center of attention. It's a huge room—one of the largest I've ever been in. Two walls are almost entirely of glass, and the trees and pool and the garden flowers literally come tumbling into it. The baby blue that dominates its color scheme is picked up in the blue of the sky, and the pink notes of the nursery furnishings are carried out again in the flowers that peep in at the windows.

If small-fry are as curious as grown-ups, I know every kid in the country would like to see this room where little Alice and Phil spend their days. The littlest one will be called Phil because:

"We want to make sure there'll always be an Alice and a Phil," Alice said. "Besides, we think she's going to be her papa's girl."

That's precisely what Alice said about Alice, Jr., and I think it's wishful talking. At the moment Phil looks like a rosebud and has considerably less hair than her papa; but parents can see resemblances beyond the vision of ordinary mortals, so Alice may be right.

But to get back to the nursery. As I said, it's a sort of kid's dream of heaven, all blue and pink with a thick, circular rug in soft pastel tones in the middle of the floor. But the floor itself is covered with a heavy cream-colored carpet, so there's no chance of uncertain little feet slipping. The nurse's bed occupies an inglenook in one corner. And Alice, Jr.'s bed of white enameled wood with high sides, is close enough for safety's sake. There's a tiny piano—a real one—and Alice, Jr. hammers at it by the hour. She sings little songs and holds true to the key, too. This is what you'd expect with such a father and mother, but children of famous parents seldom duplicate their talents. On a long seat by the bay window are Alice, Jr.'s toys, and such a lavish assortment of modern woolly lambs and dogs and cats and dolls you've never seen. Yes, and drums and horns and colored rubber balls. There's a whole room full of carts and tricycles and the silliest tiny little bicycles. Off the nursery is the children's dressing room with Junior's wardrobe hung neatly on racks—a whole row of topcoats in pastel wools—they couldn't be more than ten inches long.

"What do you want them to be when they grow up?" I asked Alice. She replied, surprisingly:

"Well, since being an actress brought me all this—" her broad gesture included house, gardens, the picture of Phil on the baby's dresser and the nursery in which we stood with its priceless occupants—"I'd ask nothing better for them than to be what I've been. Being an actress has brought me a full and satisfactory life. It's hard work, but it's unselfish in one way: While earning your money, you know you're making other people happy."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

At the time this incident occurred, I was a student nurse at a New Jersey hospital, assigned to a very wonderful 17-year-old patient who was dying of an incurable disease. Vera had few friends and fewer interests, and during the eight months she was with us, we grew to love her and tried to gratify her every wish.

One day, she happened to mention that she'd like a picture of Frank Sinatra, and so the gang delegated me to get one for her in view of the fact that I was on night duty and therefore free to travel to New York.

Frank was appearing at the Paramount then, and I had to wait for over an hour until he came out, by which time there were over a hundred kids waiting with me. There was the natural reaction to his appearance, and in the shoving I was thrown against him and nearly fell. He caught me and noticing my uniform, asked if I were a nurse. I replied that I was and hurried on to explain my mission. Before I was halfway through, he grabbed my arm and dragged me past the shrieking mob.

Once inside, he asked me about myself and about Vera, and after I'd told him, he looked at me sadly and said, "Why do swell kids like that have to die?" Then he gave me a beautiful picture inscribed, "To Vera—best of luck and I'm rootin' for you."

Two weeks later when Frank was in Newark, he called the hospital to inquire about Vera, and when she was told about it, she couldn't answer, just hugged the picture a little closer.

Vera was only one of the small guys in this world, but it took a big man with a bigger heart to make her leaving it a little easier.

It was having babies that made Alice realize what her fans really meant to her:

"I never knew what I represented to the people we call fans, Hedda, until before Alice, Jr. was born. Women in Australia knitted socks and robes and little jackets for a baby whose mother they'd never met and never hoped to meet. And the notes they sent with those gifts! They brought tears to my eyes. They wrote that they thought of me with every stitch that went into them. Sometimes they recalled songs I'd sung that had lifted them out of moments of depression; mostly they loved me because I recreated romance that had long since left their lives. They made me realize that a fan is a friend you've never met, a good and loyal friend who hasn't had an opportunity of going through the ceremony of introductions. They're friends that know you from the intimate glimpses they catch in the theater or on the screen or from hearing your voice on the radio. Often they make you feel they know you more surely than the people you actually meet."

If that is the case, then Alice Faye has a world of sincere friends, if the fan mail that follows her like her shadow is a reliable barometer of friendship. There were more letters when Alice, Jr. was born than ever came concerning Alice's romances or marriage. And this second baby seems to have driven everyone but the movie moguls into ecstasies of delight. Of course, movie men are only human, and Alice Faye is a top-flight star. They were bound to think of such happy occurrences in terms of dollars and cents. But the fans eagerly followed the parties given for her—the baby showers, most elaborate of their kind ever seen, given by executives' wives and fellow players. I've described them in detail on my radio programs. Sometimes there'd be exquisite bed jackets and robes for Alice. Most often the toys were the thing—they'd range from pee-wee bicycles to boxing gloves and dolls as big as a four-year-old. Hollywood goes in for the extravagant gesture in everything, from blessed events to previews.

9-year-old winchell . . .

Alice's fans have wanted to follow her home life day by day while waiting for her to come back to the screen. They loved the fact that "Tookie," Phil's nine-year-old by a previous marriage, adored Alice, Jr. from the day she was born. He's also one of his second mother's most ardent fans. It was "Tookie," by the way, who let the cat out of the bag about Phyllis' impending arrival. Alice hadn't mentioned the fact to anybody outside the family, because she was making "The Gang's All Here" and wanted to get through the picture without any publicity about it. But "Tookie" proudly told everyone he met: "There's going to be three of us, you know." Wiseacres put two and two together, and Alice didn't deny it—she's too much of a mother for that.

It isn't hard to tell where the actress leaves off and the mother begins where Alice is concerned. The children come first, and if she ever has to make a decision with one side of her nature pitted against the other, you can bet the chil-

But we talked about her career, too, over tea. Alice had wanted to play a straight dramatic role and became interested in the part of Cissy in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." But the studio couldn't hold the picture up long enough to make this possible, so Joan Blondell went into the role Alice coveted.

"There'll be another part any day now," Alice said confidently—so confidently I felt that missing the part of Cissy was only a surface thing.

From time to time Alice has stepped out of her singing frame to play straight dramatic things, and she's been as successful in them as she has been in her musicals. The secret of this is the heart she puts into everything. She is a simple, direct, almost elemental person. Earthy, as have been so many of the world's great artists. She hasn't changed fundamentally from the girl who first came to Hollywood. At that time I met a quiet, big-eyed blonde kid who put a song over in a way that made you realize what a weapon words and music could be. Rudy Vallee, who seldom misses a trick when it comes to spotting genius, knew the value of her deep, vibrant voice and primitive approach. Much of her quick success came without any great struggle on her part. Things just fell into her lap. Lilian Harvey walked out on the "George White Scandals" and, although Alice was supposed to sing only a song or two with Rudy's band, she was given the lead role.

Alice was a nice, friendly girl from New York's Hell's Kitchen in those days—a girl who asked only to be given a chance to follow her singing career. She wanted everyone to like her, but she didn't intend to assume any fake manner to win them. She was what she was, and you could take it or leave it. She was cruelly hurt when she first encountered jealousy and competitive dislike, because she had none of that in her own make-up and wasn't sophisticated enough to project herself into the minds of others. When a battery of instructors moved in on her—people who wanted to teach her how to walk and how to talk and how to wear her fame in what Hollywood thought was the proper manner, Alice gave them a quick brush-off. She had her own notion of living just as she had her own idea of tempo and of selling a song. She became a sensation doing things her own way.

plugger de luxe . . .

She became the girl George Gershwin and Cole Porter and Irving Berlin wanted to sing their songs. The first time she stopped singing was the time her father died suddenly and left her numb from shock and grief. Alice and her mother and father and brothers, Charlie and Bill, have always been a tight family unit. Her cure for that blow was to ask for a straight dramatic role—with Shirley Temple in "Poor Little Rich Girl," and the change to the increased concentration it demanded was good medicine at the time. It also proved to her that her talent had many angles.

So Alice Faye is what I call a "yes" and "no" girl—it's as elemental as that. Things either are right for her or she wants none of them. And she instinctively knows what's right for her.

I recalled Alice's romance with Phil when we passed the open door of the game room where Alice and Phil's saddles stood among the racquets and golf clubs and other sporting paraphernalia. She caught my eye, followed the trend of my thought:

"Phil and I used to ride all over these no time for riding right now. We used to love the hills at dusk. But now I sing Junior to sleep instead. And when Phil's here, he tells her a bedtime story. Funny, how you change."

I don't really feel people change though; they progress into something that was always intended—something fundamental in their being from the day they were born. I was watching Alice Faye play the role in life she had chosen for herself. She'd always said, "Some day I want a houseful of kids." I reminded her of it:

"This is a pretty good start," was her smiling answer.

home-grown audience . . .

"Well, this is one role you've picked for yourself," I told her. "We're always yapping about that, we actresses. I did a spate of that kind of complaining when I was an actress myself. You feel you do better in something you like and want than in some role a producer throws at you. You're certainly a star in this one, Baby, even if you're playing to a very small audience."

Then a nurse came along and dragged an unwilling two-year-old siren off to bed. The garden lay in shadow, and the birds had gone to the very top of the trees where they could still catch a bit of sun.

"I hope I'll be able to make your fans see you as you looked this afternoon," I told Alice as we said good-by. "By the way, what songs do you sing Junior to sleep with?"

Alice laughed: "You'd die," she said. "You'd simply die to hear us. I sing anything and everything that comes into my throat. Sometimes lullabys, but mostly old songs from my pictures—maybe that's a present to myself. And I sing things I hear on the radio—other people's songs. Junior tries to follow along at first; but pretty soon she's just able to say 'more, Mummy, more' in a very sleepy little grunt. She's generally tuckered out by the time we hit the old rocking chair."

On the homeward drive I found myself humming a tune Alice sang in "On the Avenue." She sat at a table, looking dreamily off into space as her husky, deep voice whispered:

"My heart's on fire, the flame grows higher,
But I can weather the storm,
What do I care how much it may storm—
I have my love to keep me warm."

So you'll be seeing Alice again when the studio can sell her an idea. She'll have to be roused out of the contentment and happiness which is apt to make her feel there's no hurry about picking up a career again. If it weren't for the fan letters that keep pouring in—letters that make her feel she has a responsibility to those friends she's never met—sometimes I think she might never go back at all. But the boys at the front are clamoring for her. So are folks in the Mid-West—folks in little country towns who never get to see big musicals except on the screen. They could do with a couple of hours of her songs and be the better for it. They say so very frankly. They want to escape back into the days of romance that war and work have blurred for them.

One of these mornings, very early, before the birds begin hopping on the lawns, and while the swimming pool is chill in the shadows, Alice will tiptoe quietly into the nursery and kiss the two little sleeping tots good-by. She'll turn her car down the San Fernando Valley towards the studio. That day will be good news grew, a little more and more. They toured the country, and everything was going fine till Sissle got himself banged up in a motor accident and told Lena she'd have to lead the band.

They were booked at the Moonlight Gardens in Cincinnati—the first colored band ever to play there. What were they going to do without a leader? Cancel the date, of course. What else could they do? Meantime they trooped over to the hospital to see Sissle.

He called Lena aside. "You know what you've got to do, don't you?—You've got to lead the band."

For a moment she wondered if the accident had gone to his head. But his eyes were clear and quiet as always.

"I can't!" she gasped.

"Of course you can. Just get up there, talk and be your own self. Everything'll be all right."

Well, you don't let a guy like Sissle down. You take the plunge, and if you break your neck, at least he'd know you'd tried. Casabianca had nothing on Lena when she walked out that night. But lo and behold, Sissle knew best. After the first awful moments tension relaxed, she got her first laugh, the words started coming easy. Sissle was a leader of dignity, who kept the boys within bounds. But so great was the relief from strain that their bubbling spirits ran away with them that evening, and they started jumping. The folks went mad. Business at the Moonlight Gardens topped anything they'd done in months.

Soon after, Lena gave up her work for love. Gave it up, as she thought, for good and all. In Pittsburgh she met her father whom she hadn't known very well up to then. They got to be good friends. She also met a young man who had nothing to do with show business. They fell in love and married. She knew nothing about housekeeping. An egg was something that came to the table poached. But she was willing and able and caught on before long. Only the marriage didn't. It wasn't a case of career vs. romance. She hadn't left half her heart at the stage door. They just weren't for each other, and when Gail was three and a half, they parted. This June they were divorced, and she got custody of their 5-year-old girl.

Lena went back to Brooklyn—to the house she'd been born in, which belonged to her dad. Her mother had re-married, so Aunt Edwina—Eddy to her friends—came to keep house for her and the baby. She got a job with Charlie Barnett's band. It was he who taught her how to project her voice. When she went to him, you couldn't hear her beyond the second row. He'd plunk himself in the last row and make her sing till every word came clear.

She was playing the Paramount with him when John Hammond heard her and offered her the spot with Café Society Downtown. It meant working alone—not as part of a band—for the first time.

"Take it," Charlie advised. "It's the best experience you'll ever get."

For which advice she blesses him. She loved that place as she'll probably never love another. Its atmosphere was unique. People came there who wanted to listen to music—actors, artists, musicians. Entertainers, dropping in to be entertained, would get up and perform as the spirit moved them. Lena worked with the top Negro names, and her own name started running from tongue to tongue. She stayed seven months and—except for Aunt Eddy and her agent—she'd be there yet.

The agent got a notion that she ought to go to Hollywood.

"What for? I've got a good job here." The movies never entered her head. A night club maybe, but what did a Hollywood night club have that CSD didn't? Alone, he might never have worn her down. But all of a sudden Aunt Eddy took a hand—Aunt Eddy who never butted in. Lena couldn't make it out.

"I've got a hunch, that's all," Aunt Eddy said. "Suppose you don't do so well. At least you'll have seen California."

She saw California all right—as much of it as you can see on foot. Once while she was married, she took a driving lesson, got scared and wouldn't try again. She'll trust her life cheerfully to the drivingest idiot, but she won't drive herself. So she spent her time walking up and down Sunset Boulevard and pining for New York. Every morning she'd pack, and Aunt Eddy would unpack. "Give it time, honey."

At last something broke. She and Katharine Dunham were engaged to open the Little Troc. But before that day rolled around, something else had happened. Her agent had taken her over to see Arthur Freed at M-G-M. "I've got five minutes," Mr. Freed said. They stayed five hours and left with a contract.

It was a pretty confusing day. All Lena remembers are faces peering at her while she sang song after song. Faces she knew—Roger Eden, who played for her, Vincent Minelli, who'd once wanted her for an all-colored production of "Serena Blandish" that never came off. Faces whose names she knew—Louis B. Mayer and Ida Koverman. Strange faces—faces that looked businesslike and faces that smiled—hours of faces and songs and faces—then talk of terms and contracts in an office—and handshakes and good wishes—

And all she could think, going home, was, "Suppose I flop. They'll be sorry they signed me."

You know the rest—the non-stop series of non-flops from "Panama Hattie" through "Cabin" and "Stormy Weather" and "As Thousands Cheer." Coming up are "Broadway Rhythm," "Spring Fever," "Two Sisters and A Sailor." Next she goes into "Ziegfeld Follies." They're so sorry they signed her, they wish she were twins. So do all the other studios. They didn't have to wait to see "Panama Hattie." They started gnashing their teeth after the Little Troc opened—

Aunt Eddy's delighted and never once said: "I told you so." Gail wasn't so sure at first. Friends took her to see "Cabin in the Sky" and carried her out screaming. She thought her mother was being killed. So Lena sat beside her through "Stormy Weather," holding her hand. Now she knows that on the screen her mother's just make-believe.

As a matter of fact, she doesn't miss meat at all—not with the fish and cheese and egg dishes Aunt Eddy whips up. They always have a salad and never pastry or pies. Just lots of chilled fresh fruit.

Lena used to wear a lot of red, but every time she goes to New York she falls in love with black all over again. Thinks she looks best in tailored clothes and awful in fussy ones— The war has curbed her two pet extravagances—perfume and shoes. Except for carnation, she prefers spicy odors to sweet.

Her greatest regret is that the family refused to have her ears pierced, and she can't wear the diamond earrings that have been handed down through several generations of Hornes. Her only hobby is collecting records, and that's a recent one. With her, music appreciation is strictly from feeling. Her feelings respond to Ravel and Debussy, and her ear to the exotic patterns of Hindemith. Wagner's too heavy for her—give her "Tristan," and you can have the rest. Above all, she loves the Russians, modern or classic.

They live in a rented house off Sunset Boulevard. Lena likes California, but misses the pace and stimulation of New York and welcomes every chance to go back. Last winter the dream of her life came true. She sang with Duke Ellington's band at the Capitol. In Hollywood, she sings for servicemen at the Masquers and at the Canteen every week. But if it weren't for the camp shows, she'd find time hanging pretty heavy on her hands between pictures.

and the angel sang . . .

She entertains at both white and colored camps and prefers the colored only because they get fewer entertainers. At both, the boys are wonderful. They make her feel guilty. She's supposed to give them a good time, and they go out of their way to make things nice for her.

She's had her fair share of thrills. But nothing can ever top the three days she spent at the Tuskegee Army Air School last February.

First—to see those three or four thousand boys of her own race, from preflight cadets to near-graduates, so young and eager, rising so gloriously to their first opportunity to fly—as the record of the 99th Squadron over Anzio bears witness. Then, the welcome they gave her. She tried to talk to every one of them personally, ate every meal in a different messhall, crawled into planes, under and over them, gave a couple of shows at the hospital for kids who'd cracked up, saw the museum that memorializes Dr. Carver's priceless work for his own people and the whole human race. She was up at 6 every morning and danced every night—one night with the enlisted men, one night with the non-coms, one night with the officers. She danced blisters under each slipper-strap, had to kick her shoes off whenever she got her feet under a table for a minute.

They gave a big formal retreat for her. As guest of honor, she stood one pace behind the C.O. while the squadrons paraded, and the band played the song of each squadron. At a command, the biggest squadron halted in front of her, eyes right. An officer came up with a box of American beauty roses. She had to do something to release her pent-up emotions. She knew it was out of order, but she just couldn't help it. As they stepped smartly out again, her hand went up in a salute. The officer smiled, murmured, "Thank you." That was out of order, too, but no one got disciplined for it.

The whole beautiful experience mounted to a super-duper climax at the graduating exercises of the class of February. An escort called for her and took her to the mothers and sweethearts were gathered. When she saw the arch of crossed sabers—the aisle of honor through which she was to pass to her table—she all but fainted. "This is the payoff," she thought. "I'll never be prouder."

She was wrong, though.

The command of the Field is shared by Lt. Col. Noel Parrish, white, and Lt. Col. Benjamin Davis, colored. Colonel Davis was away on a mission. Colonel Parrish got up to speak.

"I've given wings to a lot of you boys," he said. "You've proven that, granted the opportunity, courage and gallantry, the will and the power to learn, aren't confined to one group of people. In her way, Miss Horne proves the same thing—that charm and beauty and graciousness in women aren't confined to one group either." He turned to Lena. "Would you mind standing up, Miss Horne?" And he pinned the silver wings over her heart.

She couldn't trust herself to say more than "Thank you." After all, you can't blubber in front of a colonel and a whole mess hall full of brand-new lieutenants.

She hopes that some day the movies will present the story of a real negro—Carver or Toussaint L'Ouverture or Harriet Tubman, the slave who ran way and helped so many others through the underground. Whether or not she plays in them doesn't matter. The point is to show them.

She would like to be an actress, though she's a little shy about saying so. "If you're a singer, people think you're kidding when you say you want to act."

There's talk at M-G-M about doing the life of Florence Mills, with Lena. So far it's just talk, but the very thought sets Lena's backbone tingling.

"Of course Miss Mills was a great natural artist," she says, "and I'm not. But how proud I'd be to play her, if only because my people loved and admired her so."

From that angle, no one's better qualified to take on the role than Lena Horne.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

This happened in 1941. At that time, the big U.S.O. troupes hadn't started their camp show tours, and we needed a guest star for our big G.I. show. Our special services officer said he could get us a radio singer—terrific entertainer but not well known. Well, it was arranged and she managed to fly down just in time for a short rehearsal.

We did our first show and left the audience begging for more. Ten minutes rest and then another performance—all this on one of the hottest evenings of a mercilessly hot summer. We were completely exhausted after those two shows when the Colonel came backstage to tell us there were still 2000 soldiers outside who'd been waiting for hours to get in. We were pooped, just couldn't go on again. But the singer was willing. We let the crowd in and explained our inability to give the complete show; just the opening, the singer and the finale. She went on all right, heat, exhaustion, strain notwithstanding—but she wouldn't let that audience notice it. She gave them song after song until we were afraid she would drop.

She was "discovered" by those G.I.'s then and there as a great singer and great girl—Dinah Shore.

"WILSON"

PRODUCTION

scene a brilliant reception at which President and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson were playing hosts at a private concert by the famous Polish pianist, Paderewski.

Darryl Zanuck, who was escorting the noted visitor around the Hollywood studio, explained. The Stuart painting and the other huge canvases were not the originals, but copies so faithfully rendered that many other folk who frequent the Executive Mansion like Vice-President Wallace, had been fooled.

"Well," complimented Mr. Wallace with a smile. "You have really done something here!"

Hollywood agrees with Vice-President Wallace that Darryl Zanuck has "really done something!"

That "something" has turned out to be the costliest, longest and most elaborate production ever undertaken by Twentieth Century-Fox. The cost ran well over three million dollars. The film runs almost three hours. Here are a few of the fantastic figures:

The cast was the largest ever assembled in Hollywood, with 143 speaking parts and 12,874 players. The title role is the longest ever written, a total of 1,124 lines.

Almost forty acres and all seven of the studio's sound stages were required for the 162 sets. One set, depicting the Democratic National Convention in Baltimore in 1912, was the largest interior ever filmed. More than 1,500 extras, drilled like military platoons by a staff of fifty-three assistant directors, reenacted the almost hysterical hullabaloo of a political pow-wow. To light the scene required the greatest battery of lamps ever mobilized for a movie camera, enough power to supply a town of 100,000, and 108 electricians. In all, 6,238 technicians worked on "Wilson."

The wardrobe budget was a dressmaker's dream. Nearly 200 special costumes were created for the two Mrs. Wilsons and the three Wilson girls, who set the styles of their era. Geraldine Fitzgerald alone had forty-seven changes, the biggest closet-full of clothes ever stitched together for a movie matron. Each of them was a careful copy of an original Worth model.

The eighty-seven different melodies interwoven into the score of "Wilson" almost provide an index of the scenes.

Zanuck set out to conduct a Technicolor tour of Washington in "Wilson," and before the film is over, you have seen as much of the nation's Capital as you would on a week-end there, perhaps more, since the camera penetrates the private living rooms of the White House.

So exactly were the White House sets duplicated that Thomas Little, Twentieth Century-Fox property boss, figures the Hollywood replica of the White House cost more than the original building of the Executive Mansion when it was completed in 1800. The House of Representatives was duplicated for the screen for the first time for the dramatic scene in which President Wilson asks Congress for a declaration of war on Germany. Here the dais, the clock, the galleries, the paintings, the flags, and inlaid walls and even the chairs were all painstakingly reproduced.

Most difficult of all sets to build, according to Little, was the small President's Room in the Capitol because of the vaulted ceiling and the intricate wall decorations.

In "Wilson," Darryl Zanuck has made more than a movie. He has created a and was terribly disappointed when the order came through for no more pilots, because they had enough, and he was transferred to the Morale Division.

There'd been some talk about Gwen going down to Texas for the Easter holidays. Don was against it at first. Gwen's right about him. He's thoughtful and sweet. He missed her so he could hardly bear it, but what would she do by herself all day with him in camp? He didn't want her hanging around down there, bored and alone—

She took the decision into her own hands. After a couple of boys they knew came up and told her how lonely Don was, she just sat down and wrote she was coming.

Don went out of his mind. For five days and nights he couldn't eat or sleep. Gwen's train was due at 7:30 on a Sunday. He had the day off and was up at four. Somehow the hours passed. He reached the station, only to find that the train was late. Nine-thirty, said the bulletin board. Lots of trains arrive and depart in Amarillo these days, and every time he heard a tootle, Don went crazy. He might have the wrong train. And the wrong station! He scooted around to all the other stations and got back at 9:30. Eleven-ten, said the bulletin board. He figured how far he could walk in half an hour, doggedly he tramped to that point and back. Twelve-fifty, sneered the bulletin board—

By an effort, he kept from slugging it. Twelve-thirty, huh? Okay, he'd show 'em. He wouldn't come back till 12:45—

Twelve forty-five, and the train was in. People getting off. He had the funniest feeling, nervous and shy—as if Gwen weren't the girl he'd been seeing every day for a year, the girl he'd married two months ago—as if she were some faraway dream with a halo around her. His eyes kept searching, but he couldn't find her. There was a girl who might have been Gwen—with the same kind of white fox coat—but she was carrying a baby—

Gwen and babies take to each other. This one belonged to the girl across the aisle in the train, but before they reached Texas, the baby wasn't sure which of the two pretty young things was his mother, and didn't much care. It was Gwen who carried him off the train, while his permanent ma followed with the bottles and stuff.

remote control poppa . . .

Don's heart turned over, and he raced down the platform. It was Gwen all right —Gwen in a turquoise suit under her white coat, Gwen laughing, with a baby in her arms. His eyes went from her to it, and from it to her, and his voice stuck in his throat. "How long—?" he croaked and stalled and started again—"how long since I've been a father?"

By the time they were having lunch at the hotel, some of the strangeness had worn off, but none of the wonder. He couldn't take his eyes off her. "Because next time I look, you might not be here—"

They were having a show at the field that night. Gwen waited in the wings while Don went out to sing, and got the surprise of her life when he announced, "This is a number I wrote for an extra-special girl—"

It was called "Anywhere Is Heaven When I'm with You," and of course it sounded heavenly to her, but the fellows seemed to like it, too, because they yelled for more, and before she knew what was happening, Don had her out on the stage and was introducing her—

THE LARGEST SELLING DEODORANT

"This is the extra-special girl."

Well, they whistled and stamped, and she didn't know what to do—but leave it to Don! Above all the whistling, you could hear him holler, "Quit howling, wolves. She's my wife."

It was kind of embarrassing but awfully sweet in a way.

They had ten marvelous days, getting used to each other all over again. She could only see him evenings, of course, but she managed to keep herself busy during the day. Then they'd have dinner and dance or go to the movies or just talk their heads off. It was the first time they'd really been together since they were married, and the thought of parting again was even worse than before.

Gwen had wanted to spend their last night quietly, but Don said, "No, let's dance, you can't brood so good when you're dancing." Well, they were doing a pretty good job of both when some soldier danced by and said to Don, "You're leaving next week."

"I am?" he muttered—then suddenly they both stood stock still—just like a delayed take in the movies. "I am?" yelled Don, grabbed her hand and rushed over to the soldier. "Whaddaya mean, I'm leaving next week?"

"Just got your orders. You're being transferred to Palm Springs—"

Palm Springs! Three hours from home! For a minute, they couldn't take it in. Then, right in the middle of the dance floor, they hugged each other like a couple of fools.

Of course, that made saying good-by much easier, though it was still bad enough. They parted at midnight on the train platform, with a porter hovering over them. Gwen wanted to stay there and wave, but it was freezing cold, and Don wouldn't let her—

And this may be as good a time as any to reveal the fact that Don's a jealous guy. He says Gwen's just as jealous—the only difference is, he's frank about it. In the old days, for instance, before their engagement was official, any fellow who showed an interest in Gwen would sooner or later get a bid from Don. "How's about boxing a couple of rounds at the Y?"

They'd spar for a while, then Don would casually bring up Gwen's name and hit the guy at the same time. He'd generally catch the drift, if not at the first sock, then at the second or third. "I see what you mean," he'd say, rubbing the spot, and that would fix that.

The O'Connors differ as to what happened on the train platform. Gwen says Don made her promise not to talk to anyone on the trip home. Don says he told her to use her own discretion.

to love, honor and . . .

"Are you kidding?" protests his indignant wife. "Come on, let's face facts, what did you say?"

"I said, use your own discretion, but don't talk to anybody."

When she got back, Gwen moved out to the valley to live with Effie, as everyone calls Don's mother. Now that her husband would be coming in on leave, his home was her place. Mabel, Don's sister-in-law, had brought Gary and Jack, aged six and eight respectively, to visit their grandmother, and the kids took possession of Gwen. For their money, Uncle Don was a swell picker. "I love God first," said Gary, "and my mother and you next. Will you marry me when I grow up?"

"But I can't, Gary. I'm married to Don."

"Say, with all the worries we have in the world, do we have to worry about him, too?"

surprise, surprise . . .

They were expecting to hear from Don any day now, but the day itself was a military secret. Late one afternoon, Gwen came in from a walk with her nephews-in-law and found Effie in the kitchen, looking flustered. "You just missed Don, he phoned from Palm Springs. Never mind now, honey, he'll call again soon. Look, would you run to the bathroom and fetch me an aspirin? What with all the excitement, I've got a headache coming on—"

In the bathroom, the shower was going. "May I come in, Mabel? Effie wants an aspirin."

You guessed. The head that poked itself out from between the shower curtains, mouth puckered for a kiss, was Private O'Connor.

After dinner, they had an important point to settle. Gwen said she'd written twice as often as Don, Don said she hadn't. So she got his letters from the desk, and he poured hers out of his duffle bag, but instead of counting them, they spent a blissful evening reading them all over by firelight—which was hard on the eyes, but wonderful for morale.

Still more wonderful is the fact that Don's stationed at Long Beach now, on WAC recruiting detail, and gets home lots of evenings. They don't know where he'll be sent next, so they're making the very most of these few weeks. Almost the best part is being able to argue again. While they were separated, they vowed they never would, but think of all the fun they'd have missed. Because Gwen and Don don't feel normal unless they argue—

Over a tennis game, for instance. "You'd be great," coos Gwen, "if you'd just hit the ball over the net, for a change—"

"I'm learning from you. Over the net and into the nearest cow—"

"I'm a very good tennis player, if you care to know—almost excellent. In fact—"

"In fact, next time you're going to use a racket—"

"I happen to come of a long line of champions—"

"I say, my pet, haven't you been delicately reared!"

in late, she's been looking for shoes. You know how it is, you can't find shoes—

Don appeals to Effie. "She's always looking for shoes. I wonder why she never brings any shoes home—"

Gwen gives him a wifely peck on the cheek. "Darling, don't you trust me?"

"Of course I trust you but how do I know what you're doing?"

Once she hit below the belt, but on great provocation. She'd bought this hat while Don was away, and thought he'd be crazy about it. All he did, when she put it on, was give one look and say, "Makes you look like a piece of toast with an egg on top."

That's what stung. "Mickey Rooney likes it." said Mrs. O'Connor.

"And where did Mickey Rooney see it?"

"Oh, at the preview, silly, when I went with the girls."

"As a hat-picker, Rooney's a great entertainer. Now take it off." And rather to her own surprise, she did.

He calls her Stinky and Sweetheart interchangeably, but whichever he calls her, the look in his eyes is the same. She calls him Sweetheart, too, except when she's mad, then it's plain Donald. Their favorite line to describe their romance is, "He (she) chased me till I caught him (her)." After the war, they'd like a little honeymoon house. Don's satisfied to leave the details to Gwen, all he asks is a den where he can be alone with his guns. He hasn't any guns.

Gwen doesn't expect him to be much use round the house. Once he offered to help with the dishes, and dried one.

He insists on helping her make the bed. She has to make it all over again, but at least he tries. What really irks her is the way he throws his clothes all over—

One thing they're agreed on is children. "Ten," says Don. "Then, when we retire, we can put 'em in show business."

"Three," says Gwen. "Two boys, then a girl, so her brothers can take her out."

"Oh, a drip, huh?"

"Don't insult your own daughter."

"Excuse me, daughter, I never said you couldn't get a beau of your own. That was Mother's idea—"

Despite all the foolery, Don's grown up. He worries. He knows he can take care of Gwen after the war, he's still under contract to Universal. But he worries about now. Gwen thinks that's silly. She plans to go to work after graduation.

"I can't be a secretary, because Don would be jealous of the boss. How about a telephone operator, Sweetheart? Nothing but plugs, and girls to talk to—"

For once, he doesn't pick it up. "I want to give her everything," he says soberly. But Gwen smiles. "I've got everything—" no weeds! . . .

Dad smokes like a four-alarm fire himself, but tobacco-wise—to his way of thinking—it's strictly a man's world. The old meanie won't even give you a drag on one of his cigarettes. Okay, okay, so you're abused; but maybe in his own unsubtle way the guy has something. Lookit. It costs a lot of money to smoke; at least fifteen cents a day when you reach the chimney stage of the game. That's $55 a year, which is the price of a knockout winter coat, eleven lush sweaters, fifty-five sheer-sheer pairs of stockings or 1,100 short cokes. That, bud, is money.

Furthermore, many many of the lads wail that a girl with a cigarette in her mouth or a tobacco smell in her hair is about as feminine as an old tweed jacket, as love-inspiring as a top-sergeant—so much for your dad's side of the fence. From a practical angle, he's strictly solid, and for our dough there is no other angle. We have never been able to see smoking as a moral issue at all. If you just must smoke, then tell your dad you've weighed all the disadvantages, but they pale beside the lift that after-dinner puff gives you, the poised feeling you have with a cigarette in your hand. If it's an aesthetic thing with him, promise not to smoke within his eye-shot, but let him know you don't want to resort to behind-the-barn tactics. Talk to him man-to-man about it, and—if you're seventeen or thereabouts—we have a hunch he'll see it your way. Give him a hug when he says yes, and profit by his experience—smoke moderately.

no guys! . . .

There are all degrees of parental date-hating. Some thumbs-down dates in general; others disapprove of going steady; and some can't bear dates that keep you out after ten. Let's take 'em one at a time. Supposing they won't let you date at all. Well, if you can answer yes to all the following questions, you're grown up enough for dates, and your parents will have to be convinced. 1. Do the majority of your classmates date? 2. Has your family reason to have confidence in you? 3. Are you willing to settle for house dates and double-dates as a starter? Yes yes, yes? Good. We didn't ask you about your age, for there is no general beau age. Each locality has its own. The best way to bring your parents around to your viewpoint is to be soft-voiced and patient with them. Name the girls who have begun to go out, tell where they go and what fun they have. Explain to them that they needn't worry about you, on account of you'll only go out with the cream of the crop, and that each lad you date can come over and stand inspection first. Agree to double-date for a while and to be home at a certain hour. Tell them that you think too much of them to want to date on the sly, and that it would be utterly swoony to have them approve of your various swains. If you keep calm and speak your piece intelligently, they'll just have to see it your way.

Now about going steady. You can't see anyone on earth but Ted, and they keep insisting that you continue to go out with Bill and John and all the rest of the also-them. Let's be sensible. Are you going to marry Ted? Gosh, no! He's Mr. Big for now, but six months hence he'll just be a name in your diary and a lot of movie stubs in your scrap book. So, hon bun, be smart. Let him take you to all the big things around town, save your sweetest smile for him, but deal the other boys in, too. Oh, we know lots of the kids go steady, and it's beautiful to see. Slave bracelets and twin sports coats. One coke and two straws. You envy them for a while, but if you've ever seen a combination break up, you know it's not all moonlight and sweet talk. Until you meet the boy you're going to marry, spread yourself a little thin. You and Mom and Pop will all be the happier for it.

What's a good curfew time? That, too, will vary in different localities, but if we had to give a general rule, we'd say eleven or eleven-thirty for fourteen and fifteen year olds, unless it's something super special; and twelve or one o'clock for the sixteen and seventeen-ers, depending on the occasion. This, too, to be stretched once in a blue moon. If you agree to a certain hour, stick to it faithfully and phone if you're going to be delayed.

no cooperation . . .

Maybe your family tolerates swains, but that's as far as it goes. Pop will just grunt a greeting at them when they come over, and Mom won't even bother to comb her hair on Saturday night. It's such a weird feeling to suddenly be embarrassed about your parents when you've always been so burstingly proud of them, but don't brood about it. Just a couple of words can fix things up. Instead of yapping, "For heaven's sake, Dad, be civil to Bob tonight!" try something like, "Dad, Bob Haines is coming over tonight. He's been crazy to meet you ever since he heard you were overseas in the last war," or "that you're a Dodger fan, too," or "that you used to play pro football." All Dad really needs is a topic, and he'll do you proud. As for Mom, she'll bloom under a wee bit of flattery. "Bill said you were awfully pretty, Mom. He wishes his mother had cute short hair like yours." Or, "Don't let this go to your feather cut, lady, but Johnny said he thought you were the smartest-looking mother he knew." She'll be running for a mirror and lipstick, one'll get you ten. Don't ever, ever belittle your parents or make fun of them. You don't know how terribly unhappy some of your unthinking jive talk can make them feel. They'd rather die than admit it, but it's true. Be just as sweet and considerate as you can be, and you'll acquire the two staunchest allies a gal could possibly have.

QUESTION BOX

How can two nice gals meet some respectable guys without resorting to cheap flirting and pick-ups? A. and L., New Orleans, La.

Your best bets would be dances or parties sponsored by your local USO, your church, the YWCA or some other reputable organization. Pick out a couple of nice, lonely-looking lads and ask them to dance. Be warm and friendly to them, as if they were guests in your own home, and watch them relax and have fun. You will too, kiddies.

I have been in love with a fellow for five years, but he doesn't know I'm alive. Should I swallow my pride and tell him how I feel? I'm heading for a nervous breakdown.
Susan T., Newark, New Jersey.

Pull yourself together, Susy. You have a really terrific crush there, but it isn't love. Love is something based on common interests, common ideals, mutual respect. We would say that if nothing has come of it after five years, you are wasting yourself on a lost cause. However, give him one last chance. Make an all-out effort to attract him. If he just won't look your way, forget him. Concentrate on his faults, think how dopey he is not to fall for you, stop day-dreaming about him. It won't happen overnight, but if you try, you can forget this phantom romance and get on with something more tangible.

I had a beau, but I lost him to another gal. I'm still crazy about him. How can I get him back? Bette M., Detroit, Mich.

Don't try, Bette. That's one of the lessons we gals learn hardest. When it's over for him, let him go. The only consolation is that when one member of a combination chills, it almost certainly was not a solid click. In another month or so, you would have been the one on the jilting end. Hard to believe, isn't it, when right now your heart is an open wound? Believe us, though, it's true.

I promised a sweet G.I. I'd wait. Meantime an old flame has turned up, and this really is "it" for both of us. He's in the Army, too, but come V-day, we have plans. How shall I break it to the first boy?—Donna P., Seattle, Wash.

Don't break it yet. There's many a slip 'twixt now and V-day, and maybe there'll be a Marine in the picture by then. Let the first soldier know you are dating a little bit, but don't break his heart with the news that you plan on marrying this other boy until it's all set. When the war is over, who knows—maybe the number one man will still be number one man.

* * * *

Gosh, slick ones, it is good to hear from you all. If we're a bit slow getting round to your problem, 'scuse us, won't you? We'll answer it just as soon as it hits the top of the pile. Letters with initials or those without proper addresses cannot be answered personally, of course, but we'll try to take care of as many of those as we can in our Co-Ed articles and in the Question Box which will appear each month. Meanwhile, thank you for writing, and if your sisters or cousins or aunts have problems, too, just send 'em around to us. You know where to tell them to write, don't you? Jean Kinkead, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

Mrs. Robert Bacon Whitney

Her amber-eyed beauty and natural charm have made this young Navy wife an outstanding favorite with New York society. Her unerring taste is reflected in the smooth, casual perfection of her make-up. "When my skin seems the least bit rough or dull, I give my face a quick beauty 'pick-up' with a 1-Minute Mask," Mrs. Whitney says. "Right away my skin feels smoother—and looks so much clearer and brighter. Good make-up then is no problem at all!"

Mrs. Robert Bacon Whitney—one of the society beauties who loves the 1-Minute Mask

How to "re-style" your complexion with the 1-Minute Mask

Smooth a fragrant, white mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream over your whole face—except eyes.

Leave this mask on for one full minute.

"Keratolytic" action of the cream will loosen and dissolve tiny powder-catching roughnesses and imbedded dirt particles.

After just one minute tissue the mask off—clean.

Your re-styled complexion looks lighter . . . . fresher! Feels so heavenly . . . softer to touch, with a perfect finish for make-up!

Note for split-second make-up . . .

Just smooth on a very, very light film of Pond's Vanishing Cream . . . and leave it on. A wonderful, un-greasy powder base!

IMPORTANT! Conserve glass, manpower—buy one large jar of Pond's instead of several smaller ones.

to be tough. In self-defense. One day Tommy came home with his hair clipped down to the scalp. Clean as a pin-ball. For more of the convict effect, probably. And of course if he could manage to cake his clothes up so with dirt that they'd stand up in a corner by themselves, it helped. Still," she laughs, "he was a pretty mild-looking little man. I don't think he ever really fooled anybody."

One night, for instance, he was walking his girl, Teri Keane, down Broadway when they got into a slight squabble. Teri dashed over to the cop and asked, with well-controlled fright in her voice, whether he'd please see to the man who was following her. The officer, burly but gallant, swirled around, lunged toward Tommy and then stopped dead. "Hey, miss, this your dangerous character?"

"Yes," Teri told him.

"Ya mean this . . . this peanut with the school books? G'wan, you're kiddin'!"

He and Teri used to do the Aldrich radio show together. (Tommy was Homer.) And after work they'd ride home on the subway singing their heads off between steps. Or on hot nights they'd ride out to Coney Island for a hot dog and a couple of turns on the roller coaster. Uphill on the coaster they'd scream just for the joy of screaming. But coming down those mile-long dips, they'd sing 'cause then the noise was loudest, and nobody could possibly hear. But if they had, they'd have said it was the loudest, meanest, fanciest harmonizing this side of Heaven.

Tommy's voice crawled down a couple of octaves practically over night. The trouble was, it left the rest of him behind. People just didn't expect this narrow, pint-sized kid to let go with that booming, pit-of-the-stomach voice. The day he tried out, nervously, for "Best Foot Forward" on Broadway, he sang "Buckle Down Winsocki," and before he'd gotten two notes out, they were laughing. After that, of course, he played it for laughs. Well, one night his Uncle Sid was in the audience . . . and you know the loyalty that runs in families. When Tommy started to sing, a ripple of laughter breezed through the audience. Uncle Sid, who knew right from wrong, jumped up and yelled, "Shut up! The kid's trying to sing! Quit the laughin'!"

When the cast of "Best Foot Forward" went to Hollywood, Tommy went with it. He'd been screen tested by a couple of Hollywood studios two years before. The two studios fought over him while Mrs. Dix

IF I COULD LIVE IN AN AIR-TIGHT MASON JAR, I MIGHT BE SAFE FROM GERMS THAT CAUSE SKIN RASHES: BUT I CAN'T, SO MOMMY PROTECTS ME WITH BABY POWDER THAT'S ANTISEPTIC . . . MENNEN.

Germs often cause common baby skin troubles such as prickly heat, diaper rash. To protect baby, best powder is Mennen. More antiseptic! Round photos above prove it. Centers of plates contain 3 leading baby powders. In gray areas, germs thrive; but in dark band around Mennen powder (far right), germ growth has been prevented!

LOOK HOW I ALWAYS MOVE MY ARMS AND LEGS AROUND-LIKE WHEN I'M CRYING OUT LOUD! BOY, AM I GLAD MOMMY PROTECTS ME FROM CHAFING WITH THE POWDER THAT'S SMOOTHEST . . . MENNEN.

Which baby powder is smoothest is proved by round photos above; they show 3 leading baby powders seen thru microscope. Mennen (far right) is smoother, finer in texture. That's due to special "hammerizing" process which makes Mennen Baby Powder the best protection against chafing. Delicate new scent keeps baby lovelier.

I Spelled Marriage—"M-I-R-A-G-E"

Listen to this wife's story of marriage happiness rediscovered

I married for love . . . and at first George did love me. Then—I can't explain when or how it began—George became more and more indifferent. Our marriage happiness began to fade away like a mirage.

I brooded so that I actually became ill. When I went to see my doctor, I started to cry and told him everything. It was then I learned how "one neglect"—carelessness or ignorance about feminine hygiene—so often wrecks romance!

My doctor advised me to use Lysol disinfectant for feminine hygiene. "Thousands of modern wives use it," he said, explaining how Lysol makes an effective germ-killing douche that cleanses thoroughly and deodorizes. "And Lysol won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues...just follow the directions," he added. How right he was! I've found Lysol so pleasant to use—so easy and economical, too. It's been working wonderfully!

Oh, yes—the happy ending! It's about US, of course! George is mine again, with lots of love. That's all . . . that's everything!

CHECK THESE FACTS WITH YOUR DOCTOR

Lysol is Non-caustic—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. Effective—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). Spreading—Lysol solutions spread, thus virtually search out germs in deep crevices. Economical—small bottle of Lysol makes almost 4 gallons of solution for the douche. Cleanly odor—disappears after use. Lysol deodorizes completely. Lasting—keeps full strength, no matter how often it is uncorked.

went serenely about the moving job. For a couple of days the kitchen stove sat unhinged in the middle of the floor while the studios bargained back and forth. In the end the whole thing fell through, and the Dixes sadly hitched the kitchen stove back to its old moorings.

Things are different now. M-G-M has him tied up for after the war. But meanwhile the infantry's got him. The Jewish chaplain at his camp heard of the terrific work he'd been doing selling bonds during his furlough. Tremendously impressed, he approached Tommy cautiously one day and asked, "Son, how'd you like to be a cantor?"

"A what?"

"A cantor. We need one pretty badly for camp services."

Tommy was flattered, but the only religious psalms he knew were the ones he'd learned at Sunday School. The cantor said they wouldn't do, exactly, but it was really too bad because his voice would have been just fine for cantoring.

That's funny when you think of it, because the same voice sold forty-eight thousand dollars in bonds at the Ansley High School in Birmingham. And the kids who heard it admitted right out that Sinatra wasn't the only guy alive who counted. The next day, when Tommy was slated to sing at church, so many young faces smiled dreamily from the pews, the preacher had to change his sermon. Something a little lighter for the young folks.

just past fifty; and he lived in a small New Jersey college town in a pleasant house under green elms and arching oaks old as he was, older perhaps, and he was like them in some ways; the quiet power was hidden, and the living sap ran deep, and he bent but never broke before the storm. His name was Woodrow Wilson.

offer of office . . .

Just now he stood at his open door looking out to the darkness. Three men stood on the porch. They were three strange men to find on the doorstep of a college president in a sleepy New Jersey town. One was Senator Edward (Big Ed) Jones, boss of the Jersey Democratic political machine; the other two were his henchmen—Jim Beeker and Ed Sullivan. Beeker wore a hard, round, black derby; Sullivan puffed on a cigar.

"Mr. Wilson?" Jones said.

"Yes?"

"I'm Senator Edward Jones."

"Yes." Wilson's voice came drily. "I recognized you."

"May we come in? I've something I'd like to talk over with you."

Beeker and Sullivan sat uncomfortably on the edges of the club chairs in the comfortable study. Beeker's eyes looked with unbelieving amazement at the rows of books that covered the walls; Sullivan eyed the growing ash on the tip of his cigar. Big Ed walked up and down in the quiet room talking.

"You know, Mr. Wilson, you've had some pretty favorable notice in the press of the country. Your books. Your articles. People like to read what you have to say about democracy. Well, so do we, for that matter. We're Democrats, too."

Beeker laughed.

"We like to give the people what they want," Big Ed said. "We're all for good government, for honest government. Right now there's a strong liberal movement in the country. We want to get the best liberal of them all for New Jersey. After all, that's our job." Big Ed paused and then swung around facing Wilson; he said flatly: "How would you like to be Governor of New Jersey, Mr. Wilson?"

Then they were gone. In the living room, Ellen, his wife, looked up as Wilson came in thoughtfully. His three daughters—Jessie, Margaret and Nell—were bunched around the piano; Nell was playing "Chopsticks." Wilson sat down next to her and picked up the bass accompaniment.

"Wasn't that Big Ed who came in?"

"Yes."

"Is he thinking of enrolling for the Fall semester?"

"Not quite."

Nell said suddenly: "Hey, Dad, you missed a beat there. It goes this way: bum tee tee, bum tee tee, BUM. You missed the last BUM."

"You mean Big Ed? or Beeker?" Wilson said, as he grinned. "No, I saw them both."

"What did they want?" Ellen said quietly.

Wilson hammered on the bass, raising the beat of the rhythm, Nell squealed and rippled a run of tinkling notes. Wilson said: "Just politics, Ellen. They wanted me to be Governor."

Nell's hand came down in a discordant chord.

Ellen said: "What did you tell them."

"I told them they were crazy."

"Are they?" Ellen said quietly. "Are they? You've always wanted to try your hand. You've always been interested in

What's Cookin', America?

The third in our series of Regional Recipes introduces lovely Laraine Day . . . representing UTAH

To make novel "Airy Nothings," Laraine Day uses a recipe handed down from maternal grandmother . . . who entered Salt Lake City, as a child, with the original pioneers!

■ In an historically fascinating and recipe-rewarding talk we had the other afternoon with Laraine Day—sweet young M-G-M star currently on loan to RKO—it was forcefully brought home to us that in many instances expediency plays quite as important a part as tradition in determining regional tastes in foods. Not only did our ancestors carry with them a liking for dishes favored by their forefathers but, of necessity, they learned to prepare and enjoy the foods they found, or could grow, in the regions in which they chose to live.

Not that the Mormons—the first white settlers of Utah—found anything much to eat when they arrived in the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, pointed out Laraine who is a native of that State and who can list several of these hardy pioneers among her direct ancestors. Nor did they have much to eat with them, when they finally reached their destination. For the dreary trek from Missouri in covered wagons—across prairies, mountains and treacherous streams—took 102 days and was beset by a lack of food all along the way. Then when Brigham Young indicated that this was the place where they were to live, the food prospects were still mighty grim.

Anything made with chocolate rates high with Laraine. Her Chocolate Cake recipe can be used, as shown here, for Surprise Cup Cakes filled with Mack Whipped Cream.

Deep-fat-frying is final step in the preparation of these yeast-raised specialties of Laraine's. You'll see her next starring in the RKO picture, "Bride by Mistake."

By MARJORIE DEEN

The planting of crops was, therefore, a matter of vital concern. As early as 1848—one short year after their arrival—a flour mill was in full operation to take care of the wheat which had grown amazingly well despite the general lack of water. In fact, by an ingenious method known as "dry farming," large wheat harvests have been produced in that state ever since.

This, coupled with the vast distances that lie between farms, ranches and towns, undoubtedly explains why Mormon women have always been excellent and enthusiastic home bakers. (In this respect both Laraine and her mother, Mrs. Johnson, are no exceptions, you'll discover.) However, since the early settlers were drawn from people of all nationalities, in other respects Utahans cook pretty much like Mrs. Suburbia everywhere, except that they continue to be notably thrifty. This stems from the fact that Brigham Young—a superb organizer and a great booster for home manufacture and locally grown products—believed that waste was not to be tolerated in a community which, at first, was entirely dependent upon its own resources.

History, proudly proclaims Laraine Day, records no greater achievement in the face of terrific suffering and great hardship than that of these determined people who literally made the desert "bloom as the rose."

No wonder Mormons look on the first settlers as their "immortals," that their biggest holiday is called "Pioneer Day" and that a section of the State Capitol is used for a museum which presents an excellent cross-section of their life in the early days.

And now for the recipes we're offering you this month. They feature outstanding favorites of Laraine's which she and her folks brought with them from Utah. (Laraine's parents now live in a lovely guest house on her estate in Santa Monica Canyon. But members of their family still live in Roosevelt, Utah, where Laraine was born. From them she gets regular supplies of Utah honey—thicker and somewhat less sweet than other types—and of holiday turkeys which she distributes as Christmas gifts to understandably appreciative friends.)

Laraine's recipes stress home baked specialties as you can well understand. First and foremost are "Airy Nothings" which are really Something!

Also outstanding is Laraine's Chocolate Cake with the Mock Whipped Cream which tops it or fills it—according to whether you prefer to bake it in loaf or in cup cake form, as pictured at the left. Then, too, we were given directions for making homemade noodles by Laraine's mother. Noteworthy additions to this collection are: A Roquefort Cheese Dressing, always featured at the informal barbecues Laraine and her husband Ray Hendricks love to give; and an old-fashioned way to prepare steak—with Cream Gravy.

A leaflet containing all these—cake, cream-like topping, noodles, salad dressing, steak and Airy Nothings—is ready to be sent out to you, so just mail your request to:

Take it from Junior—'there's nothing like a white shirt. It does something to a guy.' Surveying the immaculate expanse below his Adam's apple, who could say that Junior overstates the case?

Naturally, the washday labor that produces his snowy shirts, doesn't concern Junior. It's only one of the minor miracles that any boy with a doting Mother takes as a matter of course.

politics. You've got some sound ideas. You're old enough and secure enough not to be personally ambitious. You believe in democratic equality and the abolition of special privileges. Where can you better do your job now than—in the Governor's chair?"

Wilson turned to her soberly: "Do you really believe that, Ellen?"

"I do, dear."

"Knowing what it means? That we'll have to give up the kind of life we've always known. Our quiet. Our privacy. That I'll have to fight and scratch, and it won't always be pleasant. That I'll have to turn on men like—like Big Ed, and they won't quit easily. It's going to be raw sometimes, and hard. Hard on me and hard on you and the girls—"

"I married you for better or worse," Ellen said, she smiled. "I'll admit being Governor is a comedown, but we might struggle through the disgrace."

Wilson laughed. He turned to the piano again, and his hands hit the keys. "Come on Nell," he said. "Let's do it in march time."

So the schoolteacher went out to tramp the byways of New Jersey. He spoke in the small towns and in the convention halls of the cities while the torchlight parades marched outside to the thump of the brass bands and jeering grimy-faced kids chanted:

Tammany, Tammany,
Politicians get positions.

But the people knew he wasn't a politician, not in that sense. They could feel the flaming sincerity of his words, the burning passion he felt for the ways of democracy and America. The tide swung to him, and on election day they voted for him. They came out of the neat rows of houses in the suburbs, out of the terrible tumbledown shacks along the railroad right-of-way: the people who worked, the people who, each of them small and alone, together make up the country called the United States. They made him Governor of New Jersey.

It didn't stop there. Word seeped out across the country about the schoolteacher Governor. "He broke Big Ed," they said. "He's for us," they said. "He's square, he means what he says," they said. Up and down the country, then, in the West and in the South, up in the New England states and in the corn raising states of the Middle-West they began to form Wilson-for-President Clubs.

So it happened that one day in March, 1912, a slight man who had once been a schoolteacher stood in the lobby of the White House. A new president was moving in. The staff of the White House was lined up in smiling welcome watching the man and his wife and the three bright-eyed girls who were his daughters. They walked through the spacious rooms where History had walked so often before them: . . . the East Room . . . the Blue Room . . . Dolly Madison . . . John Adams . . . "in this room Abraham Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation . . ."

It took Nell to break the spell. Walking down one of the corridors she whispered in her father's ear: "You know what, Dad? We get three automobiles, too!"

it's a wise father . . .

It was strange that a man could be President of the United States, a man who had the wisdom to wisely govern the destinies of forty-eight states, never knew that his daughters had fallen in love. Of course he had seen them going out, to Washington Balls, to picnics on the Potomac. He knew that his own Cabinet Officer, McAdoo, saw Nell with suspicious frequency, and he was somewhat aware that a tall young man used to come and ask about Jessie from time to time . . . what was that man's name?

"Jessie out again?" he said to Ellen one night.

"Yes. Jessie's out. Again."

"Nell, too?"

"Nell, too."

"Hope they enjoy themselves," he said vaguely.

"Girls usually do when they're in love."

"Love!" he said. "Jessie? Nell?"

"You sound startled."

"Startled?" he said. "I'm flabbergasted. With whom? Who are these men they're in love with?"

"Come, dear," Ellen said, smiling. "Think hard. Try."

"Mac of course. That's Nell. He's been in love with her ever since he first laid eyes on her. They're really thinking of getting married?"

"I hope they are," Ellen said. "It might create something of a scandal if they didn't."

Wilson laughed: "So she's in love as all that. But Jessie's beau? I know him, of course. The tall young man. Very pleasant. Schoolteacher, isn't he? Sayre, that's his name. Francis Sayre. Of course I know my daughters' beaux!" he said triumphantly.

"Remarkable," Ellen agreed.

And then they both laughed.

They were joking about that one night—all of them, the whole family; how they were all running off to get married. In one corner of the large room Ellen was working on an invitation list to the marriages. Nell and Jessie were radiant in their love. Margaret was at the piano. Wilson looked around at them in mock disapproval.

"That's all you're using the White House for—a bait for marriage," he said.

Nell giggled: "It's all Jessie's fault."

"I like that," Jessie said indignantly. "I suppose you don't want to get married."

"After all," Nell said, "I have a perfect right to. Mac lives right here in Washington. It was just natural that we should meet. But you had to lure your man all the way out from ends of nowhere—"

"Nell—" Jessie said softly.

"Of course I want you to be happy, and I think Frank is wonderful. But do you have to go back with him? We've never been broken up before. It's always been us, all of us together—"

Ellen was walking briskly across the room toward the piano: "I don't see anything to be so blue about. We'll still be seeing each other. Strike up a song, Margaret. Let's see if we can still sing anyway. We have every right to be happy."

alone with grief . . .

And just then, just before she reached the piano, they saw the sudden spasm of pain cross her face! She had only strength enough to reach for the piano and hold on to it, while in the sudden shocked silence, Wilson moved quickly across the room to her side.

"Are you all right?" he asked.

"Just a little—nothing," she said.

But they knew it was more than nothing. And they knew it for sure when Dr. Grayson told them the full story. He said it kindly, but in the end it meant that it was only a question of time. Then, in the suddenly large and empty room, Wilson faced it. He watched Grayson walk out, and then he turned toward the windows. Just outside, he could see the rows of Ellen's flower garden. He forced the word, the frightened, ugly word, out of his mind. But it always returned, and he had to face it: Ellen was going to die.

He heard some one come into the room. It was Margaret. He began to speak then, very softly, as though to himself. "If only she didn't have to suffer," he said. "If only there was something I could do about that. She's always been so radiant, so full of life. She was always so willing to share everything. Even her life itself. If she dies, something of me dies with her—since the first time I ever saw her, she's been part of me—"

Margaret said: "She's always been happy, Father. She's so proud of you—" a world he never made . . .

He didn't answer. He stood looking out at the rose garden, and then suddenly he buried his head in his hands. Proud of him? What was all the pomp, all the power compared to the bare touch of her living hand? Until she died, he walked about as a man in a daze, barely seeing those around him. It gave him a little time to steel himself; there was still a little time to share with Ellen as she grew thinner and weaker. And then on the last day, he knew it had to be, there was nothing more to be done. He stood alone in the huge room at the open window looking out at the faded rose garden. He heard Dr. Grayson come into the room, and he thought with a heavy sudden despair: She's dead. Through the open window came the jangle of the discordant noises of Washington. Far off, somewhere, a newsboy was calling:

"War! War! Read all about the War! Germany declares War!"

They said, then, about that First War, that we could keep out. They said it was one of Europe's wars and that it was none of our business. The sleek fat men and the experts ponderously prated that Germany had no designs whatever on the United States. In the White House, a man haggard with his own private tragedy, grappled with the terrible problems of war and peace.

Once in a cabinet meeting, he said to the men who urged him to declare war immediately: "It is an awful power that a President has. It is easy to beat the drums and wave the sword. But I'm thinking of the boys who would have to do the actual fighting. If I must ask them to fight and die, I want them to know that I spared them no effort to preserve peace. I want them to be sure that they are fighting for something worthwhile, for security and for a world at peace . . ."

But the grinding wheel of history was not to be stopped. The shadow of the war in Europe crept across the waves of the Atlantic; it began to creep into the consciousness of America that all the world was one, that there were no barriers across the circle of the globe. And in the White House, through the long nights, a lonely man sifted the growing pile of reports that flowed across his desk, and in each one there was an undertone like the sound of distant thunder: War . . . War . . . War . . .

He was lonely. That was his own private hell. They tried—Margaret, Nell and Jessie—to keep him occupied, they tried to fill the dead void. But there was always the shadow of emptiness upon his face and in his heart. The days followed each other; the days and the weeks and the endless months. Winter passed, and then Spring came, and it was a little easier to soften the pangs of memory with the cushion of time.

It was raining one day as he came into the White House, a soft Spring rain that hinted at coming sunshine and cloudless skies. He came into the spacious lobby, shaking the rain from his hat, and looking up, he suddenly saw the woman who was standing there. For the first time in months, something touched him. In the brief moment that their eyes met some common chord seemed to leap the distance between them. She was a fair, slim woman with a mouth touched with gaiety and eyes that hinted at intensity.

hearts ease . . .

He heard someone saying: "I'd like you to meet Mrs. Edith Bolling Galt—"

Her voice was soft, pleasant with a hint of the South: "Mr. President . . ."

"Mrs. Galt," he said formally.

Later they were to laugh at the formality of that first conversation. Laughingly, he blamed it on Congress; she said that she felt vaguely like a Committee on Introductions as she talked to him that first time. It became a joke between them.

He found common laughter with Edith Bolling Galt that made him, for the first time in the long months, feel alive. He showed her about the city. They played golf together. He sent her a book. He sent her a corsage, an orchid. In the box there was a card.

"You are the only woman I know who can wear an orchid.

Generally it's the orchid that wears the woman.

W. W."

That night they dined together at the White House, and later in the living room that looked out on the wide spacious green of the lawns that faced the street, he spoke to her. It was just coming dusk, and the first stars were faint in the sky, sketched against the slowly deepening blue.

speaking softly, "Will you be my wife, Edith?"

She didn't answer immediately, turning to face him, her eyes serious and grave: "Any woman would be proud to have you ask that of her. But you've only known me such a short while; we've hardly had time to know each other."

"I know you well enough to know that I want you to be my wife," he said.

"I've had no training to be the wife of a President."

"I'm not asking you as President," he said gently.

"I want to be sure," she said.

"Yes," he said. "Of course."

She touched his hand.

"Let's wait," she said. "Just awhile."

It wasn't for long. It was a dull day in the correspondent's room in the White House when Tumulty, the President's secretary, strolled in carrying the day's news release.

"Anything new?" they said.

"A few odds and ends," Tumulty said.

"War stuff?"

"No."

"Can't be much, then."

"The usual run," Tumulty said, and then as he was strolling out, he turned casually and added: "Just an odd item: The President's going to be married—" new world a 'comin' . . .

The election of 1916 exploded in the United States in a world slowly bleeding to death of war. Passions ran high. In the corridors of Congress some of the congressmen were bitter. They spoke contemptuously of Wilson: "Dictator . . . fool . . . ruining the country . . . making us the laughingstock of the world . . . incompetent . . . insincere . . ."

But the whole country went to the polls in that famous election. Wilson ran against Hughes. The early returns gave Hughes the election. Hughes went to sleep that night sure he was President of the United States. But the late returns from the West Coast brought California into Wilson's column, and in the morning, Hughes woke to find that the victory had slipped from his grasp. Wilson had been reelected.

The threat that had been hanging over the country so long fell during that second administration. Under provocation of Germany's unrestricted submarine campaign, the issue finally came to a head, and in 1917 the country went to war. There were flags and bands playing in the boulevards and the streets of the country. But the quiet man in the White House felt no exultation in the declaration of war. It was, in a way, a defeat. For he felt strongly that war was evil and that a time would come in the history of the world when nations would no longer have to resort to war in order to redress wrongs. The time was not yet, perhaps, but already there was forming in his mind the shadowy outlines of a plan that might, if the world adopted it in good heart, prevent the holocaust of war forever in the future.

Once, on a trip to one of the training camps, he spoke informally to the soldiers. They gathered around him, awed that their Commander-in-Chief, that the President of the United States, should be there among them, talking to them easily, talking as man to man. He asked them where they were from, he asked them their names.

"Vespucci . . ."

"I'm from Milwaukee, sir. My father was a German. I'm just plain American I guess."

"They just call me Mike. Irish."

"Don't know what I am except maybe Texas."

"Palemanski . . ."

What makes Mary so Toothsome?

The man isn't born who could resist Mary's bright, seductive smile. And that's the way it's been ever since the day she discovered how much better super-fine Pebeco cleans her teeth. As she says, "Pebeco Powder doesn't wash right away when you start to brush. It stays on the job and polishes!"

The trick is—the way Pebeco's micro-fine particles hold onto your brush, cling to your teeth while you work. It's this special penetrating polishing agent, so fine it does a super job of gentle cleaning, that makes Mary's teeth so sweet and shining.

Never a dull molar for you either, dear Reader, if you leave it to Pebeco. Taste its bright, fresh flavor. Revel in that grand "polished" feel as you run your tongue over your teeth. Exclaim, as you admire their special sparkle—"Who? Me?"

He stood looking around at them, profoundly touched, trying to find the words to reach them. He felt that here in the proving ground of war, was the proof of America. Here all races and all creeds met in a common purpose, all together, all Americans. What could be done here, in one country, could perhaps be done for the world. He groped for words.

"I want you to know," he said, "that we are fighting not only for our own safety but for those who will come after us. There must be a way—if we all will it—to guarantee peace. The world is large enough for all its nations. If we work together, band together in common aim like a—like a League, perhaps . . ."

He always remembered that. And when the time came for peace, he worked toward that great aim. He crossed to Paris to face the tortuous legalities of treaty making, hoping always to preserve that single aim in all its great simplicity. Even then, in Paris after the war, the doubts began to creep in. There was too much hatred left in the world. In Europe there were old scores, old wounds remembered; at home a group of men maligned him, misinterpreted his every word.

As always, he had faith in the people. He always said that if they knew the issue, if they understood it completely, they would see the great need for America to share in the work and responsibility of a League of Nations. So he took the story to the country. Grayson, his doctor, told him he wasn't physically fit enough to undertake a trip of that length, speaking every night, sleeping in snatches, eating on the run. He insisted. That was his duty. That was what he had sworn to the soldiers he had asked to fight.

"There can be no united action—no League of Nations—in the true sense without America's participation," he said.

He spoke at crossroads. He spoke in the huge auditoriums of the cities of America. He spoke from the backs of trains. He spoke to the people wherever and whenever they would listen.

"Make no mistake," he said. "Germany wants us to remain isolated . . ."

He grew weaker. You could see the strain in his face. He spoke through the pain; nothing stopped him. He spoke, in final appeal, to the men who had fought the war.

"You are betrayed," he said. "You fought for something you did not get . . . There will come a time in the vengeful providence of God . . . another struggle in which . . . many millions may be asked to give their lives to accomplish the final freedom of the people of the world . . ."

After that speech he turned from the platform of the train. Behind him Edith was watching anxiously. Dr. Grayson came hurrying forward. Grayson caught his arm. His face was ashen white.

He took Edith's hand: "I'm so—tired."

As a soldier who does his duty and sometimes dies doing it, so Wilson did his duty. Despite pain and illness he carried on until the moment of collapse. He was a soldier in the cause of peace; he was one of the casualties in civilization's endless war against war. He was a paralyzed old man at the end of his term of office.

But there was nothing gone in his spirit. The fire still flashed in his eyes, and his great soul still fought on where the body had deserted. He tasted defeat. He saw his policies go down to defeat in the next election. He watched America spurn the League of Nations.

But the day he left the White House he still believed in all the principles that he had always believed in. He still believed in their eventual triumph. He still believed in the rightness and the justness of his ideas. He believed fervently and completely in the ideal of Peace through a League.

Standing in the White House on his last day there, with Edith, he said quietly: "The fight's just begun. You and I may never live to see it finished. But that doesn't matter. The League isn't dead . . . the dream of a world united against the awful wastes of war is too deeply embedded in the hearts of men everywhere . . ."

He left the White House as he had entered it, a quiet man with flaming eyes. They walked out together, Wilson and Edith, Margaret and Jessie and Nell. Wilson walked out into the annals of America and into the hearts of Americans and into the soul of any man anywhere who dreams the word Peace.

and Ingrid Bergman's his favorite actress. He had the pleasure of meeting her when he was over at M-G-M one day, and doesn't know how he ever fumbled through it. She said, "Anne's told me all about you," and he stood like a goof with his tongue in a knot. All he could think was, "Gosh, you're so beautiful!" but he had just enough sense left not to say it.

Of course, Miss Bergman's like a goddess. Anne, now—well, he wishes he were about four years older. As it is, Anne's wonderful to him and treats him like her twelve-year-old brother.

He keeps his first fan letter pressed between the pages of a book, and thinks it must have come from a very little girl. "Dear Mr. Granger," it says, "I saw you in 'North Star' and I love you. You don't know who I am, but some day we will meet and we will kiss and we will marry—" miracle man . . .

He and his mother and dad used to talk about "if a miracle ever happens." If a miracle ever happened, they'd have the house painted or the couch re-covered. So when the miracle happened—a contract with Samuel Goldwyn Studios—he had the house painted and bought some new furniture and dishes. Oh, and another item—he paid off the mortgage. Knowing he'd be called into service shortly, he wanted the folks to have their home free and clear.

Clothes don't mean a lot to him, except you can't pry him loose from the sweater counter. There's no printed play that he hasn't read, and no Gershwin that he doesn't tag "out of this world." He could listen to "Porgy and Bess" all night, but can't carry a tune. Maybe you wondered why he was cut out of that cute song the other kids sang on the walking trip in "North Star."

"I can't sing," said Farley.

"Try it," they said.

He opened his mouth, and a sound came out. They were flabbergasted.

"You can't sing," they said.

"That's what I said," he said.

He doesn't drink—mainly because he doesn't want to. He never had a car of his own, and that never bothered him either. He got his job in "North Star" by answering an ad. And he's wanted to be a movie actor ever since he stopped wanting to be a vet.

The reason he wanted to be a vet was because then nobody'd care how many dogs he collected. In San José, where he was born, they had a pretty big yard, and his folks were pretty liberal about dogs. Still, there was a limit. After five or six, he had to go slow. The only rule was, if he wanted 'em that bad, it was up to him to earn their keep. So any time he needed dog food, the neighbors would cook up an errand for him to run.

The dog he remembers best is the one he didn't get—a German shepherd that was hanging around the place where his father sold cars. One day they went down to clean up the garage, and here was this pooch, looking wobegone the way dogs look when they don't belong anywhere. Farley ran out for a can of food and fed him—

"Can I keep him, Dad?"

You could see Dad wanted to say yes, but was torn two ways. "We've got more dogs now than we know what to do with. Maybe he's lost. Maybe his owner's looking for him—tell you what, son. If he's still

MEN and women all over this country are reporting remarkable results in losing weight easily. Many lost 20 pounds a month and more. They are following the Easy Reducing Plan of Dr. Edward Parrish, well-known physician and editor, former chief of a U. S. Military hospital and a state public health officer.

Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan makes reducing a pleasure because it has NO STRICT DIETS, requires no exercises. HARMLESS, too, because it calls for no reducing drugs.

Here is Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan EXACTLY as given over the air to millions: for lunch take 2 teaspoonfuls of CAL-PAR in a glass of juice, water or any beverage. Take nothing else for lunch except a cup of coffee, if desired. For breakfast and dinner EAT AS YOU USUALLY DO, but eat sensibly. Don't cut out fatty, starchy foods—just cut down on them. By following Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan, you cut down your daily caloric intake, thus losing weight naturally. You needn't suffer a single hungry moment. CAL-PAR is not a harmful reducing drug. It is a special dietary product, fortifying your diet with certain essential minerals and vitamins. Most overweight people are helped by Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan. Try it and you and your friends will marvel at the vast improvement in your figure.

- ● NO EXERCISE!
- ● NO REDUCING DRUGS!
- ● ABSOLUTELY HARMLESS!

ADDRESS ....

Farley fixed a bed for him that night, but next day the lonely dog was gone. To the end of his life, he'll aways be "the lonely dog" to Farley.

There was only one dog to say good-by to when he left for camp last February. That was Boots, who has wirehair whiskers but is otherwise mixed in lineage but certainly not affections. The year they moved to Los Angeles, he found Boots's fuzzy head poking out of his Christmas stocking, to help make up for the dogs he'd left behind. He's never forgotten them, though. Couldn't if he wanted to, which he doesn't. Because in his prayers, it was always God bless Mother and Dad and then the whole tribe of dogs. They're still in his prayers. Seems kind of unfriendly somehow to shove 'em out—

They moved to Los Angeles because Dad lost his business in the depression. On account of being a veteran of the last war, he managed to get a Civil Service job. The only thing they really craved was a house, because when you've always lived in a house and yard, apartments kind of get you down. So they got this place in North Hollywood and, to help out, Mother took a job in the Five-and-Ten. Farley helped out, too—mowed lawns, worked in markets, made his own bed, and dried the dishes. On his way from school, he'd stop at the Five-and Dime, and Mother'd tell him what to bring home from the market for dinner. She's nice enough to say he helped with the cooking, too, but all he remembers is turning the gas off and on while she rustled the food. Some of the meals they gave Dad were pretty rugged, but they did the best they could, and there was always a laugh in it somewhere—

Even up in San José he was crazy about the movies. After seeing a show, he'd line up all the kids, sit 'em on the curb and act the whole thing out, rippling heroine and all. Sometimes they'd sit through it. Other times they'd say, "Nuts, we'd rather see the picture," and walk out on him. But he didn't discourage easy. A couple of agents lived in North Hollywood, and he'd pester them about how to break into the movies—

"Get yourself into some play," they'd advise, like they'd said to every other stage-struck youngster. "Get some place where people can see you—"

Except for the war, he might have waited till after graduation. But he was bent on getting a couple of licks in before he was called. So he looked around and heard they were putting on "The Wookey" at the Mary Stuart Playhouse. He walked in, a little green around the gills, and asked to see the director—

"I'd like a part, Mr. Vivian."

"What have you done?"

"Well—not very much."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Two years ago, I attended a Bond Rally in Westerly, R. I., where vivacious Greer Garson was selling bonds—and selling them fast.

When she came onstage, she said, "I am so happy to be here. I don't know when I've ever seen so many beautiful babies as I have today. Won't you please tell me where they all came from?"

Whereupon my twelve-year-old daughter called in a loud, clear voice across the park, "Mother, don't you really think she knows?"

Mrs. Doris C. Briggs,
Pittsfield, Mass.

"Anything at all?"

"Well—no."

"Could you play a Cockney?"

"Yes, sir."

"Let's hear you say a few words. Okay, come around tomorrow."

puttin' on the dog . . .

Mother and Dad didn't mind, but—what with school and the market—they couldn't see how he'd manage. He worked it out fine by ignoring both school and the market and promising his conscience to make it up after rehearsals. Versatile was the word for him. He played the Cockney, a voice on the radio, the crash of bombs and a dog's bark. It was fine while it lasted, but it only lasted a week. If anybody saw him—outside of his loving friends—they overlooked it.

Then fate took a hand. Producers don't usually advertise for actors. But Sam Goldwyn's an unusual man. They were desperate for a boy to play Damian in "North Star." "Will it hurt to advertise?" Sam Goldwyn asked himself and answered himself, "No."

Farley picked up the paper, ran an eye down the want ads and did a double take. "Boy wanted," it read. "Must be seventeen, but not yet eighteen. Acting experience desirable but not essential. Write qualifications to Casting Director, Samuel Goldwyn Studios."

He wrote, and they told him to come in. Bob McIntyre, the casting director, looked him over and sent him on to Mr. Goldwyn, who called in Miss Hellman, the author, and Mr. Milestone, the director. Farley was not unduly nervous. He has a philosophy to sustain him under stress. Whatever happens, even if it seems bad at the time, works out for the best. If you don't get what you want, you weren't meant to get it. You keep on trying till your time comes. The only way you can lose out is by giving up—

They seemed to like his appearance, but—in spite of the ad—his lack of experience bothered them. He leaned heavily on "The Wookey," but they weren't impressed. Still, they promised to call him back for a test, and he took them at their word. Four weeks passed without a peep from the studio, but all that worried Farley was, maybe they'd call too soon. Because during those four weeks, everything happened. Playing football at school, he was kicked in the throat and couldn't talk for three days. That was bad—they might call any minute. Then he broke out in a rash. Being susceptible to poison oak, he ran to the doctor. "Do something quick for this poison oak. Any minute they might phone me to come down for a test—"

"Poison oak nothing, that's scarletina. You'd better go home and test your bed—" star light, star bright . . .

Evidently the part of Damian had been meant for Farley. He hadn't been up two days before they phoned. He got the script on Thursday, was tested on Friday, called back on Saturday and told to appear with his mother on Monday. Mother cried. She's very excitable. At the drop of a hat she'll cry—for instance, if she sees a train pulling out. Nobody has to be on the train that she knows—just show her a train pulling out, and Mother bawls. Farley has a terrible time with her—

At the studio they were all smiling. He could tell from the winks and nods that the news was good—even before Bob McIntyre broke it. Mother's hand kind of shook when she signed the contract, but Farley was pretty calm considering. Happy but calm. He'd always meant to be in motion pictures anyway. Well, here he was. It seemed sort of natural—

Her beauty highlights are revealed in the PHOTO-REVISE drawn for her. This is one of the 60 personal "just for you" Powers Home Course features.

Here's how Laine looks today with her Powers training. She was thrilled to be selected as "Miss United Nations." Now she's SELF-CONFIDENT.

You can become YOU! through this celebrated "POWERS GIRL" training

Like so many otherwise intelligent women Laine Solg failed to take advantage of her individual beauty highlights.

Why do girls think because they lack regular features, beauty is beyond their reach?

Why do women mistakenly practice starvation diets hoping to achieve a lovely figure?

Why do so many women, busy at war work, allow themselves to lose natural trimness, vitality, charm?

Because they have not learned the secret of making beauty an easy, enjoyable habit—the Powers Way.

He celebrated by taking the folks out to dinner and a show. "It's got to be a Goldwyn picture," Farley said, "or I'd feel like a heel."

"You'd be practically Benedict Arnold," Dad agreed. So they went to see Bob Hope in "They've Got Me Covered," and they made Mother quit her job.

It's Farley's opinion that life began with "North Star." The cameras didn't scare him. You couldn't be scared with a man like Mr. Milestone. He'd made a test with Anne, he'd met Eric and Jane in the schoolroom, so they were all friends before work started. Remember the scene where they dabbled their feet in the brook? That was the first scene they shot, and it was just as though he were out on a hike with his gang—

"You can't call it work," he told Mother and Dad. "They pay you for having fun."

Of course, it did get tougher—especially the blind scenes. But from the way Mr. Milestone acted, he knew he couldn't have been too awful. And after the sneak previews, he understood his name was mentioned on some of the cards. (Hardly a card was turned in that didn't rave about the new Granger discovery.) He saw the picture in a projection room with Mother and Dad and Jane and Mr. and Mrs. Withers. The first time that map of his showed on the screen, he couldn't get squeezed down deep enough in the chair. When he finally got up the nerve to raise his eyes, there was Mother crying—right in the happiest part of the story—

What made "North Star" so exciting, apart from the work, was the comradeship on the set. And in "Purple Heart" it was even more so. As the youngest of the eight flyers, he was their butt. They kidded the shirt off him, and he loved it. "Hey, sub!" they'd call him, because he was going into the Navy. "Come over here. Now do your deep breathing. Want to suffocate down in that submarine?"

They introduced him to a new world. Sam and Johnny Craven and Charlie Russell—they'd worked on Broadway. They tossed around names that were golden magic to Farley. He'd sit at their feet, with his mouth open, lapping it up. Sometimes he'd pinch himself.

He met Roddy at school and got himself a new family. First, Mrs. MacDowall asked him to dinner, then to stay overnight. Which made it fine all round, becouse it took him forever to get back and forth to North Hollywood. Soon he was calling Mrs. Mac Baby, the way Vee and Roddy did, and she called him "Rooshia," on account of "North Star." Being an only child, he'd never known what fun a brother and sister could be. Roddy and Farley have their future all mapped out. Roddy will direct Farley's stories—he's got a whole slew of them, half finished, choking up his desk at home. Their studio's all ready—designed by Roddy on a huge square of cardboard. They can't decide whether to call it Farrod or Rodley Studios. Baby suggested MacRooshia as a nice international touch.

parting shot . . .

As for Sam Levene, he's friend and brother, father confessor and paragon rolled into one. Talking of Sam, Farley glows. Sam's opened his mind and shown him far horizons—opened his own heart and taken Farley in. Call his feeling hero worship, and he cheerfully agrees. Sam's the tops—so kind yet honest, so wise but full of the old nick. In brief, Sam's the guy Farley would like to be—

"Here," said Sam, driving him home the day before Christmas—and kind of threw a little box at him.

"Gee, what is it?"

"A horse and buggy, but don't open it now."

It was a gold St. Christopher on a thin gold chain. Farley wears it over his sailor's blouse. In his wallet he keeps the card on which Sam had written: "We'll both watch over you."

It was Sam who took Farley downtown the day he left for camp. Boy, was that something. He'd said good-by to Mother and Dad the night before. They'd all agreed that a train—with Farley going away on it—was no place for Mother—

So he slept at Baby's. Only he didn't sleep much. Sam was coming at six. He was due to report at seven. They breakfasted at five—

Six o'clock. No Sam. They called his house. No answer. They called the taxi company. No taxis. Time was fleeting. He finally got some authority on the phone who said he could meet his troup at the station.

WE'RE SORRY!

Remember that gorgeous Kodachrome of Anne Baxter in the July issue? We forgot to tell you that you'll be seeing her soon in Hunt Stromberg's "Guest in the House."

Eight o'clock, and Sam walks in, whistling. "All ready, kid?"

"Soon as I get through killing you."

Sam swore Farley'd said eight. Himself, he'd been up since five, just killing time. Vee went down with them—and the train never left till twelve that night.

character builders . . .

Camp was okay, except all they gave you to drink was coffee, and Farley loathes coffee. At home he sits down with two quarts of milk in front of him. One night they showed "Purple Heart," but he wouldn't go. Afraid he'd get homesick. He saw snow for the first time and can live without it. It's pretty all right, but not when you're marching in it for hours.

"Marching in snow's good for you," wrote Sam. "It'll build your character, make you a better actor—"

Now when he marches or digs or does physical fitness exercises that are just murder, he puts Sam's words to the rhythm — "This'll — make you — better actor—this'll—make you—better—actor—" He doesn't see how exactly, but he's taking Sam's word for it. Meantime, it's making him a better seaman, 2nd class.

There was no particular girl to leave behind. He's never dated anyone regularly, but he likes the unsophisticated type who sticks pretty much to being feminine and doesn't use a lot of make-up. She doesn't have to be glamorous, just trim, and one thing he hates is hair that's all mussed up. In a brotherly way his favorite girls are Jane Withers and Vee MacDowall. He thinks it's all right for his friend Don O'Connor to get married at eighteen if he wants to, only Farley doesn't.

Pictures are more on his mind than girls. When the war's over, he wants to learn all about movies—acting, writing, camera angles, directing—the works. Along with that he's got three main ambitions.

First, to go to New York. Sam's promised to take him. Second, to dramatize and play the cartoon character of Prince Valiant. With that off his chest, he thinks he'll be ripe for his third ambition—to talk Mr. Goldwyn into re-making "Wuthering Heights"—with himself as Heathcliff and Anne Baxter as Cathy.

"You can't," says Farley, "kill a guy for trying."

Cover Girl tells – "How I really do Stop Underarm Perspiration and Odor (and save up to 50%)"

"Beauty isn't enough," says bewitching Bettina Bolegard

"My job takes more than beauty," says chic Bettina, whose cameo-perfect face appears so often on the magazine covers. "In a long 2-hour sitting, I have to stay picture-perfect before the hot, hot, studio lights and never, never risk underarm damage to the glamour clothes I model!

"That's why I'm so delighted with my Odorono Cream! It really is a charm protector—really does keep my underarms dry. That's because it contains an effective perspiration stopper that simply closes the tiny underarm sweat glands, and keeps them closed up to 3 days . . . my daintiness can't fail me!

"Another must for me—Odorono Cream doesn't rot fabrics—I just follow directions. And it doesn't irritate my skin even after shaving—it actually contains soothing emollients.

"When I have lots of appointments, I use it every day. So I'm especially pleased that each jar gives up to 21 more applications for 39¢ than other leading deodorants.

"When you try velvety, white, fragrant Odorono Cream I'm sure you'll join with me and other Cover Girls in saying, 'It's wonderful—real glamour insurance!'"

FRANK SINATRA

discipline and plenty of it, but the girls just looked at each other and were lost.

There was a lot of fun in those early days, and the little house on Monroe Street was merry with laughter most of the time. Everyone in town knew the Sinatras: Nathalie, small, bright-eyed and pretty, recently back from overseas duty as a nurse. Marty, square and handsome, a scrappy little guy who combined firemanning with professional boxing. And everybody liked them. The house was always jumping with company—an uncle or a grandmother, one of Dad's pals from the firehouse or some of the neighborhood kids. Almost any time you dropped in, there was spaghetti to eat and pinochle to play and the baby to kid around with. They weren't wealthy people, but—contrary to popular opinion—Frank's parents were never poor. They always had a big share of life's good things. It was a happy house, and Frank was well-pleased with the deal he'd gotten.

One cousin in particular charmed him; a chubby, curly-haired roughneck four years older than he was, also named Frank Sinatra. From the first minute the baby saw him, it was written all over his face—"This I like," and as soon as he could get around under his own steam, he pursued him.

The fact that Big Frank had to go to school oppressed and mystified him, but when he reappeared in the afternoon, everything was jake again. Somehow, Big Frank's gang tolerated the squirt, although they gave him absolutely no quarter. If he wanted to tag along on their hikes, he tagged at his own risk. Nobody carried him when he got tired. If he wanted to hang around when they played baseball, he could darn well work for the privilege, so they made him bat boy. By the time he was four, Frankie was a man. He'd had a drag on a cigarette, sworn a few times and generally sown a wild oat or two. About the only thing that kept him from being a thorough sophisticate was his speech. S's gave him no end of trouble. In the middle of a word he could cope with them, and even at the end he could swing them. But at the beginning, they floored him. Snow was 'now, and stone was 'tone, and it did sort of place him chronologically. The big kids used to laugh and laugh at him, until one afternoon, Big Frank settled them once and for all. They were walking along the docks watching the ferries plow back and forth, idly picking up pebbles and skimming them on the water. Frankie watched them carefully, then he picked one up.

'ticks and 'tones . . .

"Watch me 'kim this 'tone," he said. The lads guffawed.

"Say it again, Shorty," one of them gasped, holding his sides. "That's the best yet." A couple of the fellows had to sit down for a minute they were so completely overcome with laughter. Big Frank stood stolidly by for a moment, watching his cousin blush the way he always did when he'd said or done something that struck the big kids funny; watching him hold his underlip firm with his straight little teeth. What the heck did those guys think they were doing, riding the kid?

"What's so darned funny, you guys," he blazed at them. "Tell me that, will you?"

"Him," howled one of the lads pointing at Frankie. " 'Tones,' he says. Oh boy, that's rich."

"He did not," said Big Frank hotly. "The way back in his throat, and anyone that can't hear it is a cross-eyed monkey. Say stones, squirt."

"'Tone." There was no sound whatever from the back of Frankie's throat.

"There, hear it?"

The kids' eyes were round as saucers. "Yeah," they murmured as one man. "Yeah. I heard it." No one picked on Frankie for a long time after that.

big shot small fry . . .

He lived a double life at that stage. By day he was one of the boys, swaggering across the baseball diamond, airing his views on Babe Ruth, setting the lads up to a round of tootsie-rolls at his grandfather's candy store. He was big stuff, by day. By night he was a little boy again, sleepy and loving. Clamoring for Mother Goose and Uncle Wiggily. Sometimes it was Mother who read to him before dinner. Sometimes—when Mrs. Sinatra was off on a case—it was Grandma. The same old stories over and over, and the Lord help them if one syllable was skipped. He learned to pick out words in his story books. Cat and boy and house. It pleased him, recognizing words, and he kept asking everyone how soon he'd be old enough to read.

"Next year," they'd tell him. "When you go to school." So school became a magic place.

And then he was five, going on six, and school turned out to be kind of a dreary joint after all. One from which one fled at the stroke of noon with never a backward look. His whole outlook changed. School was a chore to be endured, and the leisure he had hitherto scorned became the thing. Afternoon, that was the time. Anything could happen in the afternoon. Like going down to Grandpa's candy store and discovering a brand new kind of penny candy. Stuff that looked like gumdrops but that had perfume inside. Or maybe, like walking home with Anne, his second grade sweetheart, and having her mother invite him for lunch. Or—best of all—discovering a stray dog or cat and bringing it home. That was his hobby. Some kids collected stamps or playing cards. Frankie collected animals.

Mrs. Sinatra put up with it, mostly because she couldn't bear Frank's face on the few occasions she remonstrated. "Oh, but, Mom," he'd say, and his face would suddenly be nothing but eyes. "He's starving, Mom."

UH, UH—MUSTN'T TOUCH!

It would be sorta silly to drape Verboten signs on the stove and the stairs and Pa's cigarette lighter and Junior's ball-bearings and—well, gosh darn, on practically everything in the house. But if ya gotta, ya gotta—in your mind, anyhow. 'Cause according to the Red Cross, over 100,000 people a year are killed in the U. S. as the result of unnecessary accidents—and home accidents account for over one-third of these with falls, burns and poisons topping the list! Makes you shudderish, doesn't it?

So look, even if you don't enroll in one of those swell Red Cross Home, Farm or Aquatic Accident Prevention courses, do try to spread the word about safety to your folks and friends.

Let's save the gore-giving for where it can't be helped. Main Street was never meant to be a beach head. . . .

"All right," she'd hear someone saying, and it always turned out to be herself. "All right, he can stay a while." Fortunately, the animals were usually transients. Hard-bitten gypsies they were, grateful for a square meal and a night's lodging, and then, tally-ho, they were off again. Frankie would dash home from school the day after he'd brought home a new one, eyes aglow. "Where's Dutchess?" he'd call. They all had names, even the one-night-standers.

"Gone," his mother would say, looking down. "She lit out around ten this morning and hasn't come back."

frankenstein in fur . . .

Then one night he appeared with something that can only be described as a canine character. She was part Spitz, part Airedale, and after that it was anybody's guess. She was definitely not an attractive addition to the group, and as far as Mrs. Sinatra was concerned, the more transient she was the better. The day after her arrival Frankie raced home after school. "Where's Girlie?" he asked.

The reply from the kitchen was not enthusiastic. "Right under my feet."

Sometimes, in the ensuing years, Mrs. Sinatra would say to her husband, "Funny, Marty, with all the pretty dogs he's brought home, this thing would be the one to linger." Frankenstein in fur, that was Girlie, but she and Frank idolized each other. They were together from the minute school was out until it began again next day. Eventually, when it became necessary for Frank's mother to keep off the stairs somewhat on account of her heart, Girlie remained downstairs when Frank was up in his room in order to carry messages.

"Girlie," Nathalie would say. "The telephone for Frank." Whereupon Girlie would tear up the stairs and bark at Frank's door. Down he'd come, the pup at his heels wiggling and wagging with joy.

Came a day when Frank got into some slight scrape in school. His teacher phoned Mrs. Sinatra, and Girlie made it her business to eavesdrop on the conversation. "He did?" Frank's mother was saying in a horrified voice. "Frank did that?" There was a pause electric with emotion. Then, "Well, I most certainly will reprimand him. Severely." The receiver clicked, and Girlie tried to make herself invisible.

"Girlie," said Mrs. Sinatra. "Go get Frank." Girlie was busy with a flea and feigned deafness.

"Girlie!" Nathalie's voice was sharper. Girlie yawned a little and settled down.

"I said," Nathalie told her clearly and authoritatively, "go—get—Frank." To make a long story short, a shoe was thrown, and Girlie eventually sulked up the stairs, barked weakly at Frank's door and gloomed down again. Later on, when that particular crisis was past, and Frank and his mother were buddies again, they got a big laugh out of that incident.

There were other scrapes after that, of course. Like when Frank set an alarm clock to go off in the middle of Assembly. Mr. Stover, the principal, phoned that time, and Marty handled him. He heard him through patiently, then he said, "Well, Mr. Stover, he's a boy." That was Marty's comeback anytime anyone said boo against Frankie. That and, "Well, we'd worry about him if he didn't get into mischief once in a while."

Just once did he spank his son, and he's never really forgiven himself for that. Some kind of country fair came to town, complete with merry-go-round. Nothing would do but Frankie ride on it, and his dad said okay, why not. So Frank and his buddies tooted over to the fairgrounds, on a large, white steed and, in imagination, the steed was fiery, and Frank was Hoot Gibson. "Yippee, fellas," he yelped and, so saying, he leaped in his saddle and his head crashed through the carousel roof. Pandemonium followed. In the course of time three facts became obvious. The roof would have to be removed, Frank's hair would have to be shaved off in order to treat the cut, and Frank's father would have to be apprised of the affair. Carousel roofs, it developed, came high, and the new one was on Papa Sinatra. It was immediately after getting the bill that Marty let his practically-bald son have it.

A typical American childhood was Frank's, with nothing in it anywhere to indicate the incredible career that was to come. He went to church every Sunday at St. Francis'. Made his First Communion and was confirmed there. He never was in the choir, but he was an altar boy for years, cherubic in the white robe. He had measles and mumps, chicken-pox and whooping cough; all the kids' diseases you can think of, and he was really sick with them. That's why he's such a fiend on inoculations for his youngsters.

There was the inevitable ball club that all little boys belong to. The club that is as dear to their hearts as anything can ever be. Half secret handshakes, half baseball, it was, and the club's name was the Turk's Palace. They had flashy orange and black uniforms with a half moon, star and dagger on them, and they all called each other Turk. Confusing? Not to a foxy eight-year-old. The uniforms were donated by Frankie's family, and on the strength of this he was made manager as well as pitcher.

There was, in due time, that momentous business, the first date. It was with a girl named Marie for the grammar school graduation dance, and his family will never forget it. The splashing in the tub; the slicking of the hair first one way, then another; the eventual appearance, shiny-faced in the new suit. "Get it good and dark," he'd admonished Mom before the purchase, "to look like a tux."

"Do I look okay?" he asked, hand casually in pocket, straining for nonchalance.

"Wonderful."

"Well, so long, then." And when the door closed on him, a look passed between Marty and Nathalie, a long misty look.

growing pain pangs . . .

Oh, it was a typical childhood, all right, followed by a typical adolescence. If you have a brother or a son, you can practically write the words yourself. Those Saturday night movie dates for which he preened for hours. The school dances and Mom's vigil at the window till she heard his key in the lock. The ukulele era, oh hideous memory! He was in his early teens when the world went ukulele-mad. Remember? You just had to have one or you were a social zero. They got him one, just as they'd gotten him a bike and a pony and everything else he'd ever wanted, and it seemed never to be out of his unskilled hands. Then, to really fix things, he sang with it. His voice, as his mother recalls, was "all right—nothing swoony," and if you'd told her then he would someday drive the girls ma-ad with it, she would very likely have given you the Sinatra special, known as the horse laugh.

One afternoon Mrs. Sinatra came home and saw an unbelievable-looking vehicle in front of the door. It was painted red, yellow, green and blue, and there was something about the set of the headlights that gave it a leering expression. "This," she thought, "gives the house an air." They had moved by this time to their didn't go in for rainbow-hued flivvers. Presently, the car vanished, when or how, she failed to notice, but she asked no questions. It was enough that the thing was no longer in the vicinity. However, came six o'clock, came Frankie, came—oh no, it couldn't be—the car!

"I got a car, Mom."

"So I see."

"Isn't she a honey?" he grinned at her.

"To be brutally frank," his mother said, "I dislike it. Why all the colors, and why all the scribbling on it?"

"Gee, Mother," he said, giving her that don't-you-know-anything-look, "that's what gets 'em."

Who it got and why was never observed, as the car collapsed shortly thereafter, never to rise again. Frankie, who now drives a Fleetwood Body Cadillac, looks back affectionately on that car.

Life at the Sinatra home was not dull, you see, any more than an Andy Hardy movie or a Henry Aldrich broadcast is dull. Things kept happening. There was the time Frank wanted one of his father's old fedoras. A play or something, Nathalie thought vaguely. He was always needing things for plays. A clown suit here, a pair of velvet draperies there. "In the top of the closet, hon," she told him. "Help yourself." In time his father discovered that his best Stetson had been pinched. "Where the heck is it?" he boomed. Mrs. Sinatra was fluttery, but not without hope of retrieving it.

"Oh, Frankie borrowed it for a play or something." Frankie had done no such thing. He had cut off the brim and pinned campaign buttons and fishing tackle and everything pinnable all over it.

buck-passing birds . . .

And then there were the pigeons. How he got them up to his room remains a mystery, but Grandma discovered them one morning when she went in to make his bed. Hordes of them. When he came home from school, his mother nailed him. "It's the pigeons or me," she said. "The house isn't big enough for all of us."

Frank and another boy co-owned the birds and aspired to train them to be carriers. Frankie didn't want to fib about them—(a kind of blazing honesty was one of the imp's redeeming features)—but gee, he wanted to keep those pigeons.

"Gosh, Mom," he said, "I'm sort of minding them for a guy."

"For how long?"

"Oh, a few days, maybe."

The co-owner gave his mother the same line, and the birds were shunted back and forth in a series of boxes a couple of times a week. Until the two mothers met by accident one day and got on the subject of the pigeons. You can imagine how it went. "My son's pigeons! Why they're your son's pigeons." "My son's? Why, heavens, no."

And it seemed like just the next day that she and Marty were sitting side by side in the Demarest High auditorium watching him graduate, and they would have given their souls to have him fourteen again, instead of seventeen. Practically a man. Kid stuff was really behind him now. The champion basketball team he'd been so proud to be a part of, the swimming team he'd battled to make and did, the fun he'd had singing with the school band. The lazy summers, the irresponsibility. All that was finished. There'd be a quick vacation at the shore, then a job that he'd lined up with the Jersey Observer. And in the fall, college at Stevens—New Jersey's big engineering school. He'd be an aviation engineer, earn about ten thousand dollars a year, get married when he was around thirty. He'd planned just how it would be, and life stretched before him as smooth and well-posted as Route No. 1. But he'd reckoned without Fate.

Less than a month after he graduated (with high honors, by the way), he met Nancy Barbato, the girl he was to marry before he was twenty-one. And that same momentous summer he realized that he'd never be happy in anything but music.

Part II of Frank Sinatra's life story will appear in the October issue of MODERN SCREEN.

are you young enough to try new things?

Do you habitually take the negative side when a change is suggested? Or do you say, "Let's try it and find out if it's better?" These two questions really furnish a very good test to find out how young you feel. Take the case of Tampax. It is certainly a sign of the times that this form of monthly sanitary protection (worn internally) is so popular among the students at the leading women's colleges!

The principle of Tampax (internal absorption) has long been known to doctors, but this famous product makes the method available to women generally. Pure surgical cotton is compressed into dainty one-time-use applicators, so that changing is a matter of moments. No belts, pins or external pads. No odor or chafing. Easy disposal. Start using Tampax this very month!

Sold in 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. At drug stores and notion counters. A whole month's supply will go into your purse. Economy box contains 4 months' supply (average). Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

CAN'T HELP LOVIN' THAT MAN

actor, Flynn; one blonde glamour puss, Martha O'Driscoll; one magician, Harry Mendoza; one pair of newlyweds, Ruth Carroll and Jimmy Dodd, who sang and played the guitar. They found themselves flying northward, with no idea of what they were going to do.

Luckily, they had one day to themselves in Seattle. Gathered round a table, they went to work, hunting first for a central theme round which to build the show. It was Errol who supplied the theme.

"What'll they expect of us? Laughs. Okay, let's give 'em laughs."

petrified pagliacci . . .

The first show was at Anchorage. Flynn, the poised, the imperturbable, was petrified. Ordinarily self-contained as an oyster, Flynn quaked in his number nines. It was years since he'd faced a live audience. What really got him down, though, was his over-painful consciousness that these boys were soldiers and he wasn't.

He remembered an old trick of John Barrymore's. "A few slugs of bourbon," Barrymore used to say, "sends you out in the proper to-hell-with-it spirit."

Acting on that suggestion, he managed to get himself out on the stage and into his routine—which started with a description of his departure from Hollywood—

"Gosh, what a sendoff! . . . You should have seen the crowds . . . Hundreds of people at the airport . . ."

The boys waited, dubious. What was this anyway? A Hollywood swellhead? A big-shot movie star telling 'em how great he was—?

". . . Hundreds of people waiting to see me off . . . all of 'em lawyers . . ."

That brought the first howl, and Errol relaxed. He mopped away the perspiration. "Nice climate you've got here. It was getting a little hot for me in Hollywood. By the way, I brought my own legal adviser along . . ."

A big buildup and Mendoza trotted on—"Meet my lawyer, boys, a swell pal who's stuck to me through thick and thin—"

Mendoza handed him a summons. "In the suit of Lana Ginsberg vs. Errol Flynn—"

"But I never heard of her—"

A maniacal chortle from Mendoza. "He never heard of her! Watch this, fellows. Do you happen to remember, Mr. Flynn, those five minutes at the airport before we left?—That was Lana Ginsberg—"

And so it went. Hearing the roars of laughter, Martha and Ruth hugged each other in the wings. This had been Errol's contribution. He'd offered his recent legal plight as the central theme of the show. They'd all been grateful for his good sportsmanship, and it turned out fine for him, too—

"Because the more he kidded himself," Martha explained, "the better they liked him. I never saw anyone as scared as he was that first night, but he never had to be scared again. They went crazy over him—"

Naturally, he was pleased by the warmth of his reception, but bewildered, too. Of the five, he considered his own position unique. The girls were girls, Jimmy was married, Mendoza was an older man. True, he himself had been turned down by the service, but you don't wear a placard round your neck, saying so.

"I can't understand it," he said to an officer. "To tell you the truth, I dreaded this trip, expected resentment, wouldn't have blamed them either for thinking,

'What's this guy fooling around on the stage for? Why aren't the positions reversed? He looks as if he could do what we're doing—'"

"First of all," said the officer, "they're too darned appreciative of your coming up at all to resent anything. Besides, they know more than you think they do. You don't have to wear placards. They know why you're not down there with them—"

Throughout the seven weeks of three and four and five shows a day, there was only one crack, and that was good natured—

"Hi, Errol! What've you got that I ain't?"

"A porthole," Errol answered, deadpan, and the house came down.

In Hollywood, the troupe had been told by people who ought to know: "You can be sure of one thing. At the end of a week, you'll be deadly enemies." At the end of seven weeks they were fast friends, despite the abnormal conditions under which they lived—cooped up together in planes, cooped up in little huts built in the snow—

"We had just one squawk," Errol observes "That Martha girl laughed before breakfast—which drove us all insane. She'd wake up, feeling zestful. Otherwise, she was straight from heaven. So were they all—"

If you want your eyes scratched out or your block knocked off, say a word in criticism of Flynn to any of the four. A natural leader, he became their manager. They flew through all sorts of weather. It got to be a gag. "We won't fly the mail," the pilots would say, "but we'll fly you—"

"Yes, I was manager," Errol agrees. "My duties consisted in doling out the bourbon when their feet got cold."

IT HAPPENED TO ME

A few years ago, I attended a matinee performance of a terrific hit, "Pal Joey." At the end of the show I waited backstage with one or two others to have the leads sign my program. While talking to "Pal Joey" himself, I remarked, "You shouldn't have been so excellent. Hollywood will be taking you away from us soon."

"Naw," he answered, "what would they do with me? Now here comes a guy that they can't live without." And he pointed to a tall, blonde fellow coming through the door.

The latter, at hearing this, remarked to me, "Don't listen to him, I'm just a chorus boy"—and pointing to the girl he was standing with, said with a grin—"Here's the gal the movie bigwigs are really crazy about." Calmly, and with neat dispatch, she proceeded to hit him over the head with her pocketbook.

Well, you've guessed it, as fate would have it, all three have by now carved neat little niches for themselves in the Hollywood Hall of Fame—the two young actors being signed by the same studio and appearing in their first movie together, "Pilot No. 5." The gal? Well, she finally made enthusiastic audiences realize the difference between her and her versatile sister.

Their names? Pal Joey Gene Kelly, Chorus Boy Van Johnson and pocketbook-slinging June Havoc!

Miss Tess Dobker,
New York City.

That's not how they tell it. If there was a way to make you more comfortable, Errol found it. If Martha laughed in the morning, Errol was always gay. And if you think there's any better combination for such a trip than thoughtfulness on the one hand and a sense of fun on the other, you're crazy—

Ruth had a birthday at Amchitka. Martha managed to find a compact to give her. Errol appeared with a long envelope, which he stuck into her coat pocket. It held a bond made out in the name of Jimmy Dodd, Junior. Jimmy, Junior's head isn't even peeking over the horizon yet, but Errol had to gag his gift up. Else somebody might think he was a softie.

It was at Amchitka, too, that they celebrated Christmas, stealing a few minutes between shows to buy gifts for each other at the PX. An officer gave them a tiny tree, sent by his mother. Errol read a Christmas poem of his own composition, then from their single bottle of wine, poured a glass for each, and they drank a toast to Christmas. There were a few candles for the tree and a few cans of sardines they'd been saving up, and nothing in abundance but warm comradeship and good will, which made it a Christmas none of them will ever forget.

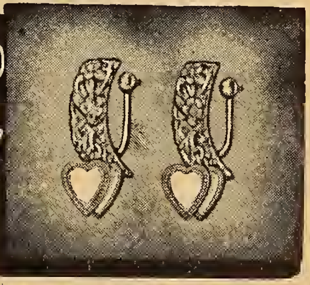
cavaliers in khaki . . .

Two things hit Errol hardest. One was the way our boys treated the girls—the innumerable little gifts and attentions—the souvenirs of Japs that you could tell meant a lot to those guys. Not only did they insist on handing their treasures over, but went to enormous pains doing them up to look pretty enough for the girls. For two years they'd been living under conditions you'd think might toughen their

TRUE-LOVE AND Friendship RING and Matching EARRINGS

A wonderful gift for sweethearts or pals. More precious than ever now when true friends and lovers are far away.

Nothing that has been shown in the shops on Fifth Avenue or in Hollywood has had such an instant, popular demand. Everyone agrees the ring and earrings are the most perfect gifts and true emblems of love and friendship.



The earrings are the latest, comfortable, secure screw type and match the ring in beauty and design.

Sterling Silver

The true, precious metal for long wear and sparkling attractiveness. Both the ring and earrings become more charming the longer they are worn. The supply of these "TRUE-LOVE-and-Friendship" Rings and earrings is limited.

NEW Pendant Heart Design

What makes both the ring and the matching earrings so unusual and attractive is the twin, Sterling Silver, pendant hearts that dangle daintily like sentimental and charming settings. Either the ring or earrings can be worn separately but together they are truly captivating. The precious Sterling Silver ring is extra wide. Both the ring and earrings are beautifully embossed with the very newest "Forget-Me-Not" design with two pendant hearts suitable for engraving initials of loved ones. Both the ring and earrings become more attractive and sentimental the longer they are worn.

MYSTERY

Blinding reflected sunlight often makes a mystery of many scenes even though ordinary sun glasses are worn. Glare obscures details, blurs vision, tires eyes.

REVEALED!

Through Polaroid* Day Glasses, the scene becomes clear. Hidden detail becomes visible. That's because reflected glare is largely absorbed. Wearing Polaroid Day Glasses adds to your enjoyment of outdoor sports . . . adds safety to the driving of a car.

POLAROID DAY GLASSES

Polaroid Day Glasses utilize a unique scientific principle. Polarizing material laminated in the lenses sorts light rays . . . admits plenty of seeing rays . . . filters reflected glare and ultra-violet (sunburn) rays.

sensibilities, but they were anything but tough where the girls were concerned. Their infinite courtesy made your heart ache. In strictest privacy, of course.

Aloud, Mr. Flynn said: "Next time we entertain, it'll be at a WAC camp, so we fellows can get our egos back—"

Actually, what they did for the girls was nothing compared with what they did for Flynn. "I'd been a little sour against my luck," he says quietly. "They took the sour taste away. I owe them a terrific debt of gratitude." Humility isn't what you expect from Flynn. Which shows how wrong you can be about people.

He'd hardly got home before he was off again on a three weeks' bond tour. That would have been a cinch by comparison, except for the mothers. Letters must have flown thick and fast from Alaska around that time. There seemed to be so many mothers, with longing in their eyes. "My boy Tom wrote that he saw you in Adak. Do you remember?"

He'd seen fifty thousand Toms. "Of course I remember," he'd answer gently, cursing himself for not being able to tell them exactly how Tom had looked and what Tom had said. Luckily, most of them were satisfied with the simple statement. One woman put out a hand and touched his sleeve. "That's as close as I've come to my boy in eighteen months—"

"What you want to do," he says, "is pick her up, stick her in a plane and carry her to Tom. Well, you can't. So you stand up there and try like hell to sell bonds—"

Back in Hollywood again, "Objective, Burma" wasn't scheduled to start till May. Ordinarily, he'd have blown out of town. But you can't travel nowadays, so for the first time in nine years Errol, the restless, had to keep his itching foot at home. This led to what he calls a simple-minded discovery. He found he liked being at home.

He wallowed in idleness. There were no set times for anything and only one rule—to let no day go by without doing some writing—whether at six in the morning, four in the afternoon or midnight—on the book he's trying to finish. It's a character study of five people in a small boat, called "The Eye on the Tree Stump." The original title was "Charlie Bow-Tie."

"But that misled my friends into thinking it was an autobiography. I dare 'em to identify me with an eye on a tree stump—" self-torture de luxe . . .

You may wonder why he chooses to write at all, since he doesn't have to—

"Strictly for pleasure," he grins. "I enjoy the agony."

His household consists of Alex, the Russian butler, and Marie, the French cook, both of whom have been with him for years. His day begins when he wakes up. Alex appears with whatever messages have accumulated, asks whether he'll have coffee upstairs or down, and hands him the papers—minus gossip columns, as hereinbefore noted, and open at the racing news.

"That way, I get a slant on the life I prefer, before turning to more serious matters on Page One."

Shaving, showering, breakfast and papers are a leisurely process, strung out as long as possible. During this period, he's officially non-existent, as his friends have reason to know. Alex is a traditionalist. He clings to old customs. For the longest time, his stock phrase on the phone was, "Mr. Flynn asleep in bed," till Errol protested.

"They'll think I'm lazy. Tell 'em I'm down there on the horse—"

By now they're growing a little weary of "Mr. Flynn on horse."

"Tell him to put a little variety into it. Let's see now . . . I've got it! Errol—"

"How about—Mr. Flynn turning cartwheels—?"

"Yeah—or Mr. Flynn taking running jump in lake—"

He likes to play tennis in the early afternoon then come home and work an hour or so.

"If I can extract the work from my secretary." The reason for that crack being his secretary who happened to walk in just then. Being the perfect secretary, she didn't bat an eyelash. "Miss Eddington," he continued, "is generally to be found at the movies, when her services are required—"

"Will that be all, Mr. Flynn?" She moved toward the door. "And quite enough, too," she murmurs, closing it firmly behind her.

Recently he's been absorbed in the details of a new and stimulating business venture. He and John Decker, the artist, have opened an art gallery.

Decker, John Barrymore's close friend, had met Errol with Barrymore on several occasions. But their friendship really took root in a hospital, to which both were confined at the same time.

IT HAPPENED TO ME

Back in Shreveport, Louisiana, I had just enlisted in the Navy, and I was feeling pretty blue about leaving my wife and my home. Perhaps I should feel blue since I would be wearing it most of the time.

As I stood there on the courthouse square, looking up at Old Glory, I wondered if I had done the right thing. Was I walking out on my wife? By the eternal, I was not! I was walking into this fight for her. She had been so courageous, so unfaltering as she said: "It's your move, dear. Whatever you think is best has my complete sanction."

Still, I felt blue. Suddenly, a hand came down on my shoulder in a friendly sort of way, yet it contained almost as much force as Babe Ruth ever put on a baseball. I turned and looked squarely at Bob Hope. "While there's life, there's HOPE," he grinned infectiously. "Have a cigarette, pal!"

Then I was talking, and he was listening in a big, understanding way, for he's that kind of a guy. Thank you, Bob Hope!

Franklin A. Landers, A. S.
San Diego, California.

"Guess who's upstairs," breathed a young little nurse to Decker.

"Beelzebub," guessed Decker.

"False—Errol Flynn!"

Decker went up to see him. They began talking pictures.

art and taxes . . .

"I don't know much about them," Errol said, "but I've always been fascinated by Gauguin the man, always wanted to own one of his paintings—"

That started it. Decker took him to exhibitions, painted his portrait. They found a Van Gogh that Flynn went mad over. He bought that and a Gauguin, too. He began to read and study, to look and understand, and he found in the contemplation of great pictures something that calmed his spirit.

Decker had long dreamed of opening an art gallery, and out of a clear sky the opportunity came. An artist friend, owner of a studio on Sunset, had to go to Mexico in a hurry. "I've got to sell this place overnight. Know anyone who'll buy it?"

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

Good for headaches, too

Decker dashed up to Flynn's. He was in the bathroom, shaving. "Want to go into the art gallery business with me?"

"Are you nuts?"

"No more than usual. Come down and look at the place."

"I'm going to play tennis."

"This is on the way."

Ask Errol why he bought it, and he'll tell you: "I got paid up with my lawyers, and had a little loose change jingling around. Oh, I know it's not a money-making proposition, but that's where you're lucky nowadays. Taxes being what they are, you're released from the tyranny of trying to get rich. That leaves you free to spend your money for fun, and an art gallery's fun. You can look at pictures without going way downtown—"

But in one of his rare tongue-out-of-cheek times, he said to Decker: "Whatever happens, I'll never stop being grateful."

Despite all the stories, he's rarely seen at nightclubs. He loathes dancing and buying clothes he considers a waste of time, so he covers six months at a spurt and forgets about them.

"That's the theory, anyway. In practice, I go over and borrow from the goodly McEvoy." The goodly McEvoy's his closest friend, but since any resemblance between their physical frames is non-existent, you can take that as you please.

He still misses Arno. No dog can ever replace that little gray clown. He was a kindred soul but Errol's very fond of the little dachshund Mrs. McEvoy gave him and promptly tagged the weenie-waddler with a highly appropriate name—which we'll keep off the record, out of regard for her canine blushes.

He gives occasional dinner parties and, once or twice a year, a big one. Mostly he dines alone or with a close friend. When alone, he reads. He began his bachelor existence by consulting with Marie about menus, but found she got along much better without him. His favorite meal consists of a paté—only Marie knows how it's made—roast chicken, salad, cheese and very strong coffee. Two very's, in fact.

He always reads himself to sleep. Rather, he reads himself awake till two or three in the morning. His literary tastes follow no set patterns. His bookseller has a standing order for various items Errol remembers having enjoyed in the past, that he wants to re-read and just dug one such item out of a cobwebby hole—"Ballads" of Banjo Patterson, an Australian poet. He re-reads "High Wind in Jamaica" every other month, loves anything by Bemelmans and got a couple of cold shudders out of "Lost Weekend," which sent three of his friends on the wagon. His dearest treasure is a copy of the personal journals of Gauguin which he unearthed after a long, fierce struggle. He devours books on art sent him by Decker.

"Then I go down and tell him things I forget he's already told me."

His gusto for life remains unimpaired. His mockery, as you've doubtless gathered by now, is a weapon against the hurts of living. But catch him offguard, as you can once in a blue moon, and another Flynn looks out of those grave eyes—

"Life sticks out a foot to trip us all up now and then. But I have no time for bitterness. I'm much too grateful for the good things—the kindness and friendliness of people I'd never have known except for dark periods. When I wake up in the morning and see a beautiful day and the green grass and know that I have friends, the rest doesn't matter—"

His grin returns. "Sounds sentimental, doesn't it? Well, why not? I'm an Irishman. Who's got a better right to be?"

We're not an Irishman but mind if we get sentimental, too? We think you're okay, Flynn.

G. I. JOHNNY

from the lobby of the club comes more music. A kid from Kansas is really batting out some beautiful boogie-woogie in there. Seated at writing desks up on the balcony, other boys are earnestly scribbling familiar words . . . "Dear Mom," while below, bulky G.I. toes are beating it out on the Navajo rugs around the piano . . . stamping out boogie-woogie as the kid from Kansas really gets in the groove.

Boogie-woogie versus the juke box. Battle of the Buckley Baritones.

And over there in their usual corner, Johnny and his gang are having the usual juke session. Jibing good-naturedly at each other about which number to play and who put the last nickel in, every tune bringing back memories . . .

The pretty girl dishing out sundaes behind the counter sighing as she listens to Johnny backing up the juke box on "I Love You." Little knowing that his thoughts are flying right on the beam to Hollywood and his daughter, Julie Ann.

"Private Payne?" the polite Corporal will ask. "OH . . . H . . . H . . . JOHNNY! Oh yeah . . . sure . . . he's in there. You'll find him right over . . ." and he points to the corner table.

"I Couldn't Sleep a Wink La-a-a-st Ni-i-i-g-h-t," the juke box is crooning softly, and Johnny is singing along with it when the Corporal yells, "Hey, Johnny . . . ya' got company!"

many a wink . . .

"I couldn't sleep a wink last night"—he sings—but you know better. Darkly bronzed—clear of eye—Johnny looks like he's slept plenty a wink.

He leans around the edge of the juke box to see who's calling. So much the G.I. now that he's a little surprised to see anybody from movie town. Then grins—the same familiar one-eyebrowed grin . . . glad to see somebody from back home.

We sit down. Somebody puts another nickel in.

He's a hundred per cent Army . . . a little more sober, serious—only getting enthusiastic when speaking of some "sweetheart of a ship," or, say, the speed of some plane; but he's a former student pilot without a plane now. For since the abolishment of the War Training Service Program Johnny and his gang are awaiting reclassification at Buckley Field.

Johnny's about the most "Private" Pvt. there is, having been at seven different schools and bases—a record of some kind—he's not sure just what.

It's tough enough for any celebrity at best. But for a good-looking six-foot-three-er . . . with wavy dark brown hair . . . hazel eyes . . . and a dimple in the chin . . . oh BROTHER . . . it really means sweating it out.

Johnny's heart has always been "upstairs," ever since he was a kid cutting classes at Episcopal High School at Alexandria, Va., to keep a date with "Jennie," an old 1918 training plane, hanging together by sheer hope.

It was three miles from school to the field, and every week would find Johnny hanging around, waiting his turn to give up a $3 weekly allowance. Three bucks every week in the kitty for "Jen."

Later he bought fifty per cent of a neat little job with a 440 H.P. motor.

He'd had some two hundred hours in his log when war broke out.

War . . . and Johnny, cutting cinema capers and singing love songs to Alice Faye in "Hello, Frisco, Hello," at Twentieth-Century-Fox and dreaming of getting into the Thrilling New Hair "Make-Up"!

YOUR CLOTHES may be fashion-right, your cosmetics flawless...but you can't look your best with dull, mousey hair. Make it soft, shining and color-bright with Marchand's wonderful new Make-Up Hair Rinse!

No matter what shade your hair is, you can accent its natural color... give it a "warmer" glow or a "cooler" hue...even blend little gray streaks in with the original, youthful shade.

Decide the color effect you wish and choose your hair "make-up" from the 12 lovely Marchand Rinse shades. A simple color chart on the back of each package will help you make the right selection. Then, after your home shampoo, dissolve Marchand's Rinse in warm water and brush or pour it through your hair. Gone is all trace of soap film and dullness! Your hair gleams with color and brightness!

Marchand's Make-Up Hair Rinse is as easy to use as your other cosmetics. It goes on evenly and stays on until you wash it off. Not a bleach—not a permanent dye—it's absolutely harmless! Try it after your next shampoo.

show in the air . . . of flying.

But he was thirty years old. Too old to fly, the Army said. Only by enlisting in the Army Reserve and becoming a student under the Civil Aeronautics Association War Training Service Program could he ever hope to fly. So what if he'd rather pick off Zeros and Messerschmitts, he wanted to help in any way Uncle Sam thought best, and the WTS program trained men to become instructors in primary flying schools. By heck, if they'd have him . . .

The original nine months program blossomed out with more courses. Then two weeks before he was to finish training and be assigned as a primary instructor, the entire WTS program was halted. Disappointed? Of course he was, but knowing why he was being held on the warmer's bench made it easier, knowing that combat air losses haven't been as high as expected earlier and that therefore there was no real need for a lot more primary instructors.

So it was off to Buckley Field for Private Payne. With fingers crossed.

They're mighty proud of G.I. Johnny. Proud that he's never taken any "soft" job his high I.Q. rates. Just sweated it out along with them.

"If I'd gotten out of this outfit, even if I'd had the chance to, it would've meant leaving the rest of the gang," Johnny says. "Like splitting a convoy. You just don't do it. When you start out together . . . well . . . you sorta like to stay with your own bunch of Joes. That's the nicest thing about Army life anyway, meeting the finest bunch of guys you probably wouldn't ever have known. Guys like Tony here, or Stanley . . . Archie . . ."

"Aw . . . knock it off!" the boys say, a little embarrassed.

"Knocking it off" meaning anything from "Stop" or "Quit it," to the more rugged "Shud . . d . . d . . d . . dup!"

He doesn't particularly want to be an officer anyway. "All I care about is just being up there," he goes on, thumbing towards the heavens. "I just want to get up there . . . and fly 'em."

And he's still working at it here at Buckley Field, the Army Air Forces Training Command School which boasts Colonel Edward W. Raley as Commanding Officer.

Often you'll see the former Twentieth-Century-Fox star out there by the side of the barracks whacking a volley ball over the net. Or maybe playing a game of catch. Or just indulging in a little horseplay, like boxing with Tony.

During the day you may see him out on the drill field drilling the aviation students.

For Johnny's a Flight Leader here at Buckley. "Sort of like a Drill Sergeant," he explains modestly. "You can hear me fourteen miles—that's why I got it. I have a loud voice."

"And the ability to throw it," somebody else puts in.

"You had a loud voice at Yakima, too," another reminds.

It seems he was a Student Adjutant in Washington, also considered a position of honor.

forward observers . . .

Of course there are a few girls working at the Base who've heard rumors and who do a little extra reconnaissance duty on their own time. Dropping into the Service Club, "passing by" the P.X. or "just happening" to go by around Mail Call time hoping to see the former star. Using infiltration tactics all their own to get a better and closer look.

But none of the regular Joes who do know him ever think of him as a star. Johnny Payne? . . . sure . . . you'll find him over in the corner by the juke box.

The bunch here at the table with him now are the "regulars." With the exception of Tony, who joined them at Buckley, they've come down the stretch together learning to "fly the Army way."

Take Buddy Lawler, for instance. Johnny's friendship with the tall, blond be-mustached Buddy, with his sense of humor and easy-going ways, is a hold-over from Hollywood.

Buddy, a professional dance director and former assistant to Hermes Pan on Twentieth-Century-Fox musicals, first bumped into Johnny seven years ago when both were starting out together at Paramount in a thing called "College Swing," with Betty Grable, Bob Hope, Jackie Coogan, Martha Raye and the handsome new lad called John Payne. Buddy was getting his first break at helping with dance routines.

Later after they had each become tops in their own fields, they hit their last civilian licks together in 20th-Century's "Hello, Frisco, Hello."

It was funny how they bumped into each other a little later in the Service.

They went to different Primary schools, Johnny to one in Arizona and Buddy to Baker, Calif. Then one day when both were reporting back to Santa Monica headquarters for further orders, they bumped smack into each other in the C.A.A. office.

Surprised, Johnny yelped, "BUDDY! What's cookin' with you? What are you doing here, fellow? And where to next?"

"That's what I'm here to find out," said Buddy. "Looks like it's back to Death Valley for me again . . . HOT . . . oh brother-r-r-r—"

BUDDY, CAN YOU SPARE A MILLION?

Dollars, that is. Didn't think so—but how's about one-fourth of one dollar? Two bits? To make the NAA go over the top with a bang? Page 94 tells you how.

"Well . . . let's go in and see if we can't get it changed so you can go whither I goest," Johnny said, grinning.

And they did.

rustling up a wife . . .

Their affiliation as barracks buddies has carried them right on into approaching matrimony for Buddy. The result of a girl Johnny "found" for him when they were training in Arizona months later. After all, what more can one pal do for another than to find him a wife? (Don't answer that.)

It happened this way. Johnny met Anne first. So Johnny introduces her to Buddy and sorta promotes it along, and before Buddy knows it he's engaged.

"Confidentially, if you really want to know," Buddy will tell you kiddingly, "I think the only reason she's marrying me is because she thinks Johnny will come visit us."

"What a sweetheart," says John, "cute . . . young . . . good looking . . . unaffected. . . ."

"Hey!" Buddy interrupts. "You don't have to overdo this thing. After all she's MY girl, you know!" he'll remind him. "Or IS she! What does she say in those letters anyhow????"

"She sends him letters in her letters to me," he explains. "SEALED letters. Saying 'To Johnny Via Buddy.' And a fellow can't very well open 'em . . . honor-bound and stuff. Well what do you think the big the bunk and reads 'em and then tears 'em up."

"Yep, never did better pickin' . . . if I do say so myself. And I do," Johnny says modestly.

And then there's Archie Hall, former N.B.C. radio announcer, who was a friend of a friend, but clicked solo on his own. That's how G.I. gangs usually grow.

Tony Marano is a "newie" in the bunch. Tough-fisted little Tony who can lick his welterweight in wildcats, or G.I.'s, whichever happen to come around first. And who Johnny calls "one of the best pals a guy ever had."

John and Tony met informally one morning around six A.M. when Tony, then Duty Sergeant, was making his round of the barracks and John was sitting bug-eyed with sleep, trying to figure out whether the sock or the shoe goes on first.

Tony was thinking of nothing in particular when he looked into the face of the new man who'd checked into the squadron the night before. He went on by absent-mindedly, then suddenly turned and wheeled on one stubby G.I. toe. He looked again. The guy looked familiar. Still this high Colorado air made ya' kinda dizzy. But it wouldn't hurt to ask.

"Say!" he said, "aren't you JOHN PAYNE . . . the picture star?"

"Well, yes, Private Payne," grinned Johnny.

Then questions popped back and forth about Hollywood . . . Brooklyn . . . who won the last fight with whom . . . and that's all there was to it.

After all, it isn't far from Hollywood to Brooklyn in any Army camp. Uncle Sam is the best common denominator there is. Just the distance from one bunk to another. A bunch of guys lying there at night swapping yarns. Playing a hand of poker. Showing girls' pictures. Reading letters. Laughing. Being just a gang of plain, garden-variety G.I. Joes, as sprawly and gripey and unassumingly heroic as all those other G.I.'s dotting the face of the globe.

Whenever they ask Tony what he's going to do, he mutters, "Don't know yet. Maybe I'll try Hollywood for the orange-picking season."

And Johnny will grin, embarrassed . . . the way a fellow will. But loving it like hell, too. The way a fellow will.

Tony's only kick with Private Payne—and that goes for the rest of them, too—is the way he sings in the early mornings when showering and shaving before going to mess.

Or that other matter, beef of the whole barracks, those icy showers he takes. How any guy can look out the window at snow on Pike's Peak and take ice baths is more than they can figure out. But when that liquid ice sprays over into their shower stalls . . . well!

It's this kidding between pals, the camaraderie, the ribbing, that breaks the tension, the tough grueling hours of Army life, and keeps up the morale. Whether on a bombing base in Britain or an Air Forces School in Colorado. It works just the same.

To them Saturday night is the big night. It means going into Denver. Catching the bus in front of the Service Club, or maybe, if they feel good and rich, pooling their money for the three bucks a taxi costs.

puttin' on the dog . . .

They really put on the dog those Saturday nights in Denver. Reserve a suite at a leading hotel, order steaks and luscious green salads, with extra dressing "on the side." Then pick up a phone and try to coax some girl into giving them a date. (Editorial note: I'm just taking Johnny's word—"coax" is his word.)

One Saturday night Johnny noticed that Tony seemed a little homesick, so he suggested that they put in a call and see what was cookin' at his mom's in Brooklyn.

Johnny is no stranger to "Mom" Marano. Tony's letters are full of him. She can even tell you what he sings in the showers these early A.M.'s.

"Mom'd sure get a kick out of that. Talking to a movie star!" said Tony.

After the usual delay on calls there was "Mom" Marano's sleepy voice across the miles. "TONY . . . ee . . ee . . ee!" then as he took the phone—"JOHN PAYNE? Johnny . . ee . . ee . . ee . . ee."

But Saturday night at Buckley, like Saturday nights everywhere else, regrettably comes but once a week. And most of these evenings you'll find them, as now, holding a juke box session and settling everything from world peace to whether or not they can get a bottle of bourbon by next Saturday. They reminisce about everything they've sweated out together on the way to wings. A certain Sarge. Their pet plane. Funny things that have happened.

For instance, the big show they put on when they were stationed at the Air Base near Independence, Calif.

The peaceful little town of Independence, located at the foot of beautiful Mt. Whitney, has 300 inhabitants. One of the 300 was a pretty girl named . . . well . . . let's call her Mary, who was very anxious to get into the war effort. She wanted to go to nursing school, but it cost three hundred dollars and she couldn't afford it.

It became the town problem. How to get Mary to that school. Everyone wanted to help her, but knew that she was too proud to accept donations, and they couldn't figure out how to raise the money.

"That's a cinch," Johnny and the boys said when they heard about it.

"How?" asked the folks worriedly. Three hundred dollars was a lot of money.

show business . . .

"We'll put on a show," answered John.

So the gang went to work pronto. They made the local American Legion hall into a real night club, and when they weren't flying, you could always find them down there painting fancy caricatures or surrealistic masterpieces on the walls.

Buddy Lawler picked out eight local girls for a chorus and rehearsed them very hard for two weeks on dance routines to open and close the show. He himself emceed, danced and worked out an Olsen and Johnson act with John. They even got a little six-piece-band to come down from Bishop for it. And Johnny gave out with some vocalizing that fairly shook the little hall. Some shindig.

As the show shaped up, the boys really got enthused. It began to look like an "A" production. So they went into a huddle with the local townsfolk to see if they couldn't charge a dollar admission instead of the fifty cents agreed upon.

After all, they argued, they always charged fifty cents for the Saturday night dances at the Legion "with just a juke box." Surely their show with the real live band . . . a chorus . . . a million dollar movie star . . . might be worth a dollar maybe.

But the folks said modestly that they thought "fifty cents would be better."

Johnny still grins at that.

And Buddy never lets him forget it. The time when, as Johnny's agent, all he could get for him was half a buck.

They were mighty proud of that show. "We made five hundred and eighty dollars," Buddy says.

"Six hundred, my friend," corrects Johnny, not wanting to be short-changed any further.

They drew the civilian personnel superintending the Japanese camp at Manzanar, everybody in Independence naturally, and hundreds more who came from somewhere. Nobody knew where. After sending Mary to school, they turned the rest of the profits over to the Red Cross.

Johnny's memories of the picturesque little town of Independence are so wonderful and peaceful that he says he's going back after the war and build a cabin there.

He talks about the people . . . how swell they were . . . so friendly. How they'd meet the gang on the street, not even knowing them, and say, "Where are you going, boys?"

"Oh . . . nowhere much . . . just around."

"You're coming right home to supper with us," they'd say. And soon Johnny and the others would be sitting around a little table in some kitchen. And loving it.

It was here at the Independence Air Base that he got his secondary acrobatics . . . more snap rolls . . . spins . . . half-rolls . . . or simple little things like hanging upside down on a belly strap.

The boys still laugh about how John would go out on the field in the mornings, all slicked up in his coveralls, zippy-looking as a magazine cover. And come in later tired, face streaked with dirt and oil, looking a little like Al Jolson without the gloves.

The field was just across the road from Manzanar, and the traffic pattern went right over the big Japanese camp. And, as Johnny says, he's flown over more Japs than a lot of the boys in the South Pacific.

Buddy got a lot of extra flying time off the back of Johnny's motorcycle. He kept the dreaded instrument up there all the time he was stationed there and has been known to make the thirteen miles from Independence to Lone Pine (where they went on Saturday nights) in eleven minutes minus. Minus whoever started out with him behind.

"Worse than riding piggy-back in a P-38," Buddy says groaning, still remembering some of those emergency landings on the side of the road.

nickel serenade . . .

Somebody notices the juke box is dry. In goes a nickel.

Johnny whistles along with it and tells you about the time in Arizona when he had his closest call to washing out for keeps.

They had gone to the Base in Arizona for cross-country trips and for night-flying.

"If you've never flown by yourself at night, you just can't understand how it affects you," Johnny says. "You have an awful time finding the ground sometimes. Like walking around in a dark room."

He was coming in for a landing one night when the flier's navigating lights in the ship just ahead of him suddenly went out, and Johnny, who couldn't see another plane around anywhere near, thought he was coming in okay.

He called his approach in to the girl in the control tower on the field.

"Two-hundred-forty-one coming in on final approach leg," he said over his radio.

"Any planes around you?" came the answer.

Johnny peered into the black desert night. "None that I can see," he said.

"Where's 202? Where are you 202?" the girl said, searching the blackness for another ship that should be out there somewhere.

"On the final approach leg," came the surprising answer.

Pilot Payne all but swooned at the controls. The other plane was just eight feet under his and banking just ahead of him.

"How far are you from the field?" the girl in the tower asked Johnny.

"A hundred yards," he answered.

"Pull up!" she yelled, "for the lova Pete . . . PULL UP!"

Johnny pulled up so fast he almost turned a flip himself inside the ship. Then he gave the motor the gun and circled around the field for another landing.

wrong-way payne . . .

A dual landing of both ships at the same time would have made quite a racket. "Of course, being on top—I would've gotten the best deal," he grins.

But there's still nothing romantic about a dark desert night to Johnny.

During those hot summer days when the desert sand sizzled up towards the Heavens at around 130 degrees, Johnny kept' em flying. Often in the wrong direction—but flying anyway.

Following the beam on a cross-country, he and Buddy would both often find themselves on the beam all right . . . but on the wrong end of it. Doing a regular Doug Corrigan.

On occasions one would be cross-countrying beautifully, so he thought, when he'd get a message. "Sure you're on your course?"

"Yes, sir," he'd answer efficiently.

"Well . . . if you continue . . . you'll soon be in Mexico . . . at least," the voice would say.

And there would be a quick about-face.

Johnny tells one story about the time he landed on the wrong Base. He'd been flying along one day thinking about a lot of things when suddenly down below him was spread out the most beautiful landing strip he'd ever seen. Johnny floated downward. A perfect landing. Not a quiver. A beaut.

Then he looked around him at the broad paved runways, the unfamiliar surroundings.

"This wouldn't be such-and-such field, would it?" he asked politely, naming the microscopic little field where he should have been landing.

"No, it wouldn't be," came the answer. "Where is it?"

"It MUST be some place near here," said Johnny. Then added thoughtfully, "If it isn't this one . . . then I haven't any business here."

It was a statement. Not a question.

"Nope," came the taciturn reply.

For Pilot Payne had landed on a prohibited Army Air Field, and it takes an Act of Congress to get you off one once you get on. He took off in a hurry . . . before Congress found out he was there.

Somebody on the other side of the cafeteria comes over and carefully picks out a number, and the table by the juke box gets a free ride.

"My ideal . . ." it sings sweetly.

My ideal . . . and here Johnny was thinking aloud about the tough old Sarge

If Your Child
CAN'T GAIN WEIGHT

try giving him Ovaltine

SCIENCE has proved there are certain food elements everyone needs for health. If there aren't enough of them in a child's food, serious things happen, such as poor appetite—faulty nerves, bad teeth—perhaps worse! Stunted growth, soft bones, defective eyesight.

Ovaltine supplies food elements frequently deficient in ordinary diets. Three glasses daily, made with milk as directed, provide a child's full minimum requirement of appetite Vitamin B_1, Vitamins A, D and G, and Minerals Calcium, Phosphorus and Iron—also supply niacin, pantothenic acid, pyridoxine. In addition it provides the basic food substances—complete proteins to build muscle, nerve and body cells—high-energy foods for vitality and endurance. It thus acts as an insurance against food deficiencies that retard appetite and normal growth.

So—if your child eats poorly, hates vegetables, or is thin and nervous, turn to Ovaltine.

who really gave him a rough time at one Base. He was a long ways short of being John's ideal. Or anybody else's.

Not that the Sarge didn't do a good job . . . and he had a tough one to do.

Johnny and the other fliers had been sent to this particular field for activation. Which means that the boys who had been considered "students" were activated from the Enlisted Reserve Corps to active status here. An "activation area," some fondly call it. Some also call it other things.

That it's plenty active all agree. For this is the place where officers and non-coms do their best to prepare them for the grueling job they face ahead. Toughening them up. Really doing them a favor . . . although it's a trifle hard to be grateful at the time.

They were given (it seemed to them) the equivalent of Commando training. Running an infiltration course under live fire. Running a tough obstacle course twice a day. Doing five hours of calisthenics, including 150 sit-ups and at least 70 push-ups, which means pushing oneself and abdomen from the ground up to the Heavens and back again. Or reasonable facsimile.

In short . . . this is the place where you either put up or shut up. Private Payne put up.

As is sometimes the case with a bunch of G.I.'s, they expected a famous motion picture star to be short on muscles and er . . . intestinal fortitude. The old celebrity deal again, with Johnny trying to prove to the others that if they could take it . . . he could easily take twice of the same.

There was one Sarge, who in the boys' slightly biased opinion, seemed to be doing his best to fight the entire war all by himself . . . on this side.

Johnny, Buddy, Archie and the rest pulled into the town nearest the Base on a troop train around two in the morning, then climbed sleepily into the bus that was to take them out to the Field.

Reveille came with a roar at five a.m. Three hours sleep. And there they were out on the field, pushing their abdomens up to the skies, when a non-com approached their squadron.

"Who's John Payne?" he asked, although he could see by looking around him that nobody else than John Payne was John Payne.

"I am," admitted Johnny wearily.

"Come with me," said the other.

Johnny got up on a truck with others who'd drawn fatigue detail, and soon found himself fighting a pick and shovel, banking down the Parade ground, gouging out of a substance they called clay.

They filled nine trucks that day. And Johnny was prouder than if he'd made a dozen perfect "takes."

Usually each barracks gets K.P. duty one day, than it makes the round until it revolves back to that barracks' turn again. For some reason which nobody, including Johnny, could figure out, he kept showing up regularly as a member of the kitchen staff. Getting up at 3:00 a.m. and working until 10:00 at night. He peeled so many potatoes he counted spuds at night instead of sheep. And today any casual mention of the word "potato" will net you a slightly psychopathic stare.

But the boys will tell you that by the time Private Payne left this Base all the fellows admitted he was a good gritty Joe.

Funny though, Johnny was commenting, about how you'll beef and yell bloody murder about some routine job, and then go out and darn near kill yourself just playing G.I. football with your own gang just for fun.

He gives a reverent look down in the direction of his knee-cap, which still wears

M.S. DAY IS SEPTEMBER 12

We're running on longer days and shorter newsprint quotas so make it a point to get to your newsdealer by September 12—later than that he'll be all out of our October all-out issue.

Any resemblance between G.I. football and the regular kind is purely an accident. They play with no pads on hard ground and kick everything but the ball. Clipping is possible from both front and back —usually at the same time.

This all happened after Privates Payne et al were shipped up to Yakima, Washington, where they got link and instrument training and blind flying.

G.I. football teams are divided into "A" and "B" flight teams. "A" flight being the one that flies in the mornings and takes ground school in the afternoons, and "B" vice-versa.

Sometimes they try to do everything on the ground in a football game that they do in the air. Often it doesn't work.

On this occasion Johnny was playing left half-back, using an old-fashioned high-low block when the clipping started.

"I made three touchdowns in that darn game," Johnny remembers. "We won."

His team may have won, but Johnny didn't. He broke the cartilage from under his knee cap and was hospitalized for ten days. Just long enough to get behind his own gang and be left behind when the rest of them took off for the next field.

Left behind to sweat it on out there alone until he too was able to ship out. In the opposite direction.

unholy night . . .

The night Johnny shipped out of Yakima for Carson City, Nevada, without any of his old gang is a night he'll always remember. Christmas Eve.

Christmas Eve on a jammed train. A little homesick, soloing it cross country to a new field and a strange bunch of new Joes.

Some cars were jammed with war wives and their six-weeks-old babies, hurrying to get to their husbands by Christmas Day.

The troop cars packed with boys going home on leave, rushing to spend Christmas with Mom. Boys were sleeping four-deep in the aisles of the train, and John Payne was snoozing in the aisles with them on the bottom of the stack. Thinking nothing of it because he knew that was nothing compared to what other guys over the world were going through.

But he'll always remember that Christmas Eve—the fourteen colored troops softly singing Christmas carols as the blacked-out troop train whistled its way mournfully across the country.

No Twentieth Century-Fox extravaganza, no Grable, no Carmen Miranda, no Technicolor. Just the harmonizing of some lonely colored troops singing of Bethlehem and hope to Johnny and the other boys lying there in the aisles of a train moving across the miles.

This is Private Payne's favorite memory. This, too, is his life now. Those boys are his buddies. The troop train his stage. Yep, this is G.I. Johnny's life.

He hadn't been in Carson City long before the WTS program was discontinued, and he was ordered here to Buckley Field, where he ran into all his old gang again.

And this is where you'll find them these evenings. Sitting at their table in the Service Club . . . reminiscing and dropping in

THE GUY NEXT DOOR

Murderer's Row on the New York Yankees, Dana might as well be Joe the Jerk from Albuquerque.

Down in Georgia, where Dana was on location making "Swamp Water," he roamed around every night with a local taxi-driver to pick up the Georgia cracker drawl he had to use in the picture. He was there a couple of months, but the cabbie never did catch on who his famous fare was. He thought Dana was a carpenter on the crew. And in a small Indiana town where Dana toured on a War Bond Rally, a local master-of-ceremonies introduced him like this:

"Now we've got an actor who says he has been in Hollywood pictures. I don't mean he's a has-been—he says he's still in 'em. I never heard of him, myself—but anyway—here's Dana Andrews."

Before the next rally, Dana took the local yokel emcee aside. "Look," he said, "as long as I'm here to sell War Bonds, why don't you introduce me as somebody special? Give me a little build-up whether you've heard of me or not!" The emcee said sure. And Dana told him some of the pictures he'd made. So the next time Dana came on, he gave him this send-off.

"Now folks, I want you to meet Dana Andrews, the Hollywood star. He played in 'The Ox Bow Incident' that ran here in town the other night. Personally, I didn't like the picture, but that doesn't mean Dana Andrews isn't any good. I can't remember which part he played anyway!"

Dana Andrews likes to tell stories like that on himself because he's got a funny-bone built for a moose, and he thinks it's a wonderful joke that a gent like himself could hang around Hollywood for seven or eight years, make sixteen pictures—a lot of them socko hits like "The Ox Bow Incident," "The North Star," "Up in Arms" and "The Purple Heart," operate under a double-deal contract for two of the mightiest producers in Hollywood, Sam Goldwyn and Darryl Zanuck, and still remain almost as unidentified out in the great wide world as the Unknown Soldier.

Of course, that sad situation is bound to be remedied sooner or later, and probably sooner. Because right now Dana is sprinting back and forth between "Wing and a Prayer" and "Laura," his first two super-special leads at Twentieth Century-Fox. And there's Goldwyn's "Those Endearing Young Charms" coming up. He's the Number One fair-haired boy in Zanuckland, and smart Samuel Goldwyn, his other boss, is not one to let a treasure like Dana hang around twiddling his thumbs.

solid hunk of humanity . . .

But even if Dan gets so grand and glamorous at long last that they have to escort him through the streets with an armed guard, I'll bet something important—like a War Bond—that he'll stay the same easy going, unaffected, down-to-earth regular guy he is today and always has been—and this through one of the toughest campaigns to make Hollywood yell "Uncle" on record.

Maybe the reason Dana never got the glamour treatment in Hollywood is because he looks like no popular portrait of a movie god—but like the guy next door or somebody's big brother. Not that Dana isn't several cuts above the average Joe in looks. He's plenty handsome in fact, with a strong, cleanly-chiseled face, thick, wavy brown hair and friendly brown muscles and about the most honest grin in Hollywood. He's the kind of guy you'd sure like to have around when the going got tough. But he's not a bit elegant—and whenever he tries to be—he flops like a fish out of water.

For instance, up until a few weeks ago Dana had only two suits to his name. He owned enough sports and lounging rags to keep the sun and rain out, but for show, the two ancient ready-made numbers were his Wardrobe—capitals and period. He hadn't had any use for fancy duds on the sets, because for the past five years, believe it or not, they've had Dana in some kind of costume or other every time he ran up against a camera. Fact is, in his past ten pictures, he's been in a uniform. Then along came "Laura," his big break, which called for a smooth, modern get-up.

In Hollywood, of course, gal stars get all the wardrobe breaks. Studios hire the greatest designers in the world to dream up creations for the movie queens, and it's all on the house. But mere males have to pony up with their own clothes—a "suitable wardrobe" as contracts call it.

tailor-mad . . .

So Dana decided it was about time for him to get his shape draped in Park Avenue style. He went by himself to a tailor's, picked out swatches of fancy English woolens and ordered a half-dozen suits. He was pretty proud of himself when he showed up for the wardrobe tests—until he saw the dismayed frowns on everybody's faces. They hated to tell him, they said—but those suits! They just wouldn't do. In fact, they were terrible! Whoever picked them out—whoever in the world tailored them! Dana didn't dare say they were his idea of sartorial splendor. He just junked the whole lot in the dark recesses of his closet. Then he ordered a couple approved by the studio wardrobe expert. Now Dana has a dozen suits in all—and it will take him twenty years to wear them out, if he ever does.

Dana Andrews has stepped out to Hollywood's glitter gulches exactly four times in the past two years. On one of them, a visiting Elk friend, who wanted to see the movie stars dining and wining, practically forced Dana into Romanoff's for dinner. That time, Dana managed to forget his wallet so that his guest had to pay the check. Another time he took in a night spot where, by some rare freak of fate, the headwaiter actually recognized Dana.

A mob of people were standing in line for tables, but the waiter bowed to Dana and his party, winked and said, "Your table is waiting Mr. Andrews." Since Dana had no table reservations, he knew he was getting the Hollywood treatment, and it made him so mad he walked out of the place!

I don't know of a star in Hollywood who is more fiercely resolved to be human though a screen star, than Dana Andrews. "Just because I have a job that ballyhoos me is no reason I'm superior to anyone else!" he growls—and he's a good-natured guy, too—"I don't understand it and I don't like it!" He has a complex that way, and I suspect the reason is that Dana has never looked on Hollywood or the acting racket as anything out of this world by even a few feet. He hitch-hiked to Hollywood in quest of a career, and he slaved and starved for a half dozen years before he ever got his number tens inside a studio gate. He pumped gas, picked figs, hoisted pipe, herded a bus, dug ditches, shoveled cement, slept in attic rooms and felt the chilly California winter fogs through the seat of his pants—all the things a movie-struck guy crashing Hollywood does—only Dana was never movie struck in the ga-ga way. Not from the moment he made up his mind to be a Hollywood actor as a youngster back in Texas, did he harbor any phony illusions about himself or the thing he wanted to do. And now that he's clicked at long last, there's nary a delusion of grandeur hanging around—maybe because of what he's been through—and maybe because Dana Andrews is the kind of right guy that he is.

It was back in his home town of Huntsville, Texas, around 1929 that Carver Dana Andrews had the time and opportunity to bend a keen and critical eye on movie actors and uncover their tricks. He was just about winding up high school then, and he had a part-time job at the only movie palace in Huntsville, a house that got caught short when talkies came in and couldn't afford the expensive doo-dads to show the new talkie-single pictures the public was yapping for. They did the next best thing, which was run phonograph records on the side to hop up the silents. It was Dana's job to key the records to the thrillers. That meant he had to sit through every performance of every show and be quick on his needle and platter work.

Well, Dana noticed that the first time he saw the movies, all the actors seemed to emote and stride around like gods and goddesses strictly from Olympus. The next time—not so dazzling. After about ten or twelve performances of the same epic, the Hollywood boys and girls had no secrets or tricks from Dana Andrews. "Nuts," he told himself, "that acting stuff is easy as rolling off an easy chair. I can do that, and I think I will." From that minute on he was never troubled with stars in his eyes—just a goal.

FROM LANA WITH LOVE

Or Humphrey or Roddy or Myrna. You'll get your personal autograph and a heap big swell feeling at the same time. See our NAA plan on page 94.

Dana belonged to a family where you had to scramble for what you got, and where democracy and equality were taken for granted. His mother had thirteen children with eight of them still living. His dad, the Reverend Charles Forrest Andrews, was a Baptist minister, so what the Andrew kids got was not pampering—a preacher with thirteen kids doesn't have enough money for that—but character. He lived all around, from his birthplace in Collins, Mississippi; to Louisville, Kentucky; San Antonio, Uvalde and finally Huntsville, Texas. Dana had to crack a new gang of neighborhood kids periodically, and even in his own family he couldn't get by with any tricks. His dad was a strict disciplinarian, and stood for no monkey business.

the nose knows . . .

Once Dana got irked at one of his brothers, picked up an iron pipe and lammed him over the head, knocking him cold. When he recovered, the Reverend Andrews took the wounded son aside.

"How do you feel?" he asked. "Think you can take care of this situation with Dana yourself?"

"Sure," said the brother.

"All right," promised the Reverend. "Let's go in and find him. I'll be the referee."

He lined them up outside, they squared off and—Bam!—Dana's bud landed a haymaker on his nose, and the fight was over pronto with justice done. Dana still has a little off-line spot on his beak where

We've got a war to win on the home front, too!

Sit down for a minute and think things over. Why are most people making more money today? It's because of the SAME cussed war that's killing and maiming some of the finest young folks this country ever produced.

So if anyone uses his extra money to buy things he's in no particular need of . . . if he bids against his neighbor for stuff that's hard to get and pushes prices up . . . well, sir, he's a WAR PROFITEER. That's an ugly name—but there's just no other name for it.

the blow busted it—but he considers that minor scar well worth what the episode taught him.

Dana was third from the oldest in a string of six Andrews brothers. He followed right along in his big brothers' tracks through high school and Sam Houston College in Huntsville and, being smart and athletic, had an easy time of it. But Dana was different underneath. He wasn't as book smart as some of his brothers (one is principal of The Junior College in Long Beach today). But in other ways, Dana was even sharper. People thought he was nutty as a hickory tree. Like the time when he saved up his money and then tossed it away in a wild fling. Once, after scraping together several hundred bucks in odd jobs around his home town, Dana decided he wanted to see New York. His total stake amounted to about five hundred bucks, the result of months and months of work. But he took the whole wad and blew it in doing the town up right—then came back home broke but happy.

People in Texas couldn't understand shenanigans like that. And when after college Dana landed himself a good, solid job as accountant for a big oil company in Austin, made good and was all set for a promotion with a future—what did the crazy loon do but quit cold and thumb his way out to Hollywood to be a movie actor!

Of course, they've dragged out the bunting and the brass band a time or two since those times when Dana came back home to see his folks, but they still think he's a little touched. So, maybe, did Dana, after he got to Hollywood and discovered that his sitting in the Huntsville movie house and kibitzing flicker stars was no free pass to a studio.

After he learned the score, it was a question then of keeping alive, and Dana was faced with earning his beans without any help from home. He landed a job driving a school bus in Van Nuys, which started him out in the San Fernando Valley that Bing Crosby croons about, and he's still there, although his lovely home in Sherman Oaks is not exactly like the dinky room he rented for four bucks a week in those days. Dana never got a glance at a studio—not even extra work—until he landed a lucky job in a Valley Super-Service station pumping gas and keeping books. And if he hadn't developed the very bad habit of singing while he punched the adding machine, he might still be a bookkeeping greaseball, although I doubt it.

Anyway, what happened to Dana from then on is a Hollywood classic, one of those impossible once-in-a-million freaks of fate, even more screwy than Lan Turner's being yanked off a drug store fountain stool to stardom. Dana was warbling away one day when a customer cocked an ear. This customer was a natural born promoter and he had been reading in the papers about a singer named Bing Crosby who was signing million-dollar contracts right and left.

He peeked inside the station, got a load of dashing Dana with his jaunty service station cap and birthed a brilliant idea. Why not make this handsome gas station thrush into another Crosby? When he discovered that Dana's ambition in life was to crash the movies, the gentleman Good Fairy was sure he'd stumbled onto a good thing.

"Maybe we can work out a deal," he said. Dana was willing. So, cutting in a couple of his cronies, he drew up a contract. They'd finance Dana's singing lessons and living expenses for three years, struck it rich in the movies he'd pay back twenty-four percent of his fabulous earnings for five years. Oddly enough, too, that deal went through as written, from both sides. Dana cashed fifty dollars each week, and when he did finally hit the jackpot, he paid off. Only last month he wound up the payments and tore up the mortgage on himself. He was just in time, too. Right after he was paid off in full, one of the Good Fairy partners died.

Of course, it was as no Bing Crosby that Dana Andrews finally made good. He boasted no wart on his larynx like the Old Groaner. But he took his lessons dutifully and doubled up by enrolling at the Pasadena Community Playhouse, the famous cradle for Hollywood stars. By this time Dana had taken a wife, the Van Nuys girl by the way, who'd steered him on to his service station job. But not long after she'd presented Dana with his son, David, she died tragically from pneumonia.

That left Dana with a complicated existence, which for a while made him feel like a six-day bicycle rider. Every day he had singing lessons in Los Angeles, acting lessons in Pasadena and paternal chores in Van Nuys—a 50 mile circuit. Fortunately, his late wife's folks helped out with the baby. His bass-baritone voice was okay, but nothing like Crosby's. Dana soon found himself concentrating on his acting lessons.

The Pasadena Community Playhouse has turned out scads of actors for Hollywood. But there was never a bigger crop getting ready for the big league than when Dana broke into the charmed circle. Victor Mature, Laird Cregar, Bob Preston, Gig Young, Eddie Buchanan, Louise Albritton and John Carradine were just a few of the now famous hopefuls scrapping for breaks where Hollywood agents always are on the prowl would see and crown them with a contract.

maybe he shoulda stood in texas . . .

That was plenty fast company for a gas pump jerk to tangle with. But Dana Andrews, oddly enough, was one of the first of the lot to be crowned with a Hollywood contract, although not the first, by a long shot, to flirt with fame. A Hollywood agent caught him in "Oh Evening Star," hauled him over to Sam Goldwyn's and got him all signed up in twenty minutes flat. But Dana's first battle with the footlights at the Playhouse made him think maybe he should have stood in Texas. He'll never forget that one.

They put him in Shakespeare, of all things, in the opening scene of "Cymbelline," and when the curtain went up, Dana was supposed to be already onstage. All the dialogue that starts the play moving was about this character Dana was playing. But somehow, right before the play started, he got lost in the mazes of the Playhouse and couldn't find his way backstage. So the curtain went up without him, and all the rest of the actors stumbled around ad libbing lines because the ones Will Shakespeare wrote didn't make sense with Dana on the absent list. The audience never did know what was going on. And somehow the faculty didn't give Dana the old heave-ho. He kept right on acting there even after his Goldwyn contract.

Something else happened there that finally won Dana Andrews another kind of contract—the marriage kind. He met a tall, attractive student actress named Mary Todd, and a backstage romance blossomed into very serious intentions. Dana finally married the gal, but he had himself quite a time making the grade.

Mary and Dana got warm on this love stuff when he was making his first movie, "The Westerner," with Gary Cooper. He didn't have much to do in that besides

Without Painful Backache

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

naturally he took it pretty seriously. When the casting director told him to let his hair and beard grow, Dana, who has plenty of both, looked like a Canadian beaver with his winter coat. Right about then Mary decided to say "Yes," and invited Dana to meet her old friends at a party. She didn't tell the family chums Dana was a struggling movie actor, so when he showed up with his wavy locks dusting his collar and whiskers sprouting from all angles, some of them fled in fright, and the others wondered if Mary had lost her girlish mind. The tag to that story is that when Dana at last went on location with "The Westerner," the director took one look at the mob of rugged beavers standing around and cried, "There's too darned many beards in this picture. Andrews," he ordered, "shave yours off!"

wearing down goldwyn . . .

Another locksmith for love to laugh at with Mary and Dana was Sam Goldwyn's hopes of building Dana up as a romantic threat. That meant no marriage. Sam, however, didn't reckon on that stubborn Andrews plain-Joe personality I've been talking about. When Dana tackled him about mating up, Sam asked him to wait until he'd whizzed around Hollywood with a few glamour girls and got himself gossiped to greatness in the columns. Weeks went by and months, with Dana pestering Sam to sanction the wedding, and Sam pestering Dana to get out and around and get himself a little glamour.

BUY YOUR SHARE IN THE WORLD

It's preferred stock and the dividends are a baby's smile, a bone-tired sailor's "Thank you." The how's and what's are on page 94.

Finally, one day Sam met his protégé on the lot.

"Mr. Goldwyn," Dana began as usual, "are you going up to your office? I want to beard the lion in his den!"

"Beard me now," said Sam. "What is it—that girl you want to marry?"

"Why, yes, I thought—"

"Oh, go ahead," sighed Goldwyn. "You're no good for glamour anyway. You might as well be married."

Dana could have told him that in the first place.

Mary and Dana Andrews live in a modern-colonial house on a tidy dead-end street in Sherman Oaks that's already too small although they just built it a couple of years ago. You see, they'd been married almost three years, and it looked like there wasn't going to be any more to the Andrews family than Dana, Mary and young David. So they built the house, and the minute it was finished, the stork started flapping his wings around the place. Daughter Cathy arrived soon after. No nursery, of course, what with a war on and no building allowed. That's the way things usually work out with the Andrews'—never a dull moment—but they take life in stride and are perfectly relaxed about everything. So, of course, they're happy as larks.

Being an actress herself (although she thinks being a wife and mother is her top-priority job now), Mary is a perfect mate for Dana. Besides having a non-participating actress-wife's slant on a movie star husband's temperament, Dana thinks she's the best critic he's ever run up against. Mary's also the perfect partner to talk over a new part. But they seldom do any rehearsing around the house.

"I'm sorry I invented the pocket!"

IF I HAD KNOWN that some Americans would be using pockets to hold all the extra money they're making these days I never would have invented them.

POCKETS ARE GOOD places to keep hands warm.

Pockets are good places to hold keys . . . and loose change for carfare and newspapers.

But pockets are no place for any kind of money except actual expense money these days.

The place—the only place—for money above living expenses is in War Bonds.

Bonds buy security for your old age.

Bonds buy bullets for soldiers.

Bonds buy education for your kids.

Bonds buy things you'll need later —that you can't buy now.

Bonds buy peace of mind—knowing that your money is in the fight.

Reach into the pocket I invented. Take out all that extra cash. Invest it in interest-bearing War Bonds.

You'll make me very happy if you do.

You'll be happy too.

Dana happens to have one of those photographic memories that can learn a complete script after a couple of glances.

When he was shooting "The Purple Heart," Sam Levene was having double trouble with a particular speech, a long one, that strung itself out over a couple of days' shooting. Dana started kidding Sam about it, and as Levene takes his art pretty seriously, he got sore.

"Okay," he barked, "how would you like to learn it?"

"A cinch," scoffed Dana. "I could do it in five minutes."

That made Sam hop. "Fifty bucks you can't," he challenged. So they clocked him and Dana strolled outside. In five minutes he was back, to spout off the long, tricky dialogue without one fluff. Sam Levene simply didn't believe that, even when he heard it. He paid off, but for a long time he thought he'd been the sucker for a framed up gag and that Dana had spent all the night before learning his lines.

Maybe it's because Dana is just as easy and relaxed on a set as he is lounging around in his den, which is plenty relaxed. He can actually snooze right in front of a camera, and has. For instance, the morning after Baby Cathy arrived, Dana was knocked out from pacing the floor at the hospital. He dragged into the studio about noon and found the director waiting for him with a scene where Dana was supposed to be asleep on the ground as a posse surprises him, or something. Anyway, the cameraman marked off the spot where he was to feign sleep, and Dana plopped down. He went right off to dreamland, they burned lights on him and filmed takes all afternoon. He never woke up until five o'clock in the afternoon when it was time to go!

"The most realistic performance I've ever seen," chuckled his director. "Especially the sound effects."

on the domestic front . . .

Around the house Dana is a pretty ideal husband and father, except for a tendency to stay up all hours of the night. He got in the night reading habit years ago when he had plenty of time but no money. Dana doesn't mind making with the night life—if it's in his own home. He has a cozy little den and bar that's usually the center of things when his pals—most of them old friends from the Pasadena Playhouse days or members of the present group of acting laboratory addicts Dana belongs to—Eighteen Actors, Inc.—show up. Victor Jory, Moroni Oleson, Dorothy Adams, Morris Ankrum, Bob Preston and Victor Mature (before they went away to war) were regulars. They'd usually play parlor games or just sit and talk. Sometimes Dana actually shows up at a cocktail party, but not often. His wife, Mary, is just as happy to be home, too, what with the "sitter" problem what it is now. The day I visited Dana and Mary, they were due at a smart Hollywood social routine, but as the afternoon wore on Dana said to Mary, "What do you say we skip it?"

"Yes," said Mary as if she'd been expecting that, "lets." That usually happens.

Don't get the idea Dana's a lazybones or a dunderhead, 'cause when he does go out, he admits his wife has to hire a team of mules to drag him home. On that bond-selling tour I mentioned, Dana once got a balled-up billing as a comedian and found out about it fifteen minutes before he was to face the mob, a big one of about ten thousand. Panicked, he asked Charlie Ruggles, who was along, what in the world a comedian did. "It's easy," cracked Charlie, "tell jokes."

"What jokes?" Dana wanted to know.

"Oh, I'll tell you some," said Charlie. Whereupon he rattled off a sackful.

So Dana went on and told the second-hand jokes, and they rolled in the aisle. Finally they had to drag the guy off the platform he liked it so much. And when Charlie Ruggles followed him—Charlie, the authentic comic who had started Dana off—the people were all laughed out and never gave him a tumble!

And about this industry business: Dana's pretty handy around the house, especially in the garden, where he grew prize camellias before he got so busy he had to garden by flashlight. He makes kites and toys for all the neighborhood kids. He hates money matters, gets along with fifteen bucks a week in his pocket, has a weakness for buying loud Argyle plaid socks and then never wearing them, hates to shave and is nutty about dogs, although not the fancy, pedigreed kind. The Andrews family pooch, Michael, is a cocker of undetermined lineage.

Above all, Dana's a confessed family man. He'd like two or three more kids at least. With cooks and maids as scarce as old Bourbon, he still pitches in to help Mary in those departments. He warbles at his work—about the only time these days that Dana sings, after all those lessons. He hasn't any ambitions in that direction any more. What Dana wants to do with himself (he's 35) is simple, and he expresses it pronto when you ask him.

"I want to be an actor other actors respect," he says, "and I want to raise my family right. That's all."

Dana's dedication to family life springs from his worship of his own father, whom he calls "the best friend I ever had" and who died when Dana was just getting started in Hollywood. That's always been one of his big regrets, and maybe that's why he concentrates with unusual energy on being a good father himself, especially with his son David, whose own mother died so young.

David is a pretty good testimonial to Dana's paternal success. He's ten now, a sturdy little gent and smart as a whip. He was a good four years younger, of course, when Dana and Mary were married, but when the ceremony was over, David walked gravely up to the officiating minister and shook his hand.

"I want to thank you, Sir," he said, "for what you've done for my Mother and Dad." Just like that. David sometimes makes them blush when he casually mentions something that happened "before my mother and dad were married." It sounds funny, but it proves that as a stepmother Mary has been a big success.

David takes all Dana's movie roles straight—so much so that he can't sit through any where his old man gets it in the neck. He walked off of "Swamp Water" when Walter Huston bawled the blazes out of Dana, and he couldn't take what happened to his dad in "The Ox Bow Incident," either. He was all puffed around the neighborhood, though, when his pop played a real hero for Uncle Sam in "The Purple Heart." For a while Dana was certain that whether the rest of the fickle, forgetful world knew him from Adam or not, he'd always be the Favorite Movie Star of at least one fan—his son.

Then one night he made the mistake of taking David to a neighborhood movie playing some slightly out-of-date thrillers. One was "Crash Dive," the last picture Tyrone Power made before joining the Marines . . . Dana had a small part in it, and he thought David would like that.

So coming out, he casually asked him how he liked it. David seemed torn by some kind of violent emotions. But finally he spoke right out. "Well, Dad," he said, "you were pretty good and all. But that Tyrone Power—wow! What a man!"

I guess all Dana Andrews can do about this glamour-hero stuff is keep hoping.

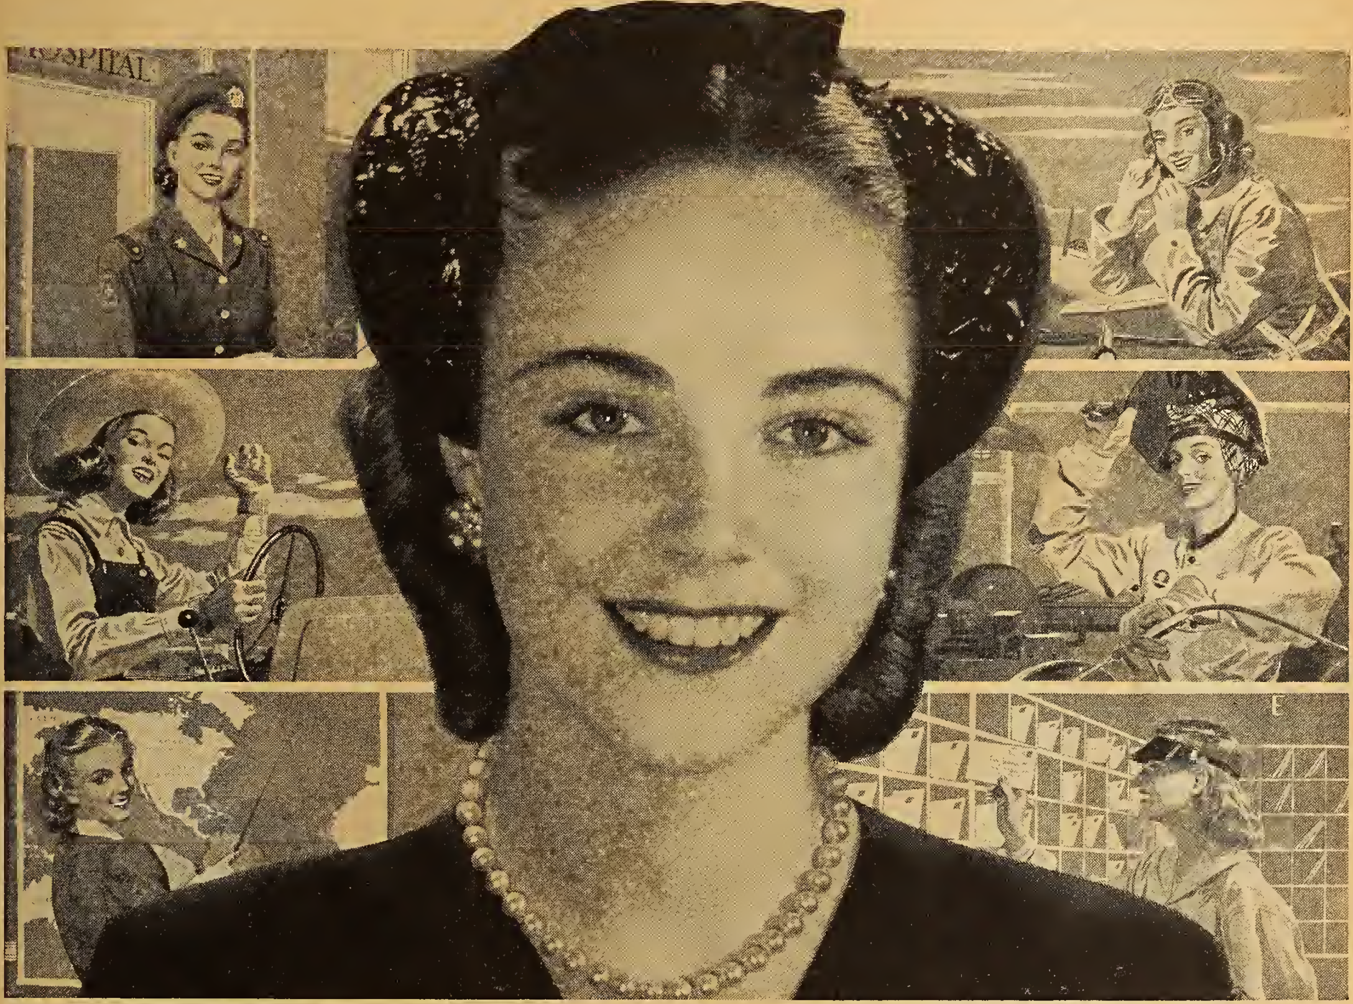
After Hours—

hearts are drawn to a bright, sparkling smile!



Smiles are brighter when gums are healthier. Guard against "pink tooth brush"... use Ipana and massage.

YOU'LL celebrate Victory with a clear conscience. Because you're working hard toward it now. Good girl. After hours, you rate the best in fun and romance!

So powder your nose—and smile. Go out and have FUN! That smile, now—how'd it look in the mirror? Did it sparkle? Was it bright and captivating?

That's the kind of smile that turns heads and hearts! If you'll notice, most popular girls aren't beautiful at all. But they all have a beautiful smile!

So see to it that your smile is at its radiant best. Remember, a sparkling smile depends so much on firm, healthy gums.

Never ignore "pink tooth brush"!

If you see a tinge of "pink" on your tooth brush—see your dentist! He may say your gums are tender because soft foods have robbed them of exercise. And, like many dentists, he may suggest "the helpful stimulation of Ipana and massage."

For Ipana is designed not only to clean teeth but, with massage, to aid the gums. Let Ipana and massage help keep your gums firmer, your smile more sparkling.

Your Country needs you in a vital job!

A million women are needed to serve on the home front—to carry on the tasks of men gone to war—to release more men for wartime duties.

Jobs of every kind—in offices, stores and schools—as well as in defense plants—are war jobs now. What can you do? More than you think!

We bow, we blush, we thank you, kind motion picture showmen. The best way to show our gratitude is to continue to deliver satisfying hits as in the past.

Two great films await your attentive eyes and ears—"An American Romance" and "Mrs. Parkington".

★ ★ ★ ★

Of "An American Romance", King Vidor's great epic of our soil, you have heard great praise. Watch for it while we pause to impress you with a current triumph.

★ ★ ★ ★

"Mrs. Parkington".

★ ★ ★ ★

Or, rather, Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon in "Mrs. Parkington".

★ ★ ★ ★

This excellent film is a superb adaptation of Louis Bromfield's best-selling novel and gives that talented pair a vehicle that is more than a vehicle.

★ ★ ★ ★

Many of our screen artists have looks, many can act, many have personality. Greer Garson is a triple threat. And "Mrs. P." gives her the chance to prove it again.

★ ★ ★ ★

Her deft transition from the naive daughter of a mining-camp boarding-house proprietor to a dynamic cosmopolite is one for the book. Or better still, one for the screen.

★ ★ ★ ★

Greer's "Susie" finds an excellent dovetail in the "Major Augustus Parkington" as played by Walter Pidgeon. Ruthless, dashing and with a roving-eye.

★ ★ ★ ★

The dream-like cast includes such stars as Edward Arnold, Agnes Moorehead, Gladys Cooper, Frances Rafferty, Tom Drake, Selena Royle.

★ ★ ★ ★

Tay Garnett, director of "Bataan", has also performed brilliantly — with the megaphone.

We suggest you park yourself in a seat at "Mrs. Parkington".

SELECTS "SINCE YOU WENT AWAY"

■ "Since You Went Away" takes life in its own hands and does quite well with it.

It also takes its own life in its hands, and by being too diffuse, lengthy and emotionally extravagant, does not so well with it.

Inherently, the theme is a natural. The ingredients are there. The pastry cook who goes into the kitchen and finds spread out before her all the rich materials necessary, cannot fail except by making too rich a cake.

And "Since You Went Away" is too rich. Two thirds through, the average spectator is not only going to open his belt, he is going to experience slight qualms of digestive unease.

Mr. Selznick, without having so intended, may find himself (Continued on page 8)

the progenitor of a revolt against the industry and self-hypnotized, the bit between his teeth as author, producer and reluctant wielder of the scissors, he is running riot. Resultantly, our era, which takes its boullion in cubes, its reading predigested, and abbreviates expenditures of time in every possible manner, is about to stage a revolt. The public has a pain in the neck.

Down with over-long, over-stuffed motion pictures!

"Since You Went Away" is both. One hour shorter, one hour less of emotional redundancy, and this picture would have come closer to what must have been Mr. Selznick's good dream of a cavalcade Americana.

Inherently, it is that. Imbedded in its themes, are concerns that lie close and contemporaneous to practically every American heart. The story rings a bell within our national soul.

Occasionally, aside from the crippling effect of its enormous footage, the rouged kiss of Hollywood descends upon the story. "Since You Went Away" concerns itself with an allegedly middle-class, average American family, but Hollywood insists upon putting them into too fine a house for their means and insists that they deport themselves à la the country club set.

The picture glitters with stars, some of whom are in strange firmament, indeed. Mme. Nazimova and Lionel Barrymore are dragged in by their talented heels for this American epic. And once again Mr. Monty Woolley's highly personalized vindictiveness, vituperativeness and venom are in high fettle. Claudette Colbert is sweetness, forbearance and light; Shirley Temple, charmingly Shirley Temple plus ten years; and that thar Jennifer Jones gal has what it takes.

Ladies from coast to coast, and their men, too, are going to weep. And honorable tears they will be. Wrung legitimately from hearts that alas, will be sore and troubled with some of the anguishes this picture brings home to them. The tears will be copious and too deep and too quiet to show, for every woman can know within her the loneliness of a house empty of a husband, every girl the tragedy of a lover lost, every man the ache of being separated from his loved ones.

To treat so honorable an effort lightly would be to ignore dignity of concept and production. In spite of its ponderous, overweight body, "Since You Went Away" succeeds in being more than half as good as it could have been.

Synopsis

For all its length and production grandeur, "Since You Went Away" is a simple story about simple people, caught in a frustrating, complex age. It tells of the efforts of Anne Hilton to get along, both financially and emotionally, when her husband, Timothy, enlists. Lonely and worried about the effects of a woman-dominated home on her two daughters, Jane and Brig, she decides to accept crusty, irascible old Col. Smollett as a boarder. The Colonel, it would seem, has a grandson. Jane, it would seem, is quite ready to rebound at any suitable young man. Preferably a corporal. So she does—violently. And quite a rebound it is, too. For Jane has been calf-eyeing dashing Lieut. Willett, a hopeless, helpless and very-much-in-love old admirer of Mother, who, while enjoying his banter and the nice feeling of feminine security it gives her to have him dogging around, is very strong and unshakable in her devotion to her Tim.

And then quickly, terrifyingly, the Hilton world spins, whirls and cascades heartache about. A telegram arrives. "State Department . . . Timothy Hilton . . . inform . . . missing in action . . ." But these are Americans, so they weep their weep, then straighten up and hope. Until the other telegram. And this time it's not "missing in action"—it's "killed in the line of duty." And it's young Bill who is dead, and it's young Jane who must break her heart. And she does. But out of the weakness comes strength, and she becomes a Nurse's Aide in the psychiatric clinic of old Dr. Golden, dedicating herself to helping other Bills return to other Janes.

And so it goes. Nothing resolved, nothing solved. Mother takes a job welding, the crotchety Colonel rediscovers the purge of laughter, Brig goes about the difficult job of casting off the chrysalis of childhood for maturity, and the days fly past and the nights linger on. And again a third telegram. Tim is safe. Tim will be home. So much has happened, oh, how we've missed you, since you went away. . . . U. A.

MODERN SCREEN QUIZ

You've done it before, and you can do it again—meaning this quiz, you ickies! And a fine job, too, judging from some of your comments. So here goes. It's awfully simple, really. We've given you 3 sets of 20 clues each. First go over the first batch and see if you can identify the movie personage referred to, and for each one you guess, give yourself 5 points. Then go on to the next group to catch up on the ones you've missed, and score yourself 4 points for your answers there. Now, if you're still shy a few names, on you go to Set 3, getting 3 points on those answers. Catch? And incidentally, if you put down an answer which you find on a later set of clues to be incorrect, it's perfectly o. k. to change, scoring yourself the number of points due on the particular set where you discover your error. Thus, if you put John Carradine as your answer on Set 1, and find in Set 3 that it should be Hedy Lamarr, give yourself 3 points for Hedy and forget about Johnny. We think maybe 80 should be par for you well-informed readers, you. And 75 isn't too bad, but lower . . . Why, shame!

AMERICAN ROMANCE

Do you believe in America? Of course you do, in a take-it-for-granted sort of way. But would you walk from New York City to Minnesota to prove your belief? That's what Steve Dangos, Czech immigrant, does in M-G-M's powerful Technicolor drama. Brian Donlevy plays Steve with all the dynamic vitality that the part demands. This is an imagination-stirring picture of America, land of opportunity. I know you'll like it.

Steve lands at Ellis Island in 1893 with four dollars in his pocket. Ordinarily, the authorities demand that you have $25 for admittance, but they are impressed by Steve's faith in this new land. They let him in. Steve hikes all the way to Minnesota where his cousin Anton will get him a job as a miner. On the way he learns some broken English, is more convinced than ever that America is the country for him. He goes to work in the mine, but unlike most of the other miners, he has an intense curiosity about all its workings. "Where does the ore go from here?" he demands. "Chicago, me lad," an Irishman tells him. "Chee-car-go. Yah. I will go there some day," says Steve seriously.

And go he does, leaving pretty Annie O'Rourke (Ann Richards) to follow later and become Mrs. Steve Dangos. By then Steve is foreman in a steel mill. He is making enough to rent a tiny cottage. Enough so that the five children who arrive in rapid succession can go to school and pursue the careers they want.

Ambition drives Steve constantly, but he remains devoted to his family. It is a sad day when his oldest son is killed in World War I. But Steve squares his broad shoulders, and in memory of George, studies harder to become an American citizen.

The day of the automobile has arrived, and Steve does some complicated experimenting in that direction with the help of Howard Clinton (Walter Abel). Together they evolve a car with a steel safety roof and a new body design. Soon they have their own company. Things have happened to the children, too. Abe has become a violinist as his father wished—but his act is a comic one, in vaudeville. Still, he's a success. Teddy—well, Teddy is a problem to Steve. He is on the side of the factory workers in the strike against his father. It takes Pearl Harbor to show Steve that his son may be right after all.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Brian Donlevy graciously offered to buy a small fire truck for the local Women's Defense Organization. Ladies were overjoyed—couldn't wait to try it out. Since no hydrant was available to them, they hooked the thing up to the Donlevy swimming pool—drained it completely dry . . . Brian, who loves to make like a painter, carpenter or plumber on his days off, spent time between scenes building and painting

Ann . . . Residents of Pomona, California, slowed down to a stop when they saw motorcycle officers stopping age-old relics for speeding at a reckless 20 miles per. Didn't know these were rebuilt replicas of the first automobiles built in this country, and that they were props being used for "American Romance" . . . Captain of these motorcyclemen, incidentally, turned out to be Captain V. M. Moffett, a World War I buddy of Brian's. Twenty-four years ago they had lain side by side in a French hospital—neither of them expected to live. Hadn't seen each other since then until they met quite accidentally in Pomona . . . Ann Richards spent her first birthday away from her family. Mrs. Richards is still in Australia, and Ann's brother is prisoner in a Jap concentration camp. Day before her birthday, Ann received a cake, baked by mama and shipped all the way across the Pacific . . . Another birthday celebrant was little Jackie Jenkins, who was six and thrilled at the thought of entering the Santa Monica Grammar school where his big brother is enrolled. Breathless moment occurred when King Vidor, returning to the set from lunch, found Jackie about to jump from a twelve-foot platform. He shouted a warning, but Jackie assured him it was all right. "I know how Superman does it, Mr. Vidor!" Mr. V. finally convinced him that Superman had powers far beyond those of Master Jenkins.

JANIE

Joyce Reynolds is a cute little chick who represents Warner Brothers' white hope for teen-age pictures. She gets off to a flying start in "Janie," as a sixteen-year-old heartbreaker. Clare Foley, who plays her kid sister, Elsbeth, provides most of the laughs. Elsbeth is terrific as a gag-puller, but if you had to live in the house with her, you'd probably commit murder. Someone asks her, "Why don't you run along and play with your little friends, Elsbeth?" "I have no friends," retorts the enfant terrible. "I'm anti-social." And she's not kidding.

Janie has trouble enough with her parents, without having to cope with Elsbeth, too. You know parents. They're those people that always want to know where you're going or have to use the phone just as you're telling something terribly important to your best friend. Probably, Janie admits, hers are no worse than most. Except for that editorial Dad (Edward Arnold) wrote for the town paper about how you should keep your young daughter from going out with the soldiers at the camp nearby. It is a good thing Janie has a bachelor friend of Dad's (Robert Benchley) to help her out now and then.

Janie's current guy is a down-the-block product called "Scooper." Scooper is nice, but he's nobody's dream man, and when Janie meets a good-looking soldier in a custom-tailored uniform, the romance is over. The new heart is named Dick, he's a college man, and sometimes Janie has a feeling he's a little advanced for her experience. She promises to spend an eve-him, but maybe it's just as well some of the other girls turn up. Janie's family is out, and they decide to have a party. Scooper is the one who really turns the evening into bedlam incarnate. "If you like the Army so well, I'll get you a lot of them," he says nastily. And proceeds to call the camp and ask them to send over every man under 21 who isn't on duty.

The result is the kind of party you dream about—only some of the dreams are nightmares. It takes the police, the mayor, some MP's and a couple of colonels to break it up. For the laugh of the season, catch Dad's expression when he comes home and takes a look at the house. "Janie" is the kind of picture that chases your blues so far away they never come back.—War.

P. S.

Ninety-two teen-agers, employed as extras for this picture, almost took over the Warner Bros. Studio during the few weeks "Janie" was in production. The lot had the appearance of a college campus. For most of them it was the first glimpse inside a Hollywood studio, and they wanted to see it all . . . Commissary lights were burning till far into the night as buyers attempted to get enough milk to satisfy the mob . . . Dance director LeRoy Prinz worked for days trying to get the kids to rumba and conga without throwing in a bit of jitterbugging here and there . . . Prop department had its hands full when the gang decided to help "plant" the victory garden—180 square feet of artificial plants . . . French windows of the attractive home in which Joyce lives were smashed to bits when a jeep was driven through them. It was in the script, and the youngsters refused to allow the scene to be done in miniature . . . Director Curtiz handled them like a diplomat talking to representatives of another country. Displayed unusual patience and drew chuckles from the young players when he addressed them as "my kiddies." . . . Nine-year-old Clare Foley was brought to Hollywood from New York to play the part she did in the original stage production . . . Take an extra look at the photographer in the picture who covers the big party. He's really Peter Stackpole, Life photographer, playing himself in the film. Peter's just back from photographing the Yanks in Saipan . . . Because the war-time restrictions forbid traveling, the Connecticut village street was erected on Stage 22. More than 200 extras were used in shooting the scenes in the business section . . . Edward Arnold was writing letters during every spare moment. His son is a flight instructor for the Army, and his daughter is a student nurse.

DARK WATERS

Merle Oberon has a fascinating part to play in "Dark Waters." Leslie Calvin is a beautiful girl who has suffered a terrific emotional shock in the sudden loss of her mother and father. The ship on which they were coming to America was torpedoed, and Leslie was one of the few survivors. She is put in a New Orleans hospital but refuses to make any effort toward recovering a normal outlook.

At last the doctor persuades her to leave the hospital. She is to go and live with an aunt and uncle who have a sugar plantation not too far from New Orleans. Leslie wires them that she is coming and is surprised when no one meets her at the station. She waits in the afternoon sun and finally faints from the heat. The station master calls young Doctor Grover (Franchot Tone). Pardon me a minute—I feel a sunstroke coming on. I hope. Anyway, to get back to Leslie, Dr. Grover drives her out to her uncle's plantation, and on the way she tells him the story of her troubles. He is sympathetic and obviously attracted to Leslie. He says he'll try to help her.

The plantation is hauntingly beautiful, but it's a somber old place among the cypress trees and swamps of the sugar cane country. Aunt Emily (Fay Bainter) turns out to be a fluttering, ineffectual little woman. Uncle Norbert is absorbed in his books, completely unaware not only of his niece's problem but almost of her presence as well. The most important character in the house seems to be a large, elderly man named Sydney (Thomas Mitchell), who issues all the orders.

It gradually becomes apparent that something very mysterious indeed is going on at the plantation. Leslie's friendship with Dr. Grover is discouraged, and soon her mental condition becomes worse. Lights go on and off, and she hears a ghostly voice calling her name from the bayou. Only through the help of a Negro (Rex Ingram) does she learn that a deliberate attempt is being made to drive her out of her mind. When she gets Dr. Grover to help her, they both become prisoners. The picture ends dramatically in the macabre gloom of a Louisiana swamp. You'll shudder in your chair.

The role of Sydney is quite a departure for Thomas Mitchell. You will be interested to see what he does with it. Franchot, of course, makes a charming wolf, reformed by love.—U.A.

P. S.

Producer Ben Bogeaus, searching for a mystery dealing with malicious minds and murder, discovered "Dark Waters" while it was still in galley form . . . Later, when it came out in a national magazine in serial form, Publicity Man Jerry Dale arranged to have each of the four issues it ran sent each week to all Hollywood correspondents, neatest trick-of-the-month to capture their interest . . . Merle Oberon proved herself a rugged soul, earned the sobriquet "Iron Woman Oberon" because of the way she stood up under all the physical punishment during the swamp-water scenes . . . The bayou set took up three and a half solid acres, planted with 1500 water hyacinths, blue flags, special vines and Spanish moss. 500 trees were planted, included full-grown oaks, weeping willows . . . In spite of gloomy, depressing scenes and heavy tension induced by the mystifying atmosphere, cast and crew had a gay time. Workers dubbed it a "happy" picture, and all were sorry to see it end after ten weeks of shooting . . . Director Andre De Toth is one of the most camera-conscious megaphoners in the business. For one scene in Merle's bedroom, he placed the camera in the direct center of the room, had it make a complete 360 degree turn recording a period of twelve hours in the script. Four different mirrors, placed strategically in logical spots, recorded Merle's different expressions during the long scene . . . Another "longie" was a six-and-a-half-minute scene between Franchot Tone and Merle in which they perfectly completed seven pages of tricky dialogue . . . Definite surprise twist in the casting of the picture has some of the most prominent members playing roles against their usual type.

THE IMPATIENT YEARS

When you find a bright, funny comedy that has a lot of common sense back of it, you really have something. "The Impatient Years" is that kind of a picture, and it's definitely worth seeing. Jean Arthur and Charles Coburn—that tried and true combination—are at their best. So is Lee Bowman.

Andy (Lee Bowman), a staff sergeant somewhere in the South Pacific, always tells the guys he's from Sonora, California. Actually, he has never seen the place, but that's where his wife and son are, so he figures that's his town. He's never seen his baby son, either, and knew his wife only four days before they were married, and he left for overseas. But everything will work out fine when he gets back to Sonora.

Only it doesn't. The Janie (Jean Arthur) he finds when he gets home on furlough isn't a bit like the impulsive, delightful girl he picked up in a restaurant in San Francisco and married three days later. This Janie is formal, distant and very preoccupied with the care of their son and the household in general. She is, her father (Charles Coburn) admits, turning into an old maid, married or not. Andy is prepared to snap Janie out of this in a hurry with a little love-making, but there turns out to be another angle. The other angle is Henry (Phil Brown). Henry has boarded with the Smiths for a year now. He's walked the baby at night and changed its diapers and worried about it when it had the mumps. He is, he thinks, much more of a husband to Janie than Andy is.

Mr. Smith complicates matters by talking at the wrong time—with good intentions, to be sure—and Janie and Andy decide to get a divorce. But the judge refuses to give them one right off. He makes a condition. Janie and Andy are to go back to San Francisco where they met and live those first four days over again. They think it's ridiculous. They say they won't do it. But they do. It leads, as you can imagine, to a lot of complications. And the complications lead to laughs. So go and see it and have fun.—Col.

P. S.

Since Jean Arthur and Charles Coburn hit the jackpot for Columbia with "The More the Merrier," studio execs have been looking for another story for them. This is it . . . Seventy-year-old Charley Grapewin does the youngest type of role of his career as the superannuated bellhop—the result of the modern manpower shortage. Charley, who classifies his roles in two categories—with teeth and without teeth—removed his uppers and lowers, good-naturedly adding more contrast to his part . . . Jean, a great believer in music as an aid to creating mood, brought a stack of her own records to the studio. A man was assigned to play them outside her dressing room between scenes . . . When production was completed, Charles Coburn headed for New York to arrange for his return to the stage. Broadway playgoers will be seeing him next year in "Master of the Revels" . . . A large part of the background for the picture was actually shot in Sonora, Calif. The town has played host to movie companies for years—this is the first time it's been filmed under its own name . . . This picture raises Lee Bowman to his first star billing in a high-budget picture. It's only the beginning for Lee, who went immediately into another lead, opposite Rita Hayworth . . . The script of "The Impatient Years" was a one-woman job. The woman is Virginia Van Upp, who did all of the writing from the original idea to finished screenplay. As a reward, Virginia was boosted to the post of producer . . . Tiny Vic Beaver (the ten-months-old baby) went temperamental every time the cameras began to roll. Even new papas, Phil Brown and Lee Bowman, couldn't quiet him. Coburn discovered it was his monocle little Vic was crying for. Since Charles can't wear the thing in close-ups, he had to be photographed from his left side in all scenes with the baby—so the camera eye couldn't see the monocle but baby Vic could!

THE GREAT MOMENT

Suppose you had to have a leg amputated. And the surgeon said, "Give the patient a piece of wood to bite on—that helps a little." Then took a saw and started to go to work. You'd scream your head off, wouldn't you? You'd yell, "Where's the ether?" But can you tell the name of the man who made it possible for people to sleep through operations instead of suffering unbearable pain? Don't worry if you don't know the name. In 1855 the U. S. Senate was in the same predicament. Any number of claimants to the honor had appeared, and they weren't in the least sure which was the right one. While the Senate battled about it, Dr. William Morton sat in the gallery and remembered. . . .

Morton (Joel McCrea) was studying dentistry when he married the lovely Liz Whitman (Betty Field). Liz' father and mother were rather disturbed over her marrying a dentist. In those days a dentist went around the countryside extracting teeth while his wife beat on the dishpan to drown out the howls of the patient. Dr. Morton, however, had different ideas. He opened an office right in Boston, like a regular doctor's office. And always in the back of his mind was the idea that there must be some way to make dentistry painless.

Morton experimented for years. Experimented while the Morton roof leaked, the Morton cook left in disgust, and the Morton children went around with holes in their shoes. He tried everything from hypnotism to laughing gas—almost killing himself with the latter. People said he was crazy. Only Liz kept her faith in him. Then at last through a combination of stubborn perseverance and blind luck, Morton discovered that ether inhaled would put a man to sleep. A sound enough sleep so you could pull his tooth. Or maybe even cut his leg off. . . .

Dr. Morton gave medical science the use of his discovery. But at first he refused to give them the formula. After all, the roof did need mending, the children did need shoes. For his humble attempt to patent his formula, he was castigated in every newspaper in the country. As usual, only Liz believed in him.

The story of his long struggle is a good one for all of us who need a lesson in perseverance. It is told in a fascinating way with the help of a cast which includes Harry Carey, William Demarest, Franklin Pangborn and J. Farrell MacDonald.—Par.

P. S.

Folks at Paramount moaned and groaned when memos came around to their office asking for suggestions for titles of the newest Preston Sturges movie. "How," they wanted to know, "can you get 'love' or 'oomph' into the title of a picture that tells the story of the discovery of ether?" . . . After several tentative tags were considered then rejected, "The Great Moment" was chosen to show up on theater marquees . . . Script is adapted from Rene Fulop Miller's biographical novel, "Triumph Over Pain," originally owned by

SWEET AND LOW-DOWN

This is the story of a boy from the slums of Chicago who suddenly gets a chance to join Benny Goodman's band. A boy who goes too far too fast and then has to learn all over again the hard way. Benny himself and his band are in the picture, and there's plenty of mellow jive for all the gates.

The boy, Johnny Birch, is played by a newcomer who will definitely send you. Name—James Cardwell, and you'd better get your fan mail in ahead of the rush. Linda Darnell and Lynn Bari take care of the femme half of the platter, and Jack Oakie is in there solid with the laughs.

Johnny isn't exactly a square when he joins the band but neither is he hep to all the hot licks. Benny Goodman takes him on as a trombone player partly because he feels Johnny has talent and partly because he's an old Chicago boy himself from the same neighborhood. But Johnny has a chip on his shoulder from the beginning. He doesn't want advice from Benny, about music or anything else. The anything else being Pat (Lynn Bari), the girl singer with the band. Pat thinks Johnny is a comer, and she's always ready to hitch her wagon to a star, especially when the star's a handsome hunk of man. Popsy (Jack Oakie) tries to warn Johnny about that, but Johnny knows everything!

Then he meets Trudy (Linda Darnell), when he's playing with the band at a military school dance. Trudy, the aunt of one of the students, has dressed to look as young as possible at her nephew's request. She has succeeded so well that Johnny is shocked when she asks him for a cigarette, and gives her a stern lecture on how fifteen-year-olds should behave. Then he pats her patronizingly on the head and tells her to look him up in New York when she grows up. She does—the next week. Johnny falls in love then, head over heels. But that makes him more difficult than ever. He's determined now to become a super-success right away, for Trudy. It takes some very hard knocks to teach him that success isn't something you can reach out and grab, as it goes by.

Anyway, it all adds up to a good picture with a lot of music you'll really love.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Two hundred jive-happy hepcats, drafted from dance halls in and around Los Angeles for dancing scenes in this picture, couldn't believe their good fortune. "Imagine," said the bewildered kids, "dancing on a smooth, roomy floor every day, all day, to the music of Benny Goodman and getting paid for it!" . . . Benny (who calls swing "free speech in music") proves he's no stranger to the classics. With four fellow-jivesters interprets the Mozart Quintet which he once did with the Budapest String Quartet in New York's Town Hall . . . BG, hearing that Harvard University had set aside a fund of $250 a year for the purchase of swing classics, sent the college his entire collection—one of the most famous in the world . . . Gus Sweeney, 60-year-old doorman on the "Sweet and Lowdown" set, was called to see Mr. Goodman one morning. It was Sweeney's birthday. As he walked onto the stage, the Goodman band broke into "Happy Birthday to You," and the cast and crew joined in the chorus. There was an enormous birthday cake and a fine leather wallet from "the gang" . . . Gus left the set with tears in his eyes . . . Goodman went home for lunch every day to shoot movies of his nine-months-old daughter. Baby was just beginning to crawl, and Benny didn't want to miss getting pictures of her first steps . . . Lynn Bari was given a few days vacation in the middle of production to go to Texas to christen a new Flying Fortress, "The Lynn Bari" . . . One casualty while the picture was being filmed was Jack Oakie. Jack had a serious accident one noon, hit in the knee with a fast baseball while playing with the kids on the lot . . . Buddy Swan, juvenile lead in the picture, was given free clarinet lessons from "The King" himself. Benny heard Swan play the instrument—thinks he's terrific!

GYPSY WILDCAT

Forget the fat, bedraggled gypsies you've seen at county fairs. They bear no resemblance to the romantic, glamorous variety in this picture. The most glamorous of all, of course, is Carla (Maria Montez). One look at her, and the villagers stare bemused while the rest of the gypsy band sell them broken-down horses or pick their pockets.

The catch is that Carla isn't really a gypsy at all. She's the daughter of the Count Orso, who has recently been found in the forest with an arrow through his heart. No one knows Carla is his heiress except old Anubi (Leo Carrillo), who has no intention of telling. However, Rhoda (Gale Sondergaard) seems to have an inkling that something of the sort is true. Maybe, being a fortuneteller, she saw it in the cards.

The gypsies are suspected of killing the Count. Another likely suspect is Michael (Jon Hall), a handsome stranger, who keeps turning up at odd moments, usually when Carla is around. This infuriates young Tonio (Peter Coe), Anubi's son, who is planning to marry Carla. It's especially infuriating because Carla shows far more interest in Michael than she does in Tonio. Before long, Baron Tovar (Douglas Dumbrille) imprisons the gypsies in his dungeon on suspicion of murder. He then discovers that Carla is wearing a silver pendant which he recognizes as belonging to the Orso family. Obviously, Carla is the long-lost daughter of the Count, and the thing for the Baron to do is marry her immediately. That way he can get possession of the Orso lands and fortune, which he's had his eye on for some time.

Unfortunately, or fortunately, the Baron is not a very bright guy. He allows Michael to get into the castle through a water pipe from the moat. Michael confronts him and accuses him of having murdered Count Orso himself. Quite a melee ensues, with everyone getting hit over the head, and the gypsies escaping their guards. They all stream out of the castle in mad pursuit of the Baron, who has grabbed Carla and a Justice to perform the marriage ceremony and escaped in a carriage. The chase that follows is really quite a thing, and you'll have to see it for yourself.—Univ.

P. S.

Wardrobe department discarded all of Maria's flimsy sarongs and put her into seventeen petticoats for this one. However, in each of the wild gypsy dances performed by Miss Montez, her lovely legs are very much in evidence . . . The original song, "Gypsy Song of Freedom," was written by Edward Ward and producer George Waggner . . . The medieval castle in this film (the ancestral home of Baron Tovar) is an adaptation of the Tower of London set, a famous Universal Studio landmark. Prop department added a drawbridge, a moat and a bastion to the old site . . . During production, Jon Hall held up a few minutes shooting while he opened a package from Mrs. Hall (Frances Langford), who was overseas entertaining troops. Package contained two German revolvers for Jon to add to his extensive gun collection . . . Gale Sondergaard has one of her few sympathetic roles of her career. As a loving wife and mother she is instrumental in bringing Jon and Maria

Are You in the Know?

If you were this junior hostess, would you say—☐ "I hate games"
☐ "Let's join in"
☐ "I'd rather watch"

Everybody on the floor for a mixer! (Just when you're snaring that handsome Marine!) But a successful USO hostess forgets about herself—lets her guests have the fun. So you join in. At certain times, forgetting about yourself is easy when you trust your secret to Kotex. It's Kotex that has those patented ends—pressed flat—not thick, nor stubby. That's one important reason why Kotex is different from ordinary napkins. Skylark through a "calendar" evening, confidently. No outlines show . . . with Kotex sanitary napkins!

If this happens to you, should you blame—
☐ Your waxed floors
☐ Your scatter rugs
☐ Yourself

Tain't funny when falls cause 15,750 casualties a year! If your scatter rugs slip—blame yourself. Anchor them with rug cushions. And for safety's sake on difficult days, why not choose the only napkin with the 4-ply safety center . . . choose Kotex . . . and get plus protection? You'll like the dependable softness of Kotex. Unlike other pads, Kotex does more than just "feel" soft at first touch. Kotex stays soft while wearing—keeps its shape, keeps you more comfortable—longer!

Which do you need, for this "trim" effect?
☐ Scraps of felt
☐ Two weeks' allowance
☐ A milliner

You can do it yourself! Just cut out simple flower shapes from scraps of felt . . . tack 'em with snappers to your gloves and beanie. Vary the flower colors, and have matching accessories for every outfit! They go together. Like daintiness and smooth grooming. Like Quest and Kotex. For Quest Powder, the Kotex deodorant, answers the urgent need for a powder deodorant on "those" days. Used with sanitary napkins, safe, unscented Quest Powder banishes fear of offending.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other napkins put together

Fun to have the stag line clamoring for you?

Making wallflowers blossom is our project this month!

■ Do you ever wonder frantically at what magic moment you will be transformed from a shy, gangling colt continually falling over yourself, to a smooth poised operator equal to any occasion? Sure, you've wondered. We can tell from your letters, from our chats with you, from the memory of us at fourteen and fifteen and sixteen. Chums, smoothness doesn't just hit you all of a sudden like a cold in the head. It comes slowly and painfully with experience.

Like golf or the rumba, you can't really get it from a printed page, but you can get a start on it. It helps to know how to introduce people, how to use your knife and fork, (Continued on page 99)

Hotel. Jake has hundreds of friends—all broke. They're mostly what Brad refers to as "vaudeville hams," and they come and live off Jake every time they're out of a job. It's not Brad's idea of how to run a hotel. Marilyn (Constance Moore) who had known Brad since they were kids, doesn't agree with his outlook on life, but she loves him anyway. So much that she gives up a chance to be in a Broadway show to stay in Atlantic City and marry him. Gradually she sees that she has made a mistake. Brad is completely engrossed in business. He continually pulls "fast ones" on his friends and business associates, till finally he has none left. Even Marilyn leaves him, convinced that he cares nothing for her. She becomes a star on Broadway and is seen everywhere with Carter Graham (Robert Castaine), but in her heart she still loves Brad.

Atlantic City attains all the popularity Brad has hoped for. Beauty pageants are held there regularly. But Brad overreaches himself financially, and he soon finds that even the city he has given his whole life to no longer wants him. That's when Jake and his "vaudeville hams" come to the rescue. And what rescuers they are! Sophie Tucker, Paul Whiteman, Belle Baker, Joe Frisco and Gallagher and Shean. No wonder the picture ends in a triumph of music, gaiety and happiness. Constance Moore is lovely as Marilyn, and you'll go for Republic's new discovery, Brad Taylor.—Rep.

P. S.

The seven-week original shooting schedule was raised to nine when Connie Moore was carried from the set for an emergency appendectomy. Luckily, most of her dancing scenes had been done . . . Connie has 24 costume changes in this picture. Universal costume designer, Adele Palmer, claimed one of the toughest jobs of her career. Seems the dresses for the post-World War I period are very much like those of today—round collars, low waistlines and side-drapes. Problem was to make the dresses look like period clothes . . . Cast and crew, talking together over cokes in the afternoons, were surprised to find how many were familiar with this colorful period in Atlantic City's history. Producer Albert Cohen, Charlie Grapewin, Ray McCarey, Paul Whiteman, Belle Baker, Joe Frisco, Al Shean (remember Gallager and Shean?) and Gus Van (of Van and Scamp fame) all had beginnings on the Boardwalk . . . The gal who plays "Miss America" in this picture was once actually a bathing beauty. Won the California title at Venice in 1941. She's 20-year-old Elna Carroll. In case you girls want to check yourselves, she's 5'6", weighs 115 pounds . . . Brad Taylor, who plays the part of the same name in the picture, got his name from the script and not vice-versa. He's Stanley Brown, the guy who's died in thirteen Western pictures. Since this part takes him out of Westerns and puts him into big-time musicals, he took the name for luck . . . Paul Whiteman does the first singing of his screen career when he warbles "On a Sunday Afternoon" with Miss Moore . . . Studio bought Connie the most beautiful pair of ball-bearing skates available for her production number with Jerry Colonna. She couldn't stay on her feet in the things —had to borrow a cheap pair from her small daughter . . . And wait'll you see Paul Whiteman (all 275 pounds of him) come down a kiddie slide in a playsuit!

MOVIE CONTRACT to PERMA·LIFT GIRL

From High School to Hollywood modern Cinderella

The recent announcement that beautiful Greta Christensen had won a Hollywood movie contract proves again that truth is stranger than fiction. A year ago Greta was an obscure Chicago High School girl who occasionally modeled for photographers and artists. Her posing for the drawings of the Perma·Lift girl led to her discovery.

A talent scout, attracted by a Perma·Lift advertisement, found that Greta was not only beautiful but possessed unusual dramatic ability.

We all hope that Miss Christensen's career will parallel the meteoric rise to stardom enjoyed by the Perma·Lift brassiere she modeled. • A. Stein & Company Chicago•New York•Los Angeles•Toronto Patriot, President —and penman!

In darkest days, General Washington led his country towards light. This patriot was also a potent penman—wrote fiats and commands, letters, ledgers, memorable memoranda . . . in his own hand, with quills of geese.

Today, the pen behind the sword is Inkograph—chosen by many generals, and hundreds of thousands of men in service. Precision-built, easy flowing, pointed to fit pressure of any hand, durable yet light, it is as dependable in the field, as in the office and home.

Inkographs are preferred by men in the service—so if your dealer is out of stock, please keep trying!

some magic-weaving, too, with a story in Technicolor, and an exciting cast. Ronald Colman is a handsome Prince of Beggars. Marlene Dietrich is a queen who dances in a fabulous costume all of gold (you probably saw the pictures of it in Life magazine). James Craig, Edward Arnold and Joy Ann Page are also in the cast.

The most colorful character in Bagdad a thousand years ago, was a fantastic thief named Hafiz (Ronald Colman). Thief, yes, and beggar, too, but witty, dashing and the delight of every woman he meets. Hafiz lives in the slums with his lovely daughter, Marsinah (Joy Ann Page). He keeps her behind a high wall—no one but a prince is good enough for Marsinah. But the girl has other ideas about that. Unknown to her devoted father, she has met a young man and fallen in love. The fact that the young man says he's only a gardener's son doesn't bother her at all. Love in a garden sounds wonderful to Marsinah!

Actually, the "gardener's son" is the Caliph in disguise. Hafiz not knowing that, flies into a fury when he finds out Marsinah has been meeting him. Hafiz himself has been having a fine romance with a mysterious beauty named Jarmilla (Marlene Dietrich), but he takes time out from that to do something about Marsinah's future. He steals an elaborate costume from a bazaar, tricks a police captain into giving him an elephant and presents himself to the Grand Vizier (Edward Arnold) as a foreign prince. The Vizier is a thief and a scoundrel, but since Hafiz is a thief himself, he is not bothered by such details. He is bothered by the discovery that the Vizier is already married. Hafiz had planned to sell him on the idea that Marsinah would make an ideal wife. A further complication is Hafiz' unexpected meeting with Jarmilla, who turns out to be married to the Vizier. About that time, Hafiz is arrested for theft, and the Caliph sends for the Vizier as an attempted murderer. The rest is sheer excitement, with sabers flashing in the sun and a harem full of beauties running for cover.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Production of "Kismet" started a nation-wide search for—of all things—camels! Seems there were only six to be found in all Hollywood, and at least twelve were needed for the Caravan scene. They were finally rounded up from zoos and circuses all over the country . . . This was all to the displeasure of Mr. Colman, who was praying they would substitute wheelbarrows. Ronald had an unhappy experience with a camel while touring Egypt—the animal ran away with him. Since then he gets seasick each time he climbs up on one of the things . . . If you look closely, you will see an actual blush in Technicolor when Jimmy Craig kisses Joy Page. Scene was reshot a dozen times, but each time Joy would blush a more violent red. No number of rehearsals would help, so the scene finally had to be let with Miss Page's pink cheeks . . . Hard to believe when you see Miss Dietrich dance in forty-five pounds of gold chains, a can of gold paint and little else, that she spent her spare time teaching the extras on the set to crochet afghans . . . Metro didn't know Jimmy could sing until they heard him warble the Arabian love song to Joy. He was so good they added a scene to "Heavenly Body" so he could yodel a cowboy ballad to Hedy Lamarr . . . Strange Oriental musical instruments for background music were borrowed from the famous Henry Eicherm collection. Musical director Herbert Stothart, had to add special clarinet and saxophone mouthpieces to the woodwinds and gamelon equipment before

RAINBOW ISLAND

Somebody at Paramount must lie awake nights thinking up new excuses for Dorothy Lamour to wear a sarong. Not that this insomnia isn't in a good cause! In "Rainbow Island" she plays a white girl who was shipwrecked on the island as a child, and of course, dresses as a native. The picture is a comedy, with Eddie Bracken playing a sailor whom the natives think is a god.

They are prodded to this startling conclusion by Lona (Dorothy Lamour). When three stalwart representatives of the U. S. Navy land on the island in a disabled plane, Lona thinks it's too bad for them to have their heads chopped off. Particularly the handsome one named Ken (Barry Sullivan). So she suddenly detects this strong resemblance between Toby (Eddie Bracken) and Momo, the god of the island. The natives put away the execution axes and start worshipping Toby, who orders them to release Ken and Pete (Gil Lamb).

Toby thinks being a god is going to be a heck of a lot of fun. He is soon disillusioned. It seems gods don't eat, drink or have more than a purely academic interest in women. Pete and Ken, not being gods, aren't cramped by any such restrictions. But they have their troubles, too. Toby claims a god needs a slave, and in revenge for past rank-pulling, selects Pete. And Ken is constantly pursued by Lona, who plans to go back to America with him.

Ken's mind is on getting their plane fixed. That presents considerable difficulty, since the queen of the islands has taken all the spark plugs for a necklace. Furthermore, the natives are getting a little suspicious of Toby. He makes with the eyes at the girls, and in spite of some fancy legerdemain by Ken and Pete, he doesn't make a very impressive god. In an attempt to get the spark plugs Toby gives the queen an overdose of sleeping powder. You'd better be there to see the rest!

Eddie Bracken is one of the funniest guys in pictures, and Gil Lamb gives him plenty of assistance. And of course there is Lamour, toujours Lamour.—Par.

P. S.

This time, at the request of servicemen from every fighting front, Dottie's torso drapes are scantier and more prettily colored than ever . . . They used to have zippers on them, but they created too much bulk for these, so Dottie had to come fifteen minutes earlier every day and be sewn into them . . . For one scene, a huge, carnivorous plant was built by the studio and rigged up to operate by electricity. The day Eddie Bracken got swallowed up by the phoney plant, the power lines into Los Angeles went out of commission for two hours. Executives weighed comparative value of Bracken's comfort vs. complete destruction of delicate mechanism, decided to let Eddie stay inside the plant until the power went on. When lunch time came around, sympathetic pals passed sandwiches, Pepsi-colas through the plastic leaves to the luckless actor . . . Notice backgrounds in this one. Art Director Haldane Douglas introduced a new type of South Sea Island architecture. Richer color, more traditional backgrounds . . . Leading Man Barry Sullivan spent the entire picture in most males' dream of perfect attire—dungarees, jacket and yachting cap . . . "Raffles," Carveth Wells' talking Mynah bird, has a prominent role. No truth to the report he was hired to write additional dialogue for some of the scenes.

TO OUR READERS...

History gets made in the craziest ways.

I guess you noticed last issue that illustrious Fanny Hurst is now reviewing our picture of the month. For MODERN SCREEN, that is history.

Going behind the scenes, let's look at a pitifully palpitating young man (me), with awfully shiny shoes, riding in a mahogany elevator big enough for a concert.

"I understand," I said to the elevator girl, "that Miss Hurst is partial to animals."

"Well," said the girl, "she sold the monkeys."

"Oh," I said, relieved. But then I thought of the dogs. Hurst's dogs. Genius dogs. The lot of them jumping through hoops in perpetual motion. Is it ever proper to call a dog "sir," I wondered.

Time marches on. Here I was in front of the door with my finger on the buzzer. A push would do the trick. Or a real hard tremble. I was groping desperately for a good opener. You couldn't simply say "Nice day" to Fanny Hurst.

She opened the door. "Nice day, isn't it, Mr. Delacorte?" she said. A tiny speck of a dog wagged an invisible speck of tail. Miss Hurst scooped him up and said, "Won't you have a cup of Turkish coffee?"

"Thank you, sir," I said calmly. I sat in the corner of a huge chair, sipping alertly because you never can tell when you'll come up with a fez between your teeth. Thinking, meanwhile, I gotta ask her to write for us, how shall I ask her to write for us, I gotta . . .

I think the inspiration came finally from Dunninger, the mind reading fellow. I wrote my question, real small: "How would you like to write for MODERN SCREEN?"

To which Miss Hurst said, "Why not?"

And that's how history was made.

Although Janie makes Maureen toe the mark in important things like telling the truth and washing, she doesn't make any hard-and-fast rules. "She isn't going to be a slave to a clock or routine the way I was when I was a kid," she chirps.

Cherishing her moid, Janie indulges her every request even to bringing her to studio to watch shooting on "The Doughgirls" set. That's Scotch and Soda with J. and M.

Maureen's nuts about Porky Pig book. Begs her mother to read story over and over again, until by now she can practically quote it word for word along with Janie!

As child, Janie was strictly reared, never had cute clothes she loved. Blessed with curly hair, she was denied "frivolous" ringlets, had "sensible" haircuts!

Reagans want Maureen to go to college, study whatever she chooses. They're bringing her up to be self-reliant, to like and trust people.

Maureen and Janie are still Ronnie's favorite tomatoes, but boy! the competition from that vegetable patch!

nutty but nice

By Ida Zeitlin

■ "Sunday's a fine day," announced Maureen. "After the war, every day'll be Sunday."

"I think you've got something there," Jane agreed. Her daughter knows when she's banged out a solid hit and makes the most of it. "Yes indeed," she chirped. "I've certainly got something there."

To Maureen, Sunday's the day for having fun with the people she loves. On Sunday, Nana—that's Grandma Reagan—comes to take her to Sunday school. On Sunday, Mother never goes to work. When Daddy comes home, it's mostly on Sunday—

When he takes off his uniform and comes down in his other clothes, slacks and shirtsleeves, up goes the glad old cry. "You're not Captain Reagan any more. Now you're plain Mr. Reagan, Daddy—"

Plain Gardener Reagan, Jane says, would be more like it. "Maureeny and I are still his favorite tomatoes, but we run into stiff competition from the vegetable garden!"

He can't wait to get out to the carrots and onions. He plays personal valet to every tree on the place. He calls one slope the Lower 40 and planted a deodar there as a Christmas tree—

Maureen follows at his heels. Jane sunbathes and watches. Gardening isn't her line, but she likes to contribute advice, which Ronnie treats with masculine loftiness. "Tend to your knitting, me good woman. Do I tell you how to dust ashtrays?" (Continued on page 96) trio "con brio"

Bing averages comp show a week, and after next pic plans an overseas trek. This summer Bob toured S. Pacific bases with Colonna, Langford.

In music that means "with dash and noise," which suits Father Bobby-Sox Crosby, Zoot-Snoot Hope and No-Blood Sinatra just dandy!

Line from Hope's new pic: "A broken-down, over-stuffed crooner with laryngitis kept crabbing my act." Above, with Crosby in "Road to Utopia."

In Billboard's men's poll, Frankie runs Bing a close second. After "Anchors Aweigh" he may flash on in Crosby's "Here Come the WAVES."

■ Coming back from his overseas Army entertainment tour a couple of years ago, Bob Hope landed in New York on his way to Hollywood and found himself with a night to relax. He looked up a pal of his and said how about an evening at the new late spots.

"Fine," said the pal. "We'll go over to the Waldorf and catch this new sensation, Frank Sinatra. He's terrific!"

"Sinatra?" Bob repeated blankly, "who's he—a juggler, or does he hoof?"

The pal gasped and asked if Bob was kidding. Then he remembered that Hope had been lost in a GI world for the last few months. Without further explanations he hauled him right over to the Waldorf-Astoria and a ringside table. After Frank Sinatra had crooned a few tunes and set the place on fire, Bob excused himself. "Pardon me while I make a phone call," he grinned.

He got Hollywood. He got a sleepy star out of bed at four o'clock in the morning, "Listen, Hips," Bob told him. "This is your favorite tack-up boy, Hope. I'm just calling to warn you. Look out! I'm in New York listening to a boy who's coming out to Hollywood and make you go to work."

"Bring him along," yawned Bing Crosby sleepily. "I'm getting fat and lazy anyway."

Bing Crosby didn't have to ask Bob Hope who the new boy was; he knew all about Frank Sinatra. And he wasn't kidding when he said, "Bring him along." Because above all the Old Groaner wanted a personal peek at the Swoon and a firsthand earful of his bent-notes. He was a Sinatra fan himself from the start, and there's a fairly ancient note on Bing's private stationery to testify to that in the possession of the Voice's leading fan-club (Continued on page 124)

MODERN SCREEN GOES TO A

Van giving the Dresden Doll treatment to a be-slacked, belated Judy, who's just wandered in from an 11th hour studio call. Van's next picture is "30 Seconds Over Tokyo."

■ The damn phone kept ringing. "Lo? Lana. Evie, I gotta tend Cherry . . ." "Hya, Van? Look, fella, I'm Hit Parading tonight, so . . ." But even so, the joint really jumped, jinx 'n' all—a slew of "no can do'ers," the hardware shortage, Jim Brown's baby being almost but not quite born. . . . Seems the Wynns had just moved into a shack that had, Item: 1 cot, 1 table, 2 wicker lounges! Which left it up to the gang to treasure hunt à la Sears Roebuck. And they dood it—scurried back with a dripolator, a set of chairs subbing as fugitives from an embalming emporium and tons of ice. Then, by gum, they sat—and gabbed: About tours and didies, war and peace, X's new pic and Y's induction and . . . Then Keenan whipped around some Jap mementoes till Neddy Poo woke up screaming. Whereupon the gang filed in and squatted near him making funny ha-ha faces till he fell off again. Could be Evie's still picking up after us and maybe Neddy's still yelping and Van probably can't sit down without some very tender—memories. But, oh brother, was it fun!

The blow-out was going bang-up till the gang sprang this little episode, master-minded by Evie. Before distributing birthday loot, they shelled out with gag gifts, including food pills, a ham—a mirror!

Once a B'way pro, Evie is agog over Metro's plan to feature her in "other woman" roles, will start soon now that Pop, just returned from overseas with Chennault, Stillwell congrats, has been I-A'd.

BIRTHDAY PARTY

The fixin's were luscious, the music low, the spirit high, and the cracks corny. So here's hoping Van Johnson has many, many more of the same!

Van and the Master traipsed over the huge grounds clipping cosmos and honeysuckle to pretty up the party, kept track of Neddy by those bells Mamma ties on his shoes for that purpose.

Van looking happy-slappy. Or could be it's just that he's trying to hoard up a good heave to blitz those 21 candles. Should be 7 more, but that's tradition and he's stuck with it!

Jess (Jeffrey Thomas Barker) wed Susie Hayward (Edith Marrener) in H'wood's St. Thomas Episcopal Church, July 23rd; both for first time. Her mom wanted them to wait, but gave blessings.

By Fredda Dudley

■ It was Friday night at the Hollywood Canteen. Jess Barker was emceeing the usual topnotch show and looking around a bit on his own. Behind the snack bar was a slim, round-faced redhead, signing autographs and in general making the G.I.'s happy.

During a brief moment when his presence was not necessary on the platform, Mr. Barker stepped swiftly to the snack bar, leaned over to peer into Susan Hayward's astonished eyes and observe with all the seriousness of a Senator during an election year, "No, I don't think you are that brave a girl."

Then he returned to the platform. Susan blinked and stared after the tall blond gentleman with the devilish grin. Probably, she decided hazily, he had mistaken her for someone he knew.

Ten minutes later during an orchestral number. Jess suddenly bobbed into Susan's line of vision for the second unexplained time. "No," quoth he, "I'm certain you don't have that much courage." He studied her critically, shook his head and dashed back to the platform.

The third time this bewildering gentleman strode up to Susan, she was ready for him, as any properly curious girl would have been. "Just exactly what did you mean by those two remarks?" she demanded. "I'm not brave enough to what? I don't have enough courage to what?"

Jake of the maritimes

To Dick Jaeckel, going to sea wasn't just a whim.

It was a passion, a crusade, the answer to a prayer . . .

■ It was 5 o'clock, and Dick had gone down for his physical at 7 that morning. Mrs. Jaeckel was beginning to worry. Heaven help them all if he hadn't passed! But he must have passed—that hunk of healthy bone and muscle. Then what was keeping him so long?

The door blew open. "Whee! I'm a maritimer!"

"You did pass then? Did it take all this time?"

"Sure I passed. Otherwise, I'd have joined the Seamen's Union and left for Murmansk in two days. Took them exactly 43 minutes to okay me. Went to a baseball game to celebrate. Here, Mom, sign these papers."

She laughed a little shakily. "Couldn't wait till after dinner, I suppose?"

"Nope." She signed them. "Thanks. What's for dinner?"

"Fried chicken, corn on the cob, cauliflower, salad, baked Alaska—"

"Very reasonable—" his current term of high approval. "I'm definitely hungry. Passed on an empty stomach."

It was good to see him. (Continued on page 79)

Poverty was such a wee thing. What did Frank and Nancy want anyway—egg in their beer?

Twanged with CBS cowboy Cottonseed Clark on all-Western Command Performance. Scripters are dreaming up fall Sinatra television show.

■ Frankie had finished a Hit Parade broadcast and was dashing out of the studio when two guys came toward him, a soldier and a sailor. They were smiling kind of tentatively, and he grinned back at them vaguely; and then they came nearer, and he saw their faces. He ran up to them and held out his hand. "Golly," he said, "It's swell to see you guys."

They were a couple of buddies from the old days. Two of the kids who used to think he could sing way back when he hardly thought so himself. He remembered their names and their brothers' names, and when they asked if he'd have his picture taken with them, he coralled the photographers and posed with them for five flash-bulb blinding (Continued on page 45)

Editors Al and Henry had farewell chat with Frank just before he left for Coast. Proud papas swapped baby tales, and F. invited them to spaghetti and meatballs at his new house next time they're in H'wood. After illness, he sent out printed thank-you cards to fans who wrote when he was hospitalized.

minutes. A couple of days later when the pictures were developed, he took time out at lunch to scrawl a few sentences on each one and to put them in the mail for the kids. "Why the fuss over those two?" A fellow at his table in the commissary asked him. "Who the heck are they?".

Frank looked across the table at him coldly. "They're my pals," he said simply.

Tell that to the next dope who tries to say that Sinatra's gone Hollywood. Tell them that, and stick your tongue out at them for us. The Frankie Sinatra who lives in the lovely old house on Toluca Lake, who wears custom-made clothes and drives a long, lean Cadillac, is fundamentally the same little guy who used to sing for free with the Demarest High Band. That's not saying he hasn't developed a fondness for caviar and good tweeds which he could never afford before. Or that he hasn't switched from third balcony seats at the Stanley in Jersey City to loges at Grauman's Chinese. But in his heart he hasn't changed, and that—considering the roller coaster ride of the past few years—is really something.

■ Betty, Vicki and Punkin James were all gathered in Harry's music room and, of the three, only Vicki looked cheerful. Betty was forlorn because Harry had left that morning. The poodle's head was down on his paws, because he hadn't made up his mind about Vicki yet. On the recording machine, a platter was going—the James version of "I'm in the Market for You."

"We're lonesome," said Betty, "so we're listening to Daddy's music—"

Vicki didn't look lonesome. The couch was soft and wide, the blanket was soft and blue, her mother was sitting beside her, and she couldn't think of a thing she needed right then. So she kicked a leg, blew a bubble and guhhed.

From another couch, set at right angles, Punkin watched her moodily. If she hadn't been there, he'd have been nuzzling Betty. But he doesn't know quite what to make of her daughter. It's not that he's jealous of Vicki, just a little leery. Nobody ever told him to keep away from her, it's strictly his own idea. (Continued on page 132)

And, by way of celebration, here was Janie herself seeing New York for the first time. Besides, she found the coats she was modeling for us something to purr about. Said so.

"This is how furs should be. No trimmings, no fixings. Just . . . nice . . . fur."

Which proves that our Joyce is strictly on the beam in the gray matter department. Mink trimmed with sequins can happen, of course. You saw it yourself in "Lady in the Dark." But for real life, the better the fur, the fewer the gags. When "chiffon mink" (Continued on page 114)

Hi, Monica!

Paul Henreid's putty in the hands of that new baby. If a smile doesn't fix him, a kiss works wonders!

■ Paul Henreid's got another girl, and they're both pretty shameless about the whole thing. He calls her Schatzi, Viennese for sweetheart. She makes love to him in front of his own wife. He buys jewelry for her. She has breakfast with him in her pajamas. One thing she hasn't done is ask him to light two cigarettes for her. But then, she never did get a chance to see "Now, Voyager."

She's a blue-eyed, flaxen-haired charmer named Monica, fifteen months old, and the Henreids haven't been the same since she arrived.

"What was it like," asks Lisl, "before Monica came?"

Barbara and Cary play host to wounded war vets from nearby Army hospital. During fifth War Bond drive, Cary trudged miles peddling bonds door to door.

by Hedda Hopper

Here, for the first time, is Barbara's and Cary's side of the tragic struggle, as revealed to Hedda Hopper

the Fighting Grants

■ Barbara Hutton Grant, the saddest little rich girl I've ever seen, is putting up the battle of her life. The old courage and fortitude that must have been always somewhere deep in the character of Frank Woolworth's granddaughter are coming to the front. For, after all, Barbara is an American of seasoned stock who just happens to have had the heritage of enormous wealth wished on her. Would she be a happier girl, a happier wife and mother, without those millions that her hard-nosed, hard-fisted Yankee forebears garnered and dropped into her small lap?

However that may be, and no one has the right to pass judgment, life and fate are giving her just as tough and bitter a lot as most of us have to put up with. Barbara was thirty years old, with two unhappy marriages behind her, before she learned to fight. Before she learned, perhaps, that an unlimited bankroll doesn't constitute in itself a certified passport to happiness.

When she made up her mind to put a stop, once and for all, to the inhuman actions imposed upon her as the price of a mother's right to raise her child, I asked to come and see her.

"Oh," she cried pathetically, "Cary and I would love to have a baby! Cary and I both love children. We'd like to (Continued on page 102)

"The Merry Monahans"

Nothing could split up that Oakie, O'Connor and Ryan song-and-dance act. Not even a woman.

STORY: They were The Monahans—Songs, Dances and Patter—and they were Irish and funny and gifted and inseparable. There were three of them: Pete, Jimmy and Patsy. Once they had been four, but that was a long time ago when Jimmy and Patsy were still kids hardly able to take their bows. Pete never spoke (Continued on page 63)

PRODUCTION: This was Don's last picture as a single man. He and Hollywood High School's loveliest, Gwen Carter, were married shortly after the production closed. It was Don's scene with his make-believe mother-in-law in the picture that gave him courage to speak to Gwen's mother. In the story, he convinces (Continued on page 62)

1. In 1899 Pete Monahan (Jack Oakie), engaged to his vaudeville partner Lil (Rosemary DeCamp), is tricked into wedding conniving showgirl. She deserts him and children.

2. Pete and kids, Jimmy and Patsy (Dan O'Connor, Peg Ryan), forge ahead in 3-a-day song and dance act, hit Keith bigtime.

4. Her widowed mother is Lil! Pete plans to propose, but her partner, Pembroke (John Miljan), beats him to it.

3. En route to next stand, sooty Jimmy meets Sheila (Ann Blythe), is thrilled to learn she's booked at same theater!

By Maris MacCullers and Charis Zeigler

9. When manager refuses to put their dad in show, kids quit and come back to him. They pretend they were flops without him, but he's read rave notices, walks out of their lives. They trail him and join him in huge Liberty Loan rally with Lil and Sheila in N. Y. Agent catches act.

8. Pete goes on wagon, hurls brick thru window in celebration, is jailed. Jimmy and Patsy are B'way sensation.

6. Sheila, who dislikes and distrusts Pembroke, plans to run away if her mom weds him. She consults Jimmy who persuades her to elope instead!

7. Clerk SOS-es their families. Pete approves, but Lil and Pembroke forbid it. Back home Sheila shames Pembroke into admitting he is using her and her mother for his own selfish ends. He leaves.

5. Heartbroken, Pete goes off the wagon, misses cues right and left. One time when kids go on alone, B'way talent scout sees them, asks them to look him up.

the mother of the gal he loves that if he's old enough to go into the Army and fight for his country, he's old enough to be married. He made much the same speech on his own behalf in real life a few months ago.

Don is teamed with Peggy Ryan for the twelfth time. They've appeared together in all but one of the thirteen pictures Don has made. In this one they do their first serious dancing for the screen. The pair do a straight ballet routine, but their hep-cat followers needn't groan on that one, for they immediately swing into a ballet burlesque which is strictly solid! Permission had to be obtained from Al Jolson and Sophie Tucker before the kids could do impersonations of them in "The Merry Monahans." If there was any reluctance on the part of the Mammy Singer and the Last of The Red Hot Mamas to grant this permission, it was swept away when the first rushes were shown of the acts. Peggy and Don do a terrific job on "Rock-a-Bye Your Baby with a Dixie Melody" and "Some of These Days."

rock-solid . . .

Don, who has grown two inches in the two years he's been on the screen, gained five pounds while this picture was in production in spite of the exhausting dance routines he had to rehearse. This brings him up to 139, and he claims he is "solid as rock."

There are fifteen tunes (circa 1745 to 1918) to set the musical pattern for the "Monahans." This is probably the largest aggregation of musical oldies ever presented in one picture.

Jack Oakie fans who have seen him jig a little in other pictures may be surprised to see Jack do some real old-time hoofing. This isn't a new departure for Mr. O. His first theatrical job was as chorus boy in the New York stage production of "Little

To become a Nurse's Aide, thus releasing a graduate nurse for active duty. To join the Cadet Nurse Corps and become a graduate R.N. while having your complete tuition, living expenses and spending money provided by the government.

And if you're already a nurse, either retired or specializing in private cases, why not enlist in the Army or Navy Reserve?

Nelly Kelly." Rosemary DeCamp and Isabel Jewell are both ex-schoolmarms. (They didn't look that way when we went to school, either.) Miss DeCamp has a B.A. and a Master's degree from Mills College, where she taught drama for a year. Miss Jewell is a graduate of Hamilton College for Women, at which spot she taught Latin. Ann Blyth is the juvenile actress discovered in the road show of "Watch on The Rhine." She was given a movie contract when the show reached Los Angeles; has made one other picture for Universal which hasn't as yet been released. This will be her debut in the American movie theater. Miss Blyth's first assignment at Universal was to interview Jack Oakie for an edition of "Topper," the Universal Studio school paper. She wrote such an interesting biography that the comedian was honored by the title of "movie king" for a month.

Those of you riding around on retreads and synthetic tires will find it hard to believe that the Oldsmobile Limited touring car (1909 vintage) still has its original tires. All four of the old-time automobiles in the picture are authentic antiques of the period, incidentally. They were all driven to the studio under their own power, although the five-minute ride through the Cahuenga Pass from Hollywood required 30 minutes with these 1917 specimens.

The "Monahans" was directed by Charles Lamont, whose long and able experience with handling comedy stems from his advent in Hollywood in 1919 as a Keystone cop for Mack Sennett. During shooting of this picture, Lamont celebrated the eighteenth anniversary of his marriage to the former Estelle Bradley. Mrs. Lamont appeared in the first picture directed by her husband.

The story is an original written by the team of Michael Fessier and Ernest Pagano. It required a great deal of research work on that period of American life when the "two a day" medium of vaudeville entertainment was in full flower in every legitimate theater from coast to coast.

about the woman he had married, the woman who had run off leaving a casual note of farewell, and the kids never asked. Pete was father and mother, teacher and boss of the act, and that was enough. There was never anyone like Pete.

It was because of Pete that they scrambled up through the ten cent vaudeville houses of the turn of the century. He kept after them, teaching them all the subtle tricks of a performer: How to put over a song, how to sock home a gag, how to pull an audience up in their seats until the applause was louder than the thump of the bass drum in the orchestra. Deanna Durbin now a long-haired blonde . . .

Lana Turner discovers Turhan Bey!

John Hodiak (above with June Allyson) lives in 2-room apartment with maid service. Maids love him because he makes his bed, takes care of his laundry, even washes his own breakfast dishes!

Deanna Durbin premiered with Henry Willson, wore furs to beat frigid Calif. summer. Recent throat ailment's kept her bedded days at a time. M.D.'s fear overwork, advise long vocal vacation.

■ Let's face it! It's Turhan Bey, kids! He is the man of the hour. I have never seen anything like the demonstration for Turhan following the "sneak" preview of "Dragon Seed."

It was all I could do to get myself and my new hat through the mob of Bobby Sockers (ah, how fickle is youth) who were determined to see, touch or yell at their new idol as we left the theater.

Pushing along bside me in the jam was a beautiful blonde girl. I could only see the top of her head, but I could hear her sighing, "He's for me." It wasn't until a couple of seconds later I saw her face. It was Lana Turner.

P.S. The next night they were dining at a cozy table for two at the candle-lighted Beverly Tropics. So maybe Lana knew what she was talking about!

On the set of "Anchors Aweigh," Frank Sinatra calls Gene Kelly "The Feet." Gene calls Frankie "The Voice." And they both call Kathryn Grayson "The Body."

I was out watching The Feet, The Voice and The Body emote the day Frankie's four-year-old daughter Nancy, was paying her Pa a visit.

She sat like a little owl on the sidelines watching her old man and Gene run through a dance number. "What do you think of your father's singing?" I asked Nancy.

Without a word she went into a dead swoon!

After she had straightened herself again I said, "And now—what do you think of his dancing?"

With an equally dead pan Miss Nancy grasped the end of her nose between two small fingers, clothes-pin fashion, and held it a long time. There was no added comment.

The latest flash on the boy wonder, Richard Jaeckel, is that he has grown three inches in height since he's been in the Merchant Marine. Right now he is an assistant engineer on a boat in the Pacific, ferrying recruits to a nearby training island. It's a promotion for Dick because, before that, he had been a "stoker." As he wrote his mother:

"It was 'hot' stuff in more ways than one."

The "welcome home" party Errol Flynn gave for his pal, Lt. Bruce Cabot, was the prettiest party of the year. It was an evening long to remember. The night was balmy and warm for a change (we've had it cold out here all summer).

Errol had arranged the tables at his hilltop home on a terrace overlooking the swimming pool. The whole Valley of Beverly Hills and Los Angeles was spread out below us like a beautiful, lighted crescent-shaped fan.

Instead of dancers or the usual fortunetellers, Errol had provided some novel entertainment. There were six marvelous professional swimmers and (Continued on page 68) train. He came finally to the observation platform, and he stood there watching the tracks unreel like an endless skein under the wheels of the train. On either side the landscape rushed past, rounded hills and sudden plains, green in the summer. He watched it idly. Then his eye caught the ladder that rose from the back of the train to the roof.

Nonchalantly, he slipped over the rail of the car onto the ladder. He climbed until his head was level with the roof of the scudding train. His eyes narrowed a bit. And then in one swift movement he scrambled to the top, and he stood there on the roof of the train, leaning forward into the wind, grinning an impudent Irish grin. He broke into a little victory jig up there and chanted a few lines from the latest hit.

He waved with easy grace to a farmer plowing a field. The farmer waved back and then almost fell flat on his face in surprise. Jimmy laughed. This was more like it. He felt like a conquering hero. Well that was how an act on Keith time should feel. He jigged again.

And just then he saw the tunnel. It came rushing up like the open mouth of the biblical whale who swallowed Jonah. Jimmy said: "Twenty-three, skiddoo," and dropped flat on his face. The tunnel roared overhead in blackness. And then they were out in open countryside. Jimmy rose a little sheepishly. He brushed his clothes. They looked like something he'd stolen from a scarecrow. He rubbed his face reflectively, and his hand came away black. Well, live and learn, so Jimmy waved once more to the green hills and the pleasant plains. And climbed down.

The girl stared at him.

She was pretty as a rose in a field of thistles. She was fresh as a tumbling brook in a desert. Her eyes were like twin forget-me-nots, and the tilt of her nose was gay as an Irish tune. She was sitting on one of the chairs on the observation platform. And she was staring at Jimmy. She wasn't frightened. She wasn't surprised. Jimmy didn't move. It seemed like a pleasant idea to have her looking at him. He didn't mind how long it went on. As long as he could look back.

She said: "Do you always drop in on trains like that?"

"Oh, I've been on the train," Jimmy said. "I was just out strolling."

"Strolling?"

"More fresh air up there."

"Oh, undoubtedly."

"Not as crowded either."

"I'm sure of that."

"Are you on this train?" Jimmy said.

She smiled: "Guess," she said.

"I mean are you going to Philadelphia?"

"Unless the engineer changes his mind."

"Live there?"

"No."

"Visiting?"

"No."

"I give up," Jimmy said.

The girl pointed to a script in her lap: "I'm on the stage. Our act is going to play Philadelphia."

"Act?"

"I'm with Arnold Pembroke's company. My mother, I and Mr. Pembroke."

"You're his daughter?"

"No. My name is De Royce. Sheila De Royce."

"And you're going to play Philadelphia. Keith's?"

"Yes. How did you know?"

"I'm a fortuneteller in my spare time."

"Spare time?" Her eyes were full on him now, the tattered clothes, the half-blackened face. "Isn't all your time spare time? It must be nice to be on the road. No worries. No troubles."

Jimmy said: "You mean you think—"

"Well, aren't you?" she said.

"A hobo? A tramp?" He laughed and then added: "And don't forget. Fortune-teller, too. Young lady, I can see your future. A young, dark—anyway he's dark now—man is entering your life. You will see him again—"

"Anything else?" Sheila said.

"That's all for now," Jimmy said. "But it's only part of my act."

past performance . . .

It was in Keith's Philadelphia Theater that Pete Monahan met Sheila De Royce's mother. Jimmy arranged it. He brought them to the dressing room and knocked on the door. Pete cheerily called "Come in," and then they stood there facing each other. For a moment it was very quiet in the room. Then Pete was slowly getting to his feet and he said: "Lil."

"Pete."

Jimmy looked from one to the other: "You know each other?"

Know each other?

For Pete, time was reeling back through the years, swiftly as the silent slip of sands through an hour glass. He felt again all the press of emotion, and he could remember—how clearly he could remember it!—the night in the Boston theater when Lil had promised to marry him.

But the rest of it was like a nightmare. He had never loved anyone but Lil, and he had been the happiest man in the world when she had said yes. He never dreamt it could go wrong. But it did go wrong. Another girl, Rose, said he had promised to marry her the night before, had proposed. And he couldn't remember. For the night before was shrouded in drink and gaiety. And perhaps he had—

Lil believed it, and she had run from the theater, her footsteps echoing down the alleyway, the sound of it final and abrupt, and over it the sound of her tears. That was the last time he had ever seen Lil. And out of spite, out of heartsickness and despair, he had married Rose. And he remembered the note Rose left when she had walked out on him: ". . . you never proposed to me at all. That night all you could talk about was Lil . . ."

Know her?

He had never forgotten her, never through all the years. He could remember the curve of her cheek and the sound of her laughter and the cool touch of her hand. So looking at her now, it was as if she had never left; because in memory he had always been with her. Life was funny, it ran in patterns. And now the pattern was repeating itself, and repeating itself in double. In a Philadelphia theater Lil and Pete stared at each other; and in the corridor just outside, their children, Jimmy and Sheila, were standing together.

Jimmy said quietly: "Hey, I think they can get along without me to push the conversation."

Jimmy took Sheila's hand, and they walked out of the room. They could hear Pete say again, in a tone of wonder and quiet tenderness:

"Lil—"

From the doorway of a dressing room a little further down the hall, a tall man was watching what happened. He was Arnold Pembroke. There was nothing in his eyes as he watched, only the faint glimmer of something indefinable. He was impassive; but still, perhaps in the pose of his body, there was something sinister.

"Sheila—" he called softly.

There was almost fear in Sheila's eyes as she looked up. Jimmy felt her hand go stiff in his. Pembroke hardly moved. He spoke quietly.

"May I see you a moment?"

divers who performed breathtaking stunts in the water. In the background a full orchestra played all the hit songs in a soft romantic mood.

I saw long, lanky Gary Cooper and his smartly groomed wife, sitting at a pool-side table enthusiastically applauding the swimmers.

Paul Lukas forgot his dignity (and the fact that he is an Academy Award winner) and told some hilariously funny stories. Among the beauties in the crowd were Ava Gardner and Paulette Goddard.

The party happened simultaneously with good news from the battle fronts, so for the first time in over two years the women wore their best clothes and loveliest jewelry and the men were in dinner jackets.

Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens are living in an apartment with only a partially furnished bedroom, an ice box, a stove and one chair in the living room.

When one of their first visitors remarked that she didn't see how they could get along without two chairs, the happy groom replied: "You don't? In a honeymoon apartment?"

Dennis Morgan's young six-year-old daughter, Kristin, is always being cautioned to "be quiet" around the house because "Daddy is reading his script."

The other day, one of Kristin's playmates asked her if her father was a movie actor.

"No," said Kris solemnly, "He's a script reader."

Why all the secrecy when Jennifer Jones and Robert Walker have occasional dinner dates? They even attended the sneak preview of "Since You Went Away" together, but they always act as though they don't want to be observed. Why? Certainly nothing would delight their fans more than to see these two reconciled. Wait 'til you see their love scenes in "Since You Went Away!"

Someone, for reasons of his or her own—is creating a lot of anxiety and unhappiness in Van Johnson's life.

Van's father, who raised him and who lives only for his boy, had a terrific shock recently when he received a telegram urging him to get in immediate touch with his son. The wire read:

IT IS IMPORTANT THAT YOU CONTACT ME AT ONCE (SIGNED) VAN.

I received practically the same wire. Several other people received similar messages.

Van, who was perfectly well and in no trouble, has a hunch who has been sending the alarming wires, but he feels he cannot speak until he is sure.

The same trouble-maker started the rumor that Van and June Allyson were secretly married.

Margaret O'Brien very proudly showed me her autograph book the other day. "I guess," sighed Margaret who has her practical side, "it is worth a lot of money but I would never sell it."

Walter Pidgeon wrote: "To Maggie O'Dear O'Brien."

Katharine Hepburn's was: "To an angel who isn't lost."

Robert Young penned: "No matter what anybody says, I saw you first."

Speaking of autographs in stars' "guest books" here are a few others:

George Cukor inscribed in Ingrid Bergman's prized autograph book: "To the girl who rang the bell, and for whom the bell tolled."

Hedy Lamarr wrote to Ann Sothern at the time she married Robert Sterling (I mean Ann married Bob—not Hedy): "To the Golden Girl —who turned out to be Sterling!"

I find in my mail from MODERN SCREEN readers many requests for the latest news about Gene Autry. That proves how loyal you all are, for Gene, who is now a flight officer with the Ferry Command, hasn't made a picture for over two years.

The most recent time I saw Gene, I had only a brief glimpse of the famous cowboy at Danny Danker's funeral. It was like the loyal Autry to fly to the Coast to attend the services for his friend and patron. It was Danny, the young radio advertising man, who discovered Gene for the air and put him on the radio.

The story goes that Danker was on the train with P. K. Wrigley, the gum magnate. He told Wrigley just how popular Gene was. "He should make a good gum salesman, then," laughed P. K. and that was enough for Danker. He built the show that started Gene on his radio career.

* * *

All Hollywood lost a wonderful friend in the passing of Danny Danker. He was the guiding genius back of the famous Lux Theater of the Air.

In the nine years the Lux show has been on the air, every great star in Hollywood has appeared as maestro Cecil De Mille's guest—that is, every star but Greta Garbo who is always a holder-outer in everything.

There are a brilliant parade of memories connected with this radio show—but certainly one of the most amusing concerns the dignified "C. B."

Seems that after about five days of a typical California downpour, De Mille had attempted to drive from his ranch to the radio rehearsal. But all the bridges were washed out, and there was nothing for him to do but to saddle one of his horses and gallop to town on horseback! And galloping right behind him was his pretty secretary!

Seven-year-old Margaret O'Brien set the record for a child actress when she starred in "Lost Angel"—the first time in radio history that a child has appeared in an hour of broadcasting. Not being able to read the script, the little girl not only learned her own role by heart—but also memorized the entire play including the other actors' roles—and the commercials!

I remember Alan Ladd's first appearance on the Lux hour. It was in February, 1939, and the play was "The Return of Peter Grimm." Alan was then unknown, but his voice had that compelling quality that is one of his vital assets today. His part was small, and his pay was $59, the minimum AFRA rate. Recently when he returned to the Radio Theater for "Coney Island," his salary was almost one hundred times as much as he earned for his first broadcast!

Bing Crosby's protégé, the good looking Greg McClure, selected by Bing for "The Great John L.," dropped by my house the other day. He's a six-footer and is the spittin' image of John L. himself in his youth.

I asked Greg if Bing had given him any advice about his career.

"Sure," he laughed. "One of the first things he did was to read me a temperance lecture. He said: "I'm not a Holier-than-thou. But if you want to drink—don't do it during the making of the picture. This is your big chance. You have a twenty-months-old baby and a wife to support—and just remember that nothing photographs worse than a hangover."

Pretty sage words, I'd say, from the ole Massa.

* * *

Maureen O'Hara has named her baby—Bronwein Fitz-Simons Price!

At this writing, the infant is too young to do anything about the situation—but kick.

When battery of giggling femmes besieged Laddie at the counter of a H'wood department store, he beat them to door, escaped into passing car that had stopped for light. Driver was glad to rescue him!

Reconciliation rumors between Jennifer Jones and her ex, Bob Walker, are false, but there's no divorce in the offing, either. She's currently romancing with Watson Webb, who took her to premiere, above.

The Jimmy Craigs, who never budge off their ranch for love or money, dolled up and come into town for "Since You Went Away" premiere. He's currently commuting to M-G-M to work in "Ziegfeld Follies."

"Of course. Excuse me, Jimmy."

She went in. Pembroke swung the door shut. Always, in the presence of Pembroke, she felt that tightening, the swift scurrying spasm of fear. There was no basis for it. For Pembroke had been kind, and Mother liked him. He had given them a chance in his act, brought them out of the cheap houses. Still—

"I don't like to find fault," Pembroke was saying in a suave voice. "You know that, Sheila, don't you? I realize that you are young and that you like this young man. This Monahan. You do, don't you?"

"Jimmy?" Sheila said. "Yes, I do like him."

"Still, while it may be pleasant to dally with him, there's still our act to be considered. We have to work on it, polish it. That takes rehearsal and effort. You mustn't let your mind be too occupied by—by other things, shall we say. You understand that, Sheila?"

"Yes, of course, I do want our act to be successful—"

"I shouldn't like to have to replace any part of my act. That would be unfortunate, wouldn't it? You understand, don't you, my dear?"

"I understand," Sheila said flatly.

Still it was one thing to say you understood and quite another to be with Jimmy Monahan. For Jimmy was gay and free. Jimmy made her feel young and carefree. He made her feel almost—almost like what? Like a girl in love?

So they swung around the circuit. Out of Philadelphia, they swung across country. It was like a montage of a summer carnival, songs and laughter, dancing and music. They swung through the Keith circuit across the fat, laughing breadth of America. Pete and Lil, Jimmy and Sheila. And Arnold Pembroke.

Finally, they reached San Francisco. Pete Monahan was making up at the mirror in the dressing room at the Orpheum in San Francisco. Patsy and Jimmy were humming a number they did during the act, running through it swiftly. Through the thin door came the sounds of the show going through its paces out front, fast music, blaring with brass, for an animal act. The Monahans were due to go on in a little while.

Pete slapped some makeup on his face: "Listen, kids," Pete said. "There's something I want to tell you."

"You're too late," Jimmy said. "We know about the stork."

"And the birds and bees, too," Patsy said.

"I'm not kidding," Pete said. "This is

IT'S NOT JUNE IN JANUARY

But it's practically Christmas in July. No, December 25th will still be Christmas back home here, but if we want to make sure that our fellas overseas really have a Merry Christmas with all the trimmin's, we'd better start thinking about it—and pronto! The Post Office Department is asking us to please, but please, make sure that all holiday gifts get sent out by September 15th and no later than October 15. The regulations on size, weight, packing, etc., are the same as always, but no need for a letter of request.

So looky, if you think Bill is having enough of a show out there without being bothered with presents, o. k. But if he's just a plain joe homesick for the States and you, a carefully bought gift, well-wrapped and arriving at the Nick of time will do a heck of a lot to prove to him that we realize that it isn't always our morale that needs the boosting!

serious."

"Need some money, Pop?" Jimmy grinned. "I can spare twenty."

"It isn't money. It's . . . it's . . ."

Patsy said: "You're blushing!"

Pete blurted it out then: "It's about Lil You like Lil, don't you kids?"

"She's swell."

cue for cupid . . .

"Well, I'm glad. Because I think she's swell, too. Always did. And now. Now—Well, kids need a mother and—"

"And you need a wife," Patsy said. "Is that what you're getting at?"

"O.K. Pop," Jimmy said airily. "You've got our permission."

"What does Lil say?" Patsy asked.

"She doesn't know," Pete said. "I don't think she knows I'm still in love with her. But I'm going to pop the question tonight." He grinned. "Wish me luck."

"You can come live with us if things get tough," Jimmy said.

"Us?" Patsy said. "You didn't ask me."

"I meant Sheila and me," Jimmy said.

There was a blare of music from out front. A buzzer sounded in the dressing room. Pete got up laughing. They walked to the door. The Three Monahans.

"We're on," Pete said. "There's our cue."

Arnold Pembroke watched the Monahans trot toward the stage. Then he closed his dressing room door. Another man was seated inside, puffing a cigarette. He was Osborne, Pembroke's agent.

"You heard me, didn't you?" Osborne rasped. "It's time you quit kidding yourself, Arnold. You're washed up in New York. You're washed up in vaudeville, too. Except for one thing."

"Yes?" Pembroke said.

"The girl. Sheila. That's why they're booking your act. And you know it. You can see what's going on. You've got to keep that kid in the act. And now with that Monahan kid making a play for her and his old man out for Lil—"

"Yes, I know," Pembroke said suavely. "I don't need you to do my thinking for me. Sheila won't leave as long as her mother stays with me."

"But if Lil marries Pete Monahan? They were in love once. And it looks as if history is repeating itself."

"Not quite," Pembroke said. "Lil doesn't know Pete is still in love with her. And she won't find out."

"Why not?"

"Because she's going to be my wife. I just proposed to her, and she accepted."

Osborne whistled. "You're a first grade stinker, aren't you, Pembroke?"

Pembroke shrugged: "Just a businessman. I have to protect my investments."

got the blues . . .

Pete got drunk when he found out. And he stayed drunk. It was as if something had snapped in him, the thin taut rope of hope or love. There wasn't anything for Jimmy or Patsy to do except wait, hoping that time would heal it.

Pete missed shows. The kids had to go on alone. The crowd liked them. A New York scout invited them to look him up on Broadway. But they stuck by Pete. They always told him they flopped when he wasn't in the show.

"They sat on their hands," Jimmy said.

"They were reading papers," Patsy said.

And Pete looked up at them with half sober eyes, knowing they lied. He always promised it was the last time. And then went out and got drunk again.

It was late one night in Salt Lake City that the phone rang in the hotel room the Monahans shared. Jimmy heard it. He got up rubbing his eyes, still half asleep, and stumbled to the ringing phone. He

■ Taking time out from thinking up bigger and better ways to beautify MODERN SCREENers, I twirled the radio dial, and Jack Carson's show turned up. Someone was accusing him, ". . . you're jealous of Dennis Morgan's curly hair." Carson hooted, "Why shouldn't his hair be curly? He sleeps all night on a Venetian blind."

Which set me right back thinking about business. Kids, you realize, don't you, that sleeping on a Venetian blind is not the way to curl your hair? Jack's a fine fellow, but what he knows about beauty shouldn't happen to Venus. However, speaking of Venus just naturally brings Rita Hayworth to mind. Mrs. Orson Welles is one femme who knows practically everything there is to know about beauty. Recently "The Reet," as her pals call her, budded forth in a new and super Fall hair-do. MODERN SCREEN went to work to record this new coif in an exclusive pix. Nice work, eh? And, thinking of you as I always am, how about a new hair-do for you?

SHAMPOO SAGA. You can have fun deciding upon your new "do." There's Rita's up-business or you can take your pick of the collection on p. 76. But before you get busy with combs and curlers, give a thought to the condition of your hair. Summer's past, but are you sure the fierce summer sun hasn't left its mark? Hot sun, dust, perspiration and casual grooming methods conspire to leave it in a shabby state at the end of the season. Get busy on an intensive hair-conditioning program. Nothing fancy, just the good old reliables: proper shampooing, brushing and massaging, plus a few added helps, such as cream for brittle ends and a corrective scalp preparation.

All shampoos are not meant to be used alike. Read directions, my pets. Some are to be diluted, some not. Many of you pen me notes: "How often should I go through this shampooing business?" That depends upon whether you toil in clean country air or the sooty city variety. But one week to ten days is the safest shampoo-spacing, more often if necessary. And some of you want to know if frequent shampoos are havoc-making. Well, Rita Hayworth washes her hair almost every night. Is her hair lovely? I ask you!

About shampoo variety . . . there are several honeys on the market. A particularly good soapless liquid with hair-conditioner added that does a fine job in bringing out the luster of your tresses leaving them nicely manageable. An ocean-foam shampoo that whips up into a foamy lather, a delightful whipped-cream affair.

Comes your particular hair-washing day, you can thoroughly enjoy the delightful shampoo ritual. First, with a spanking clean brush, sweep out tangles and surface dirt. Then douse your locks with warm water. Next step is the application of a clean-making, fragrant shampoo. Massage the scalp briskly so that you stir the shampoo into a creamy, heaped-up lather. Rinse thoroughly and repeat the whole process a second time. Rita tells me that when she's shampooing she pays special attention to the areas just behind the ears and the hairline where powder clings. And she has learned that when you can see little water crystals on the hair, you know it has been thoroughly rinsed.

RINSE? REALLY! Oh, yes, you'll love the effect of an after-shampoo rinse. Cuts away soap film, it does. Besides leaving your hair Hayworth-soft and bringing it a colorful glow. You can dip your shampoo-fresh mane into the stuff, pour it on or brush it on; but use it you certainly will once you've experienced the delightful results. And, bright thought, the effect will last happily until your next shampoo, but is not dye-permanent. (Continued on page 113) half expected it was Pete.

Sheila!

He hurried down to the lobby where Sheila was waiting. There was a half determined, half frightened look on her face. Then walking through the quiet streets of the city, she began to talk.

"I can't stand it any longer, Jimmy. I'm afraid of Pembroke. There's something cruel about him. Sometimes I can see his eyes on me, almost feel them, feel the evil in them. Maybe it's my imagination. I don't know. It's never anything you can put your finger on. But it's there. I don't want to stay any longer . . ."

They were in a little park, and over the rim of the trees the moon hung fat and slack in the sky. A cluster of stars dimpled the sweep of heaven. The trees were friendly black shadows rimming the walk. They stopped, and Jimmy faced her, looking at her.

"Sheila," he said, "you always knew you could come to me—"

"I did, Jimmy. You're the only one now."

"Sheila, from the first, from the first time I saw you on the train, I knew—"

"Knew what, Jimmy?" she said softly.

"That I loved you, Sheila. That I always will."

"I love you, Jimmy," she said.

The Irish grin stole over his face then, and there was an impish glint in his eyes.

"Then your troubles are over, my lassie," he said. "For when the Irish love, it's action and movement and living happily ever after. Come on—"

"Come on, where?"

"To get married!"

They were the first ones at the Marriage License Bureau early that morning. The clerk eyed them as they stepped up to the counter. Then he read over their application. He looked up at them again.

"You'll have to wait a minute," he said.

He took more than a minute. And it wasn't until too late that they realized why. By then, he had called Pete and Pembroke. They came in almost together.

Pete came charging in with Patsy behind him, and there was a wide grin on his face. Pembroke was impeccable and cold-faced. Lillian was with him, and seeing Sheila, she ran to her.

"Well," Pete said, "you turned out to be a fine son."

"Pop," Jimmy said, "it was just—"

"Just what? Stealing off to get married? Do you think I wanted to miss it? Jimmy's marriage! We'll make this the best marriage that ever happened on the Keith Circuit. Right, Lil?"

Pembroke said: "What marriage? They're much too young to think of it."

Pete looked at Lil: "I was thinking of getting married when I wasn't much older. Remember that, Lil?"

"This is ridiculous," Pembroke said.

He reached toward Sheila. Pete stepped in front of him.

"Wait a minute," he said. "These kids are in love. They have a right to do what they want."

"And you're the man to tell them, aren't you?" Pembroke said. "A sot! A drunkard! You're drunk now. Have been for weeks."

Pete reached for him then; he held him by the scruff of the collar. Then the anger flared in his eyes, and as Pembroke tried to pull away, Pete swung his fist, and Pembroke dropped to the floor in a sodden heap. It was Lil who bent to Pembroke, looking up at Pete.

"It's true, though, isn't it Pete?" she said.

Pembroke stopped the marriage that time. But it was the last chance he ever had. For it came out then, the fear Sheila had of him. And in their hotel Pembroke felt the careful mask slipping from his face.

true confession . . .

"I hate her," he said to Lil. "I hate her, and she knows it. Do you think it's pleasant for me to have a chit of a girl support me? To know that I'm through? If I'm through, let's make a good job of it and end this farce. I'm walking out, Lillian. I never loved you. Pete loves you. I needed a meal ticket. This is last act, last scene. You can ring down the curtain!"

It was unfortunate that Pete picked just that time to get thrown into jail. With the peculiar logic of the Irish, Pete swore off liquor, and to seal the oath he heaved a brick through the nearest liquor store window, within plain sight of a policeman. Pete always said there was a moral hidden away somewhere that the day he swore off liquor he ended up in jail.

Jimmy and Patsy were waiting for him the day he got out. He looked fit, Pete did. He walked with a spring to his step, and there was a glint in his eye which didn't come out of a bottle.

"You're looking at the new Pete Monahan," he said.

"The old one was good enough for us," Jimmy murmured.

"I hear you've been off to the big city while I was in the pokey this month."

"We had a tryout with 'The Manhattan Follies,'" Patsy answered.

"How did it go?"

"We're no good without you, Pop," Jimmy said.

"We fell flat on our faces. Not that it can do much harm to our Irish maps," Patsy giggled.

"I'll bet you did," Pete said.

Back at the hotel they waited for him while he showered and dressed. They waited until the suspicious silence in the room next door roused them, and they threw the door open. The room was empty. There was no sign of Pete. There was nothing in the room except an old copy of Variety. They saw the headline.

MONAHAN KIDS SCORE IN MANHATTAN FOLLIES.

So Pete knew. He knew they had made a hit, and this was his way of giving them a free hand. Patsy picked up the paper feverishly. On the back page something was missing, part of a column. Jimmy matched the paper with the copy he had. The missing column told of actors and actresses needed for a big volunteer show for the soldiers.

Patsy yelled: "Come on! What are we waiting for?"

"Who's waiting?" Jimmy said.

They ran to the door.

It was quite a show. Out front they thought it was all planned and rehearsed. They thought it was part of the show when Pete Monahan turned up alone and started his act. They thought it was a prop smile that lit his face when Jimmy and Patsy came dancing out. And they still thought it was part of the act when Lil and Sheila came from the opposite wing. It looked rehearsed—the way Pete took Lil in his arms, and the way Jimmy held Sheila. But it wasn't an act.

Not to Pete.

Or to Jimmy.

let's face it

by Carol Carter, Beauty Editor

. . . a windblown disarray is fun for your pixie moments. Here's Paramount's pet gamine, Paulette Goddard, to prove my point. Your daily social life, however, demands a neatly coiffured head. Here are some suggestions for hair-do's to fit your particular facial type. And on p. 72 I've gathered together the low-down on how to shampoo and care for your own tresses, thus saving war-precious time and money.

SQUARE: Balance your resolute jaw with height and softness. You may gain height by a modified pomp, but it's even smarter today to keep your brow uncluttered. Brush hair into soft waves at the temples and draw it back over the ears. Avoid added width by keeping back hair neatly under control.

LONG: You have a happy choice of coifs. For sophisticated moments, part hair in the middle and sweep it up into wings over the temples. Weave back locks into a low bun or wear netted chignon. For less dressy occasions, brush your hair smooth on top and in loose waves that frame the face.

TRIANGULAR: The short, gamine cut is a youthful, all-season favorite with this type. Fluff the curls up at the temples and wear a feathery bang. Another style that accents heart-shaped faces is the upsweep. Swirl your curls up to one side and fasten them with split-tooth combs that prevent straggly ends.

ROUND: Your cherubic face will seem longer if you pile locks into an upsweep with a modified pomp. Keep hairline soft and varied to divert attention from rounded contours. You can wear the comfortable short cut, especially if you break the circular line with a deep wave at the forehead and a side part.

PERFECT OVAL: It's easy to wear any hair-do with an oval face, but fussy lines aren't flattering. The serene, smooth-top is your best bet. Part hair in center, brush back from your brow and let the waves cascade loosely. To look chic in a half-hat, maneuver your flowing mane into a sleek page boy or netted chignon.

Take them in combination with other food elements which authorities agree are necessary for best results!

All the world knows today that many people need extra vitamins for better health and keen vitality. It is also known today that vitamins do not work alone. They work as a team with certain other food elements. Hence, more and more, authorities are insisting "Take your vitamins in food!"

One of the reasons vitamins are so effective in Ovaltine is that Ovaltine is a concentrated all-round building food. It contains other food elements that enable vitamins and minerals to work together effectively as a team.

For example, Vitamin D can't do its complete job unless you have plenty of calcium and phosphorus, as found in a glass of Ovaltine made with milk. Vitamin A can't function fully unless you also have plenty of high-quality protein, such as Ovaltine supplies. Vitamin B₁ can't spark food into energy unless it has fuel-food to work on. To get this important "teamwork", doctors urge "Take your vitamins in food!"

Ovaltine also is the most delicious way to take your vitamins! And it costs very little for all it gives you! So why not turn to Ovaltine, as thousands are doing, for an easy, more delicious way to get the extra vitamins and minerals you need, for better health and all-round vitality!

3 OUT OF EVERY 4 PEOPLE need extra vitamins or minerals—according to Government reports. Reasons for this include vitamin deficiencies of many modern foods—also loss of vitamin-mineral values due to shipping, storing and cooking.

JAKE OF THE MARITIMES

hungry again—and happy. With Dick, enlistment in the merchant marine wasn't just an idea. It was a passion, a crusade, a cure to all ills and the answer to every prayer. When the lists closed down for a while, the world came to an end. When they re-opened for boys between 16 and 17½, he went wild with hope renewed. He had to be quick—17½ was right on top of him. A certain guy who knew the ropes said he'd try to help, and had cause to rue his kindness. Dick would get him out of the bathtub and off the golf course. "How's it coming?" He drove Henry Hathaway, director of "Wing and A Prayer," crazy. "Does this scene mean anything, or could I get off to go to the merchant marines?" At the enlistment station every time they looked up, there stood Dick Jaeckel, that lost-dog plea in his eyes.

Wait till he was 18? Not if he could help it! He wanted to be in a branch he liked, and at 18 you have no choice. Besides, all his friends were going in. Too darn lonely, hanging around by himself. He might even have to make another picture, which would be the last straw—

Yes, he definitely feels the same way about pictures. "Wing and A Prayer" wasn't as bad as "Guadalcanal," he got the hang of things better, and he met a lot of nice guys like Bill Eythe and Murray Alper. But he doesn't like acting. Acting's not reasonable. Maybe he'll feel different after the war, it all depends. He doesn't know what it depends on—just depends. Maybe after the war they won't want him back. Can't understand why they wanted him in the first place.

If it had been his cousin now. Dick hadn't seen his cousin in eight years. Just lately he was sent out to California—Ensign John Hanley, aged 20, good-looking as they come, the personality kid himself.

Dick's first name is Hanley, only nobody uses it except his mother. They took John to dinner at LaRue's. Lew Schreiber, 20th-Fox executive, came over to their table.

"I'd like you to meet Ensign Hanley," said Dick, very proud. Then he nudged Mr. Schreiber. "Say, don't you think you've got the wrong Hanley in pictures?"

He made "Wing and A Prayer" for two reasons—because Mom promised she'd sign his enlistment papers then, and because the fellows talked him into it. Doug Stahl, Tom Smith and Jay Richards are his closest pals. To them he's Jake—and since it's the name he prefers, let's call him by it. They're all JUGS—short for Just Us Guys, a club affiliated with the Y. And Jake's life is bound up with the JUGS.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Over twenty years ago I was visiting an uncle in that part of New York known as "Hell's Kitchen." One day I heard a terrific commotion outside, but as this was such a common occurrence, I ignored it. Then I heard a girl's voice shouting that no one could slap her kid brother and get away with it! I then opened the window just in time to see a blond-haired youngster of about eight beating up a boy at least three years her senior.

It was certainly a spunky and loyal thing to do, and I never forgot the name of Alice Leppert. Or do you know her as Alice Faye?

Peter Sardo,
Laureldale, Pa.

big jug . . .

At first they took his movie job as a joke. But it wasn't so funny to Jake, because he was stuck with it. He hated talking about it. When they tried to dig things out of him, he'd clam up. What bothered him most was the fellows'd kid about his being a millionaire. He hated being different from the other guys—having more money or more clothes or more anything—

So after "Guadalcanal" he quit the movies—got himself a job at Bireley's with Doug, and good riddance to acting. But by that time, the fellows' attitude had changed, they were proud of the kid, so they cooked up this deal to surprise him—

He always spent a lot of time at Doug's. They've been friends for six years, and Mrs. Stahl's the kind of mother you dream about. What she'd rather do than anything is feed boys. "If you don't eat at our house," she says, "I figure you don't like the cooking, so you don't get asked again."

Well, "Guadalcanal" was previewed at Grauman's Chinese Wednesday night. Naturally, they didn't have the kind of money it takes for a preview, so they cooked up this deal for Thursday, which was club night. There were eighteen JUGS left who weren't in the Army yet, and each guy chipped in 35 cents and gave Mrs. Stahl so many ration points. Doug kept Jake out front, playing catch, and the fellows sneaked in over the back fence. You should have seen Jake's face when Doug's mom called them in. What tickled him most was, it showed how the guys really felt.

"I think he'd like the picture business," says Doug, "if you got about five bucks a day like a truck driver. It's the idea that you're supposed to be famous and filthy rich—that's what gets him down—"

There was a quart of milk at each place, and even Mom Stahl was satisfied with the way food disappeared down those young gullets. That part of the program was fine with Jake. The second half pleased him less. They were bound for the Chinese, bent on showing Jake off it if killed him. Ritzy and conspicuous in blue jackets and white shirts, they paraded him along the aisle of the theater to a section down front. Heads turned. "Look, that's Dick Jaeckel—" Boy, was his face red, and did they get a bang out of it! All through the show he'd be trying to get up, and they'd keep shoving him back.

gangway for tomorrow . . .

Well, that was all right for clowning, but on the side Doug and Tom Smith got serious with Jake. "You're a darn fool," they told him, "if you don't get another picture under your belt, regardless of the guys razzing you. That doesn't mean a thing, they'd all like to be in your boots. Have some sense, Jake. Okay, so you hate it. But you might feel different after the war, and you'll stand a lot better chance to get back in, if more people know you. If you still feel the same, nobody can make you go back."

"I'm scared," said Jake. "I'm scared of getting caught some way—"

"How you gonna get caught? Your mom promised to sign the papers in April. She never went back on her word yet, did she? And another thing. If you don't like the money angle—"

His face cleared to a grin. "I know, really build a future—put it in War Bonds!"

So he did go back, and that's where most of his money went—into War Bonds. The only time he kind of splurged for a while was when he started taking The Girl out. (We promised Jake not to give her name away.) He'd been at the same school with her for two years, but didn't really get to know her till he was out. He was out a year ahead of his class, so he'd go back to see the guys, and that's when it happened. She's little—just the right size for him—and awfully pretty, with soft brown eyes and hair. He'd dash over to school on his lunch hour from Bireley's, and she'd ditch class, and they'd sit under a tree munching an apple or a blade of grass and she'd tell him her troubles. Mr. Anthony, he called himself.

Pretty soon she didn't seem to have any more troubles. But the fellows did. Because their girls made a point of telling them about the wonderful time Jake was showing his girl. So they had a little talk with him. "Better slow down, Jake. Our limit's two bucks a night, and our women are giving us the needle."

They didn't have to tell him twice. By that time it didn't matter anyway. The deal was cinched. The Girl liked him enough, so she didn't care where he took her.

They'd dance at the Palladium or the Casa Mañana. They're both terrific dancers. Jake has a step all his own that the guys try to copy but can't, his feet move too fast—

Sundays they'd all pile in Jake's car or Doug's and go down to the beach. Jake's a swell body surfer. Good at all sports, for that matter. Swimming, football, basketball. For his size, the guy really holds his own. Rainy Sundays, they'd sit around at Doug's house with cokes and fritos, listening to records. Jake bought every King Cole and Dave Rose record the minute they came out. You know how most modern records have rides in them, taken by one instrument. Well, each fellow'd pick a different instrument and take the ride as it came along. Jake picked the sax for King Cole, and the violin for Dave Rose. Shoulda seen him take that ride on "Holiday for Strings"—he really went to town—

He spent a lot of time with Doug and Tom Smith that last month. Doug was going into the Air Force, end of June. They'd take BB guns and .22's and go up the canyon to shoot frogs. Then back to Doug's for dinner. Among the six of 'em—including Mom and Dad Stahl and Doug's brother Charlie—they'd kill a leg of lamb and about a ton of mashed potatoes with gravy oozing out, and a huge lettuce and tomato salad and gallons of milk. Jake was always swiping everybody's milk. He'd drink his down and switch glasses, then they'd all start switching and arguing till nobody knew whose glass was whose, and Mom'd bring another pitcherful in from the kitchen. "That's it, boys," she'd say, beaming from ear to ear, "beyond what I salvaged for breakfast."

Then each guy'd have a pint of ice cream. They took it for granted that they had to eat themselves sick. Matter of fact, they'd eat the main course to the top and just stuff the rest into whatever space was left. Then they'd stagger up from the table and go play basketball.

loop-the-loopers . . .

Jake and his mom had a pact—they always spent Tuesday and Friday night together. She's young and nice-looking and smart, and he treats her more like a sister than anything else. Take clothes, for instance. She had to be dressed a certain way, or he'd come right out with it. "You don't look very glamorous, old lady," he'd say. And he hates crazy hats. "Sorry," he'd say, "but if you want me to take you out, you'll have to change hats." She did, too, and Jake always appreciated it. "You look sharp now, Mom."

They'd go to dinner and movies, and they loved riding the chutes and roller coasters at Venice and pitching three balls for a nickel, giggling like crazy when they'd make a strike. Practically furnished their beach house with the corny stuff they won pitching balls. Only thing Jake couldn't get her to do was go roller skating. "I'd lose my dignity," she'd say.

"What's a fall between friends? Be your age, Mom."

And she'd laugh and say, "That's what I'm trying to be."

Most ways, he could get around her though. She might fly off the handle, but it never amounted to much. Like here lately one night, she told him he had to be home at a certain time, or she wouldn't sign his papers. Well, things came up, and he just couldn't make it, not by a good couple of hours—

"Guess I'm in the Army," he sings out when he finally does walk in.

"You beat me to it," she calls back, and it sounds pretty grim.

So he grabs his leg and goes lumbering into her room and collapses on the bed like a man in utter agony—

Naturally she's scared. "Oh, you poor boy, what happened? What's wrong with your leg?"

"Nothing," he grins, "that the merchant marine won't fix."

She pretends to be sore, but he knows he's got her, practice has made perfect. You can't poor-boy a guy one minute and wreck his life the next.

All kidding aside, Mom would never have stood in his way. She knew what it meant to him. Must've been pretty wearing on her, watching him chase around, up today, down tomorrow. She'd prepare an extra-special nice dinner, and he wouldn't eat. That's no fun for a woman, but Jake couldn't help it. Too nervous to eat—

Till that Monday the phone call came telling him to report for a physical Wednesday. First he yipped around, then he started getting nervous again. Knew there couldn't be anything wrong with him, keeping fit was a kind of mania with Jake. But you're not really in till you're in. Tuesday night he couldn't sleep, kept watching the clock, was out at the crack of dawn—smooth sailing . . .

Wednesday night was different. He ate like a horse and gabbed like a poll-parrot. "Mom, for being so nice and signing all my papers, I'll leave you my car."

"That's sweet of you dear—" it's a hopped-up jaloppy, "—especially when you know I wouldn't be caught dead driving it."

"Well, you can pat it every once in a while. Yay, I'm a man of the maritime! Nothing wrong with this chicken."

"First kind word you've thrown me in weeks."

"True, very true. One more day in town, two more nights, four more meals. Ah, the maritime!"

"I know this won't do me any good, but—other boys stick around for a couple of weeks."

"Sorry, Mom, can't be done. If I go Friday, they'll give me my shots, and I'll have all day Sunday to get over 'em. Then Monday morning I can start practising how to move in at those beachheads."

They went to a movie, but didn't stay. Jake's head began bobbing and weaving, so Mom got him home to bed where he slept the sleep of the just till 9 next morning. That was a day—haircut, business affairs at the bank and studio, giving clothes away, buying a sleeping bag for a guy whose bag had been swiped out of Jake's car. Rushing home to get dressed, rushing down to pick up The Girl, taking her over to Ella Campbell's for dinner, taking her back to visit with Mom while he changed into other duds again—

Because it was club night, and you couldn't show yourself down there in anything but dirty corduroys and an old sweat shirt, for the JUGS, it's the thing. He took The Girl home first. She said, "Close your eyes, Jake," and when he opened them, there was a silver St. Christopher on a chain round his neck.

"Funny," she said, blinking her eyes very fast. "Till this minute I didn't really believe you were going."

Something in her voice made him feel panicky. "You—you're not going to cry, are you?"

She smiled instead. "Not now, anyway. The whole world's so sad. I think we should all take care of our own sadness. There's no sense in making it worse for somebody else."

All the way to the club he kept thinking how swell she was.

It was the last meeting. They were all breaking up to go into different branches of the service. Saturday night they were giving an Aloha dance. Jake was sorry he wouldn't be there, but not sorry enough to change his plans. Last meeting, Doug—who was president—said it would take about 200 dollars to put the dance on. He asked each guy who could to chip in five bucks. But they were still short dough—

Jake said good-by to the boys. Then—"Look, Doug, I—I'd like to give you a check for whatever you're short."

Doug couldn't help laughing. "You don't have to act so embarrassed about it. I think it's swell. So will the other guys—"

"They don't have to now. It's just between you and me."

"Okay, brother, make it out for fifty-five bucks. If we sell enough tickets, you might get it back."

"If you sell enough tickets, buy a bond for the JUGS."

He left at nine Friday morning. A friend had enlisted with him, and another friend was driving them both down. He took only a little toilet kit along.

"What, no lotions?" teased Mom. He owns fifty-seven varieties, they're his one luxury.

"Not for a maritimer!"

"I know one maritimer who'll be buying the PX out next week."

At his own request, she'd given him two leather photocases, the kind you can fold and slip into your pocket—one for her picture and that of his dead father, one for The Girl's. Now she brought out a long flat box. On its satin bed, lay one of those everything-proof wrist-watches—a beaut!

"Very, very reasonable," said Jake, nodding his head in solemn approval. He stuck his paw out. "You put it on." Their eyes met. It was a ticklish moment for a boy who doesn't like to show his feelings. "One wrist-watch," he grinned. "One silver St. Christopher. And my diamond tiara I'll only wear on formal occasions."

He grabbed her in a bear's hug. "So long, Mom. Keep the home fires burning—" and was gone.

Instead of practising how to take beachheads, he was stuck in the laundry that first week from six to five.

Later, he was sent to Alaska. By now he's undoubtedly somewhere else. X marks the spot. If you'd like to find it, go up and down the world with your ear to the ground. Sooner or later you'll hear an exultant, "Wheeee! I'm a maritimer!" That'll be Jake.

THE WOMEN IN HIS LIFE

"To be impulsive," grinned the triumphant Jess. "To come to Mocambo with me after the show. No—I don't think you're that impulsive."

"I have another date," countered Susan.

Jess lifted his shoulders and eyebrows in twin shrugs. "See. That's what I mean. You aren't impulsive enough to break your other date." And he walked away.

Susan bristled at the challenge. Of the girl working next to her she demanded, "Who is that man?"

"Are you kidding! That's Jess Barker, of course."

"I know that. But who is Jess Barker?" pursued Miss Hayward, growing more impulsive by the moment.

Who is Jess Barker?

He was born in Greenville, South Carolina, next to last in a family of five boys, to wit: William, John, James, Jess and Joseph. No girls at all.

Their mother was a practical nurse, their father a railroader—yard master, to be explicit — which automatically made the Barker kids the most envied characters in their set.

Jess, forbidden by his father to do such things, made it a Saturday night habit to slip down to the railroad yards and look wistfully (in his best Butch Jenkins manner) at all passing engineers. Engineers, being basically only boys grown tall, understood Jess' dearest desire. They gave him the wink, and the next thing anyone knew, Jess was pulling the whistle cord and chugging out of the yards, carefully concealed from his father's watchful eye. He saw a good deal of country from the cab of a locomotive. He would have seen more, but his business enterprises didn't allow him a surplus of time for traveling.

He hadn't yet started to school when he took on the responsibility of his first newspaper job: Delivering direct to the customer. The first time he was paid, he counted the silver over carefully—first grade arithmetic or no—and realized that he had made exactly one dollar and forty cents.

It was the riches of Araby. He jingled the coins in the pocket of his knickers, tasting the first jubilance of wealth. Like any generous man with dough in his doublet, he bethought him of his lady fair. He wanted to buy a gift.

He stopped at the shop of his choice and made a purchase. "Fifty cents," said the salesgirl, beaming down on her solemn-eyed customer. Jess gulped, but manfully counted out the dimes.

lollipop heaven . . .

Then he went home and banged the back door with unnecessary emphasis. After all, he was a wage earner and entitled to a demonstration of masculine authority. "Got paid," he said, before his mother could mention the slammed door. From his pockets he produced ninety proud cents and dropped it into his mother's apron. Then he handed her a box of sweets—fifty cents' worth of lithographed carton, bright red ribbon and indifferent chocolate—and said, clearing his throat, "Thought maybe you'd like some candy."

His mother said that he was a good boy and that she couldn't imagine what was wrong with her eyes—probably those onions she had been peeling for the stew.

Jess, having made le beau geste, managed to eat most of the candy himself although it actually wasn't his favorite brand. His choice, decided upon during the wonderful summer months spent at his grandfather's farm, was lollipops. He used to lie on a bench between two huge trees, and lick lollipops by the hour while he contemplated the green hula hands of the boughs, turning in a timeless dance against the blue sky.

During those lollipop sessions, Jess made plans for his future: He was going to be a very rich man some day. Rich enough so that he could buy his mother a box of candy costing a dollar fifty any time he wished. The lavishness of the notion usually startled him into remembering minutely how much money he had (1) in his penny bank, (2) in his dime bank, (3) on deposit in the city's most imposing banking house.

Jess always saved money. He became quietly famous in the bosom of his own family for his astounding thrift. Bill (eldest of the Barkers) came to him one day with a proposition. Bill needed a set of new tires for his car and was, at the moment, broke. He wanted to borrow a small sum from his generous and opulent brother, Jess.

"What do I get out of it?" queried the banker, running true to the celebrated form of financiers.

futurity date . . .

Bill scrutinized his ten-year-old brother. "As soon as you get a girl friend, you can borrow my car any time you want to and take her riding," he promised. He went into some of the glowing possibilities of an automobile ride with a girl friend.

"How do I know that you'll let me have the car any time I want it—when I'm sixteen and can really drive?" asked Jess.

"Well, let's have this understanding," explained Bill, "that you own one-half of the car. We're full partners. How's that?"

Jess gave it some thought, while Bill continued to pour on the soft soap. Finally, Jess agreed. It was easier than arguing. Three weeks later it developed

I SAW IT HAPPEN

You may have heard that Toronto audiences are never generous with their applause, even when they admire a performer, so when Francis Lederer, who was making a personal appearance tour at Shea's several years ago, was accorded a very lukewarm reception, I was terribly annoyed. So annoyed, in fact, that when I arrived home, I wrote him a note apologizing for our "reserved" attitude, and had my brother deliver it to him at the stage door the next day, Saturday.

The following Monday found me in bed with the flu so when the phone rang in the late morning, it was Mother who answered. I confess my temperature rose several degrees when I heard her exclaim, "Why, Mr. Lederer, Joan will be so surprised!" It was really he, calling to thank me for my interest and inviting me to visit him backstage the following week.

I couldn't make it, but Mother did, and in spite of the impatient secretary hovering over him, he spent precious time chatting with her (he even kissed her hand) and inscribing a large picture of himself, "To Joan, I am very grateful, Francis Lederer."

It's nice to know that old-world courtesy and graciousness hasn't completely died out.

that Jess' half of the car had burned out its battery; a new one had to be purchased. Jess agreed. A partnership was a partnership.

But the more he peered into the misty distance of six years, at the termination of which he would come into operating possession of a car rapidly falling to pieces, the more convinced he became that Measures to Safeguard His Investment should be taken. Quietly, he slipped around to talk to Bill's wife. The conversation ended with Jess, patently the possessor of true Barker persuasiveness, having borrowed back the full amount of his original loan to Bill from Bill's wife.

It is just as well that this involved financial transaction was completed long before maturity date. When Jess was only fourteen, he heard that a Shrine convention was to take place in Miami. Jess had heard—as who hasn't—a great deal about Shrine conventions.

As his gray-green glance watched the specials rolling down the main line, it occurred to him that here was a thing he shouldn't miss. He walked downtown slowly. At a haberdasher's he paused long enough to invest in a beige camel's hair cap; it came down over his ears, but it gave him a sense of touristing. Next, he visited the bank and drew out enough money for transportation by Pullman.

Then he went home and made an announcement. "I'm going to Florida." He didn't know how much dissension to expect.

"Well, don't eat a lot of silly things and get an upset stomach," said his mother practically. "And write to me regularly."

He wandered the streets of Miami with "Gosh" engraved in smiles across his face. The boom was on. The convention was on. The city bulged at the seams. "There's money to be made here," surmised Mr. Barker. He wandered into a drugstore where a harassed manager, with too much business and not enough help, buttonholed him. "Looking for a job?" gasped the manager.

Jess said he was.

The manager rushed him into a white jacket, cap and apron and thrust him behind a counter where other employees were behaving like citizens of an ant heap trying to transport a watermelon. Jess helpfully began to wash dishes while keeping an eye on genuine soda clerks. He learned, between sudsing glasses, how to assemble a cherry coke and a chocolate sundae. He found out where various supplies were kept.

Thus educated, he decided that he was ready to graduate to faucets and spigots. When an excessively pretty girl entered and sat down directly before him, Jess gave her the personality smile and asked, "May I serve you?"

"A chocolate malt with chocolate ice cream," said the Fascinating Face.

Jess felt his sawdust raining out through his heels. Just before the jacket, apron and cap collapsed with Mr. Barker, the girl said, "You're new, aren't you?"

He nodded. He moistened his lips and looked for the manager.

"Never mind," whispered the girl. "I'll tell you how to make the malt. Take that tall, shiny can and put in a dipper of milk, then . . ."

For an hour she sat there, sipping her malt and reciting recipes when customers appeared with appetites more elaborate than Jess had anticipated. She was there, on the same counter stool, at approximately the same hour the next day and the next.

Three years later, after having danced thousands of miles together, after having seen hundreds of movies, after having discussed everything from the stars in Orion's belt to the new waitress who filled all the MEN and women all over this country are reporting remarkable results in losing weight easily. Many lost 20 pounds a month and more. They are following the Easy Reducing Plan of Dr. Edward Parrish, well-known physician and editor, former chief of a U. S. Military hospital and a state public health officer.

Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan makes reducing a pleasure because it has NO STRICT DIETS, requires no exercises. HARMLESS, too, because it calls for no reducing drugs.

Here is Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan EXACTLY as given over the air to millions: for lunch take 2 teaspoonfuls of CAL-PAR in a glass of juice, water or any beverage. Take nothing else for lunch except a cup of coffee, if desired. For breakfast and dinner EAT AS YOU USUALLY DO, but eat sensibly. Don't cut out fatty, starchy foods—just cut down on them. By following Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan, you cut down your daily caloric intake, thus losing weight naturally. You needn't suffer a single hungry moment. CAL-PAR is not a harmful reducing drug. It is a special dietary product; fortifying your diet with certain essential minerals and vitamins. Most overweight people are helped by Dr. Parrish's Easy Reducing Plan. Try it and you and your friends will marvel at the vast improvement in your figure.

salt shakers with sugar, they got around to talking about themselves.

"When are you going to get married?" the girl inquired academically.

"When I'm making a hundred dollars a week," decided Jess.

This shattering practicality smote heavily on a 17-year-old girl's romantic nature. She laughed in the Barker face. "You'll never be earning that much money," she chortled. "Never."

She should have known better than to challenge a Barker. Three days later, Jess told her, "I'll get in touch with you when I'm making a hundred a week," and caught the next train out of Miami. Not, however, before he had given the source of his required weekly stipend some serious thought.

sold short . . .

Wall Street, he decided, was his pigeon. Every picture he had seen, every book he had read, contained references to boy wizards who were able to run a porter's tip into a trillion.

Briskly, he applied for a job at a famous brokerage house. Yes, they said, they actually did have an opening for a likely lad. He would start as board boy, wearing earphones and chalking market quotations. The salary? The usual thing—fifteen dollars a week.

Jess stalked out of the establishment. He had been earning twenty behind a soda fountain; he certainly wasn't going to trade customers chewing sandwiches, for customers chewing pencils—and sacrifice five dollars in the bargain. Promptly he looked over the local eatery situation, found what he considered one of the busiest intersections in the world and applied to the fountain manager.

Before long he had parlayed a soda straw into sixty dollars a week—still forty short of his goal, but not bad at all under the circumstances. There were others in the same company who noticed that Jess was doing okay, so a meeting was held at which several co-workers suggested that at the end of each day all tips received be pooled, then divided evenly.

As Jess, by giving phenomenally good service, had worked himself into a condition of physique best described by the fact that he could have hidden behind a telephone post while carrying a sleeping bag, considered pooling unfair, and said so. He added that if the system were put into effect, he would quit. He had enough in the bank to tide himself over for quite a period, and—in addition—another opportunity was looming on the horizon; an opportunity that contained great promise of shattering that hundred dollar per week mark. Eventually, at least.

A man living in the same building with him had suggested repeatedly that Jess read lines for a woman who was quite celebrated as a drama coach. The friend thought Jess possessed the indefinable stuff of which actors are made.

silence is silver . . .

From this particular school had come Clark Gable and Irene Dunne. Later students were Marsha Hunt, Jeffrey Lynn, John Sheppard and Cornel Wilde.

Jess read lines and enrolled in the school. After three months' training he secured his first part. The director of the play for which Jess was auditioning fixed that young man with a seer's eye and wanted to know, "Can you read lines?"

Jess said he thought he could, he had been studying. The director supplied a script, and Jess did his best. Apparently the director was pleased, because he nodded vigorously. "Fine," he said.

So the first part Jess ever played was a brown-stained native boy who crossed the stage carrying a basket of fish—and never said a word!

That experience was followed by summer stock in Lowell, Massachusetts, then a job with a repertory theater in New Jersey. After having played nearly a hundred roles in outlying theaters, he was signed for a Broadway appearance—the Jimmie Stewart part of "You Can't Take It With You."

Whereupon, Jess was spotted and signed by Walter Wanger. (The following phase of Jess' career has been, until now, a closely guarded secret.) He came, a bewildered character, into the Hollywood scene and remained long enough to speak a very few lines in two B-minus pictures. Then he gave up and returned to New York.

One night after his return to the East Coast, he sat down with his mathematics long enough to determine that the lines he had spoken under contract in California had cost his studio something like seven hundred dollars a word. Wistfully he wished that he might relate this fantastic news to the little girl who had once questioned his earning ability. Of course, the word rate hadn't been very steady, but then neither is a roller coaster—and think of the fun you have. However, he had lost touch with his earliest critic, so his belated triumph was denied him.

IT'S NOT JUNE IN JANUARY

But it's practically Christmas in July. No, December 25th will still be Christmas back home here, but if we want to make sure that our fellas overseas really have a Merry Christmas with all the trimmin's, we'd better start thinking about it—and pronto! The Post Office Department is asking us to please, but please, make sure that all holiday gifts get sent out by September 15th and no later than October 15th. The regulations on size, weight, packing, etc., are the same as always, but no need for a letter of request.

So looky, if you think Bill is having enough of a show out there without being bothered with presents, o. k. But if he's just a plain joe homesick for the States and you, a carefully bought gift, well-wrapped and arriving at the Nick of time will do a heck of a lot to prove to him that we realize that it isn't always our morale that needs the boosting!

After several more Broadway roles, Jess was cast in a play entitled "Magic." No one seems to have heard much about it, but a Columbia talent scout was in the audience opening night and—at sight of Mr. Barker—uttered contract noises to the head office in an urgent telegram. The next thing Jess knew he was back again in Hollywood, keeping it a profound secret that this was his second trip.

He established himself in a small apartment amid a large circle of friends. Wherever he went, he encountered persons he had known in New York, many of them girls from the theater. Now if Jess is one thing more than another, it's convivial. When he wasn't squiring some lovely, he was showing up at the Canteen to act as emcee. So successful were his Friday night appearances that some bright mind asked him to introduce Tuesday night's entertainment, too. Which he promptly agreed to do.

Then, one Friday night last November, Susan Hayward was working at the Canteen when a tall, blond chap with an ingratiating smile abruptly appeared before

Mrs. John A. Roosevelt

The youngest daughter-in-law of America's first family is gifted with a lovely complexion and exquisite taste. She likes her make-up to look very soft . . . very casual . . . but perfect. "I believe that the best possible base for make-up is a smoother, fresher skin," Mrs. Roosevelt says. "So—three or four times a week—I give myself a 1-Minute Mask."

Swift beauty lift... 1-Minute Mask

Mrs. John A. Roosevelt—devotee of a 1-Minute Mask with Pond's Vanishing Cream

How to "pretty up" your complexion with the 1-Minute Mask

Cover your whole face—except eyes—with Pond's Vanishing Cream.

Leave the Mask on just one minute—for "Keratolytic" action to take place. Tiny skin roughnesses and imbedded dirt particles are loosened . . . dissolved! Now tissue off the mask.

Look at your skin. See how much clearer it seems. How much lighter . . . smoother. Your entire face has the supple, silky finish that takes and keeps make-up superbly!

For quick-as-a-wink powder base . . .

a very thin film of Pond's Vanishing Cream—left on. Not greasy . . . not drying—a genius at holding powder!

IMPORTANT! Conserve glass, manpower—buy one large jar of Pond's instead of several smaller ones.

her to say, "Well, are you really impulsive?"

Susan decided that she was. She begged out of her "date"—not a difficult feat—by sitting in the telephone booth for a few minutes to give the proper impression—and was off to Mocambo with Jess.

She discovered that he was a phenomenal dancer and that he knew more people than a chatterbox could name in ninety minutes. She discovered also that he wanted her phone number. Not the number of her agent—the usual dodge practiced by stars—but her personal dial combo. "No," said Miss Hayward, being conservative, "I'll see you at the Canteen."

where there's a will . . .

The next evening Miss Hayward's guarded private number rang loudly. "Hello," said Susan. "Hello," said Jess. "How about having dinner with me?"

The lady said no.

She said no for three days. The following Friday night at the Canteen, she looked up to see the same wistful pan staring at her. "I don't think you're that impulsive," said he persistently.

Susan laughed. "Oh, you!" she said.

Jess knew then that he had won; they've been a love match ever since.

Before their marriage they used to hang out at Schwab's, where Jess observed the soda department with a connoisseur's eye; they went dancing; they visited friends. Susan had ample opportunity to get acquainted with Jess' spectacular sense of humor. At a party one night after "Cover Girl" had been released, Jess met Otto Kruger. As you remember, Jess played Mr. Kruger as a boy in the picture. "I want to congratulate you on your splendid performance," said Jess with a straight face. "The scenes in which you were a young man were my favorites." That brought down the house.

Early this summer they threw local columnists into a panic by pricing a ring displayed in a window; nothing serious, they were just curious about it. Some fanciful jeweler telephoned a daily paper with the announcement that Jess and Susan appeared to be contemplating matrimony. By three o'clock, this mild rumor had burgeoned into the wild statement that Jess and Susan had eloped over the week-end.

During the week of July twenty-third new marriage rumors cropped up. And this time they were true. The following Sunday they were married in a small church ceremony in Hollywood.

The best wishes of all Hollywood go out to them, and well may they deserve them. Susan is a girl any man would be proud to take to an Ambassador's Ball, and that Barker Boy is strictly the gallant from Greenville.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Victor Mature was appearing in person at a Cleveland theater, and I was waiting outside the stage door to catch a glimpse of him. Having nothing else to do, I borrowed some chalk from my girl friend and started to write my name on the theater wall. Soon, I heard someone clear his throat, and whirling around, I saw a tall, handsome Coast Guardsman—Mr. Mature! He'd been watching me all the time.

"Here's a dime, youngster," he grinned. "Buy some more chalk and start writing my name all over the place."

And I would have, too, if my hands could have stopped shaking!

HI, MONICA!

says Paul, striving for conviction.

"Strange. What did it revolve around?"

That's the only difference between them. Lisl worships unblushingly. Paul pretends to cling to a shred of masculine objectivity. Till his daughter appears, rosy and tumbled from her nap, stretching to get out of Lutzi's arms into his. Then all pretense crumbles. Then his face is flooded with such tenderness that you no longer even want to kid him about it.

"This," he says, "is one of her papa-days."

Like any mother, Lisl glories in the love between her husband and her child. Just to stir things up, she pretends she's jealous. Paul explains gravely that Monica has her papa and mamma-days. Days when she's specially devoted to one or the other. As a matter of fact, it was Lisl who had the head start. Paul's just begun to catch up with her . . .

"Now she comes to an age," says Lisl, "where the man is more attractive—"

"Now I'm on vacation," says Paul, "so we have time to play."

porcelain and poppa . . .

There's not much a man can do for a girl before she's reached the age of one. He can hold her of course, but—

"She's so tiny," said Paul, as Lisl laid her into his arms.

"You're frightened. You hold her like porcelain."

"I'm not frightened!"

"Then why is your forehead sweating?"

"Because it's hot."

He was working then and had worked almost constantly for over a year. "Devotion," "In Our Time," "Between Two Worlds," "The Conspirators" followed each other in rapid succession. If he was lucky, he'd get home in time to see Monica bathed. Lisl did a good job, but Lutzi—who used to be Lisl's nurse—was the expert. It was something like a work of art—her sure, deft, gentle way with the squirming little body.

"Ach, it's nothing," she'd say. "Here, you can do it, too."

He'd back away. "I'm a spectator sport." That was Lutzi's favorite joke. She'd chuckle as hard the hundredth time as the first.

But if Paul couldn't bathe her, Lutzi couldn't take her picture. That's where papa shone. He's the kind of amateur who does professional work, and his pictures of Monica from the age of one week on fill albums and albums. He could also buy her things. No girl's ever too young for that. A charming doll in crisp organdie—because it was called a Monica-doll. A violet-sprayed cup and saucer—because she was born in April, the month of violets. He's practical, too—heard Lisl complain of wartime safety pins and how they didn't hold, so he went out and ordered a couple dozen that did hold.

Another purchase was less inspired. One evening Lisl was bemoaning the rubber situation. It sounded terribly sad, and it made a deep impression on Paul. Next day he went into conference with a pal on the set, whose baby is about Monica's age—

"What does your wife do about rubber?"

"Pants, you mean? Say, there's a shop in the valley still carries that stuff. Want me to take you there?"

They dashed out during lunch hour, Paul in his make-up. Yes, they still had a few pair of pants and some sheeting. In black and pink. Better take the black,

Mr. Henreid. Much better quality. Pink stuff's flimsy. Can't recommend it. Black'll wear like iron—

He walked in that night with the tread of a conqueror, and the parcel under his arm. They told him he was wonderful. They made such a fuss over him and his black rubber that he practically purred. When the door closed behind him, only two words were spoken. "Ach, men!" said Lutzi. Lisl stuffed the parcel into a dark corner of the closet, where it lies to this day. Rubber or no rubber, who could use black for a baby!

Under the eyes of an adoring household, she grew from a morsel that ate and slept and gugged, to a personality. She accepts adoration sweetly, but if you don't adore her, that's all right with her, too. Take Maxi, for instance. Maxi's getting old and can't be bothered and goes G-r-r. She accepts that, too. All other dogs are Wah-wah—including Vicki, the gentle cocker spaniel. Maxi is G-r-r-, and she loves him just the same.

She's made friends with all the neighborhood children. Among her favorites are Pat O'Brien's younger son and 5-year-old Jill Schary. "Hi, Santa Monica!" they hail her. "Hi!" she calls back. Her name has nothing to do with the name of the town. Lisl's always wanted a blonde daughter named Monica—blonde, because Pauli was so fair as a child, Monica because it seemed to her such a happy name. Throughout their marriage, Lisl's been in the habit of saying, "When Monica comes—" It was just a pleasant coincidence that she should have come to their home near Santa Monica. And another coincidence that she should have been christened in a little church called St. Paul's.

Last April she had her first birthday. Paul was very sad, says Lisl, because he was working in "The Conspirators" and couldn't be there.

"Can't you tell Jack Warner that your baby has a birthday, and you have to come back?"

"Yes. I can also tell you what Jack Warner will say to me!"

"Never mind. I'll fix the table so you can see it before you go."

There's a lovely fenced-in enclosure on the grounds known as Monica's garden. That's where they had the party—with ice cream and a one-candle cake and Monica's friends round the table and Lutzi looking after them. Lutzi's a prime favorite. Next day little Jill Schary paid a formal call on Lisl—

"I have something important to ask you. Monica's growing now, and pretty soon you won't need a nurse. But when I get married, I'll need a nurse for my baby. So I'd like to book Lutzi now if it's all the same to you."

Paul's always had definite ideas on the training of children. He used to enlarge on them. "My child will be brought up as I was brought up. In the nursery. If we have guests, I don't want them bothered with a baby. I don't want a baby at the table when I eat. It disturbs me, and it disturbs the child."

turn-about tyke . . .

"You're perfectly right," said Lisl.

So from the time she's been big enough to sit in a high chair, Monica's had breakfast with her father. At first he offered excuses. After all, he was working. This was his only chance to see the child. Now it's an established routine, without excuses. They look at the paper together. Monica picks out the wah-wahs and peepees (birds) in the funnies. She likes to experiment with food—especially the other fellow's. "Dan-ke!" she says, her head bobbing froward on the ke. Thanks to Lutzi's sketchy English, the baby's bilingual. But she puts the cart before the horse. With her, danke means not thank you, but she'd like some of that, please. Paul gives her a scrap of bacon or buttered toast. Or he says, "Br-r-r!" Which means—it's no good, you don't want it.

"Br-r-r!" agrees Monica amiably and asks for something else.

Since he's been on vacation, Paul's placed himself largely at her disposal. They play the piano together and sing "Mary, Mary." They go swimming in the pool or take a little drive to the beach or the corner drugstore—where Paul feeds her vanilla ice cream. Once he took her shopping.

He likes to give presents without a reason—because he feels like it, not because it's a birthday. Something catches his eye in a shop window—"That would be a wonderful Christmas gift for Lisl." But he can't wait till Christmas, so he gives it to her in June. Special occasions are a club over your head. Gifts should be given by the heart, not the calendar—

So one day he felt like buying Monica a present. Lutzi went along. They did get the baby a car-seat, but Lutzi took one look and made like a stricken doe. "Laps are better for babies. I am Monica's lap." So the car-seat languishes in the garage.

You see, we thought if we ran a slew of 'em, they would show you better than words just the sort of thing we're looking for. It could have happened at a Bond Rally, a drive-in, school, the grocer's on Main Street; you could have heard about it from Janie next door or Great-Aunt Matilda in Kalamazoo. But whatever, send it in, and honest gosh, if we think the rest of the gang would like to hear it, we'll dress it up and scrub its face and plunk your name smack in the middle of MODERN SCREEN*—and on your five dollar check!*

"I want something for Monica," Paul told the girl in the shop. "A little ring or brooch maybe."

She brought out a tray. Lutzi's eye lighted on a thin gold chain with three pearls—the kind you add to. "This is wonderful, Monica. You collect this."

"B-r-r-!" said Monica.

Paul offered her a ring. She waved it away. He found a small bowknot brooch, exquisitely worked. "Will you have this?" he asked politely as he'd ask any lady.

"Wah-wah!" she cried, making a dive for a little dog-brooch.

"Br-r-r!" brrrd Lutzi, and dangled the chain. "See how beautiful, Monica."

But you couldn't pry her loose from her dog-brooch.

In the door of their home, two o the Kellys greet us with a smile Gene, M-G-M's dancing, actin sensation; Kerry, his pride and joy

Betsy, the third member of the trio, invites her husband to sample the cookies she's baked for Kerry. Gene starts next in "Ziegfeld Follies."

What's Cookin' America

By Nancy Wood

For the fourth in this food series of ours we proudly present THE 3 KELLYS

■ An emphatic and unequivocal "NO!" greeted the request with which we started our recent interview with Gene Kelly. You see—knowing that Gene originally came from the Keystone State—we had hoped he could tell us something about Pennsylvania Dutch food specialties for our series on the Regional Recipes of the Stars.

"Not me!" demurred Gene, side-stepping the issue with a degree of speed that reminded us of nothing so much as his agility in the "Alter Ego Dance" in Columbia's "Cover Girl."

"You forget," he went on, with an Irish twinkle in his eyes, "the name is K-E-double-L-Y. Of the Pittsburgh Kellys. And what would the likes of them be knowing about the Dutch?"

As for any dishes that are traditionally favored in Allegheny County, well the only one Gene could recall, offhand, was Puff Balls! These grow wild in the woods of Pennsylvania and Ohio, it seems, and are eaten sliced and fried in butter. But since they must be chosen with utmost care, as some varieties are poisonous, we decided not to dwell on this subject but to proceed to other matters.

Fortunately for us, Gene subscribes to the oft-heard statement, "Never call an Irishman a quitter!" So, though professing to know nothing about the dishes preferred in the particular region from which he hails, Gene did go on to give us his all-round favorites which we know would get feature billing on food programs everywhere!

In this culinary "act" he had the enthusiastic support of his charming wife, Betsy. Once a promising actress on the stage back in New York where they met and married, Mrs. Kelly is now more than content to devote herself to the welfare of her husband and their adored and adorable daughter, Kerry.

As to the foods of which they spoke and for which we secured the recipes, well, first and foremost there was Irish Stew. Naturally! Not that all Irishmen will necessarily like his version, Gene pointed out . . . since there are almost as many types of Irish stew as there are of Irishmen who demand this dish as their inalienable right! The Kelly-style stew calls for lamb, potatoes, carrots and frequently dumplings. No peas or parsnips, mind you, but plenty of turnips as they contend this vegetable is the most important flavoring adjunct in this famous dish. Mrs. Kelly also adds two large lamb bones to the pot to improve the flavor of the broth.

Kellyfornia Beans are another versatile main course feature at the Kelly dinner table, we were told.

But where the Kellys really went to town was on desserts. First Super Shells—which are special fruit tarts the size of coffee cups because Gene objects to "sample size" portions. Offered as a sort of culinary Pas de Deux, the pastry that goes into these shells is also used for Lattice Apple Pie which is Gene's favorite sweet—not only for dinner but also at breakfast! (A staunch believer in large breakfasts, anyway, Gene often tops off the first meal of the day with a couple of pieces of candy! He feels that candy is an important source of energy, which he realizes he needs for his Terpsichorean activities.)

A big favorite with this family are refrigerator cookies . . . convenient to have on hand for quick cooking . . . easy on ration points . . . fine for Kerry in a simplified version . . . therefore named in her honor.

"Wah-wah!" sneered Lutzi riding home. "And you could have had pearls!"

But Monica knows what she wants all right. The same thing happened with Lisl, who took her along to buy Paul a key-chain for Father's Day. He really needed a key-chain. But Monica preferred a little silver frame, which now stands on her father's bed-table with her picture in it. "Love from Monica to Daddy," it says. He also carries her picture in a locket on his money-clip. Insists he doesn't show it to people. Not unless they ask him.

bountiful bunnies . . .

The upper floor of the house belongs to Lutzi and Monica. Paul risked life and limb to climb out on the roof and hang a bamboo shade over the big bedroom window for added coolness. He had an idea for the nursery, too. It's papered most of the way. "But let's paint it as high as a baby's arm can reach. Then she can make fingermarks, and it won't be a minor domestic tragedy." There's a shelf of honor for bunnies, sent to Monica by kind friends all over the country. That's because Paul told an interviewer once that rabbits were his luck-bringers. He still owns the one Lisl gave him for his make-up table soon after they met.

The baby's favorite toy is a duck-on-a-stick. That's what Paul says.

"Actually," says Lisl, "it's his favorite toy. Monica humors him."

They push it together, Monica in front. First, the duck just walks. Then you turn something, and he jumps. Then you turn something else, and he waddles. Monica screams with joy. Paul casts a smug sidelong glance at Lisl—

"Ah yes, but you didn't see her wink at me behind your back."

On Lutzi's dresser stands a beautiful Viennese clock in the shape of a crystal sphere. Years ago, baby Lisl learned to tell time by it. Baby Monica will learn by the same old clock, and the same old nurse will teach her. A Rubens angel hangs over her bed between two silly-looking ducks. She can take her choice between art and comedy. In music, art lost out. She used to love Viennese waltzes. Now she's all for jazz. Her parents have discovered how to send her to sleep happy. When they used to just walk out on her, she'd whimper—couldn't bear to see them go. One night Paul grabbed Lisl and jitterbugged out with her. That did the trick. Sorrow was drowned in glee. Now Monica gets her floor-show every night.

hi'ing henreid . . .

It must be admitted that at bedtime she behaves better for Lutzi than anyone else. But once a week Lutzi goes to the movies. Not till her darling's asleep, but it happens sometimes that she wakes up when Lutzi's gone—

There's one night the Henreids won't soon forget. The baby woke up, and how she woke up. Sleep was the farthest thing from her mind. "Hi!" she kept calling. "Hi, hi, hi!"

Mama and papa were about to sit down to dinner with a guest. Papa went up. Monica knows he's an easy mark. If a smile doesn't fix him, a kiss works wonders. Her arms went round his neck and clung, so naturally he had to pick her up. She reached toward the bathroom door, where her flannel robe hangs. That means she's ready to make a night of it. So No-Babies-at-the-Table Henreid got her into her robe and took her downstairs.

"She couldn't sleep," he explained.

After dinner, Lisl took over. "Now she's got to be tired, she's got to sleep." Paul and his friend sat down to a game of chess. When you play chess, time passes unheeded. At ten o'clock Paul's eye fell on his watch. Where in heaven's name was Lisl? He ran upstairs—

"Hi!" said his daughter brightly.

His wife said nothing. She was crying. He felt terribly sorry for her. "You go down and relax, and I'll put her to sleep—"

"You'll never get her to sleep, and what will Lutzi say when she comes home?"

Paul summoned psychology to his aid. He paced the floor with his child and sang the first three bars of the "Brahms Lullaby" over and over again "—la-la-lah, la-la-lah, la-la-lah-la-la-lah—." She liked that—she liked it so much that she started singing it with him. "La-la-lah," said Paul. "Aa-aa-aah," crooned Monica. His arms went stiff, because he was afraid to shift her, and his throat went dry. At last the obbligato faltered—the lids fluttered—or was it a mirage? No, she was asleep. But would she stay asleep if he put her down? At this point, he was taking no chances. "Up-and-down, back-and-forth, la-la-lah-la-la-lala—"

When he finally reappeared, Lisl offered to pin a medal on him.

"Just a little liniment for my arms instead. And do me a favor, Lisl. Next time you play the 'Brahms Lullaby,' skip the first three bars."

But even at the cost of singing her to sleep every night, he'd still like to keep her the way she is. "One year more and then they start to go away from you."

"Pauli," explains Lisl, "would like to skip 3 to 16, and then reappear when Monica will be very good-looking, and he can take her to the Mocambo. All the trouble in between I can handle."

Today is enough for Lisl. Paul plans for the future.

"When she's twelve or thirteen, she goes East to school. To broaden her outlook. To make her understand that Hollywood isn't the world."

"I don't listen," says Lisl tranquilly. "I look only for the next eight days—or at most, three months."

Paul continues gazing into his crystal ball. "A year in Switzerland, maybe."

"Certainly. If the whole family moves to Switzerland for a year."

This "whole-family" business brings up another point. Just as she used to say, "When Monica comes—" Lisl now says, "When we have Mimi." Paul's not so sure. He's so crazy about this one that he can't imagine giving his heart to another. Lisl has more imagination. Also more realism not to mention an unquenchable maternal spirit—

"It's not good for a child to be brought up alone. Anyway, you said it was wonderful when you saw that picture of a man with 23 children."

"Darling, your memory is poor. I said astonishing."

"Well, I only want six. But," she adds hastily, "we'll settle now for two."

"What do you mean by now?"

"By now, I mean now. What will be in three years, who can say?"

Our bets are on Lisl. There's a third room upstairs that's going to be Monica's room, when Mimi comes along—

Meantime, Monica rules the roost. "So many people thought we'd be silly about her," says Lisl.

"But we're completely normal," says Paul.

"Of course. You don't show people her picture. Unless they ask."

"And you sometimes talk about other things. If you must."

"Hi!" calls a voice from the garden.

Lisl jumps up. Paul grins. "Let's be silly," he says, tucking her hand through his arm. And they go out together toward the sunlight and Monica.

Gloria Vanderbilt De Cicco

in Dreamflower "Rachel"

Exotic and tremendously vivid—these are the words that seem to describe best the extraordinary beauty of Gloria Vanderbilt De Cicco. Her features are fascinatingly unconventional. Her velvet-black eyes and hair contrast strikingly with the smooth ivory of her complexion—soft-misted and glorified by Pond's Dreamflower "Rachel" powder. "For girls with coloring like mine, Dreamflower 'Rachel' is simply unbelievable!" says the young American heiress. "I can't get over the lovely smooth creamy look it gives my face!"

New Pond's "Lips" shade!

Super-exciting news about "Lips"! It's a gorgeous new shade—rich, round, rosy crimson. Its name—

THE MORE WOMEN AT WORK—THE SOONER WE WIN!

NUTTY BUT NICE

He keeps at it till friends begin to drop in—intimates of the house like Betty Kaplan and the Ken Niles with their two nice youngsters. Scotch and Soda go dashing round the pool, barking like mad every time someone dives off the board. Once, Soda got too close to the edge and toppled in—

"Save him, save him!" yelled Jane.

Ronnie dropped a soothing hand on her shoulder. "Honey, that's a dog. He's not like you, he knows how to swim."

Preparations for supper get under way. A long table's set in the patio for the grown-ups, a small one for the three children. Jane runs in and out of the kitchen, helping Velma. "See to it that Maureen eats, will you, boys? She's not very good at it—"

Wendell and Dennis, 11 and 9, take their responsibility seriously. "She couldn't eat all that dinner, a little girl like that."

"I should say not. Only a big girl could eat it. Or else a boy."

"I can too eat it!"

"Okay, we'll race you."

Jane would like to pin a decoration on the boys, or kiss them. When they see Maureen lagging, they drop some food back on their plates, so she can win the race. Presently, Ronnie passes the table. The boys are deep in a discussion of baseball. Chin in hand, Maureen listens raptly without the vaguest idea of what they're talking about—

"What goes on over there?" Jane asks.

"Not a thing to worry about. Your daughter knows how to handle her men."

If it's Nanny's day off, Jane leaves her guests to get Maureen ready for bed. The big treat's a bubble bath in Mummy's tub. Then Ronnie comes up. One night for their child's diversion, he and Jane went into a corny old Foy routine—

"Hello, Joe, whaddayaknow?"
"Just got back from a vaudeville show."
"Can you sing and dance?"
"I'll take a chance."
"Well, all right, let's go—"

That went over, but big. Maureen clamored for it whenever Daddy came home. Now she does it for them, the little ham. Sits them down and takes both parts herself. "Just got back from a *water*bill show," she carols. And when she goes into the dance—a little thing she ran up herself in very odd moments—strangled sounds issue from her parents' throats which they cover up with vigorous applause.

"my soul to keep." . . .

Then come prayers. Maureen bows her head, but keeps her eyes open so she can look at Grandpa Reagan's picture. Sometimes she holds it herself, sometimes she gives it to her doll to hold. Because Grandpa Reagan, who went to heaven when she was a tiny baby, loves her very much and always listens with God to her prayers. If she's good, that is. If she's been naughty, he feels sad and has to close the door.

Another good thing about Sunday is she can have breakfast with Daddy Monday morning.

"Daddy," she said, eyeing him fondly on one such occasion, "you're a jerk—"

Ronnie has his own inimitable way of handling such crises. "That's fine. Now I'll tell you something. You're a jerk, too. And I'll tell you another thing. Don't ever call anyone else a jerk. We'll be the only jerks in the world, just you and I—"

When Jane came down—"Mummy, you know what? You're a button-nose bunny, and Nanny's little woolly lamb, and Velma's a chickadee. But look at Daddy and me," she crowed. "We're a couple of jerks—"

Mother's Day was a very special Sunday. In her blue and white dress and little straw hat, Maureen was presented to the church. The minister—who married Jane and Ronnie five years ago—gave her a certificate, and a pink rose for her mother.

"That's from the minister, not from me—" If she said it once, she said it five dozen times on the way home, blinking furiously at Daddy and giggling her head off. It was all very subtle—

She couldn't wait to scramble out of the car and up to her mother's bedroom. Jane found her standing breathless beside a package. "Here's my muzzer's day present from me—" When she's excited, it comes out muzzer.

Muzzer opened the box. A black nightgown. If there's anything Jane detests, it's a black nightgown. Strictly the Fuiji-silk pajama type, that's Jane.

"My, you're going to look pretty in that," cooed Maureen.

Stifling a groan, muzzer went into the proper ecstasies. Ronnie's face came edging round the door and met a dirty look.

"Don't look at me. She picked it with her own little hatchet."

three for one . . .

Jane dislikes waste. A week or so later, she approached her daughter tactfully. "That's a beautiful present you bought me, but you know what we could do with it? We could take it back and buy three presents instead—one for me, one for Daddy—"

"And one for Maureen."

Blissfully unaware that her feelings should have been hurt, she was enchanted with the whole transaction. They bought robes and pajamas for themselves and pajamas for Daddy.

Jane and Ronnie feel strongly about teaching her the value of money. For services rendered, she gets a nickel—called a big penny—which she puts in her bank. But she knows how to steer an occasional windfall her way. Two cents clutched in her palm, she'll inquire wistfully: "How many little pennies does it take to make a big penny?" That's generally good for a handout from Mummy or Daddy. She's not allowed to take money from anyone else.

But she's found that wealth entails responsibilities. "I want a new pair of shoes," she announced one day.

"Fine," said Jane, "if you've got the money to pay for them."

"I'll ask Daddy—"

"Daddy buys things you need, not things you just want."

"Nana's got money."

"Nana needs her own money to pay for her own shoes."

A long pause. "Oh, well—I'll pay for them."

That started it. She discovered that if saving was nice, spending was nicer. Now she saves with a purpose. "Guess I'll take my two grannies out to lunch." The bank disgorges three dollars. You can't cheat on Maureen. If she's taking you out to lunch, she foots the bill. So they go to the Tick-Tock, where the 75-cent table d'hote is so good that you have to wait on line for an hour. As hostess, Maureen keeps her grannies' spirits up. "Oh my," she burbles at two-minute intervals, "what a fine lunch we're going to have bimeby."

Part of her income's derived from housework—picking up toys, setting dolls straight, trotting at Nanny's heels in a helpful way. Nanny takes care of her own room and Maureen's. Jane takes care of hers. Otherwise, Velma would have too much to do. Because Cliff, Velma's husband, works only part time for the Reagans now. And part time for the railroad, doing his share to ease the labor shortage. He comes and goes, and they call him Casey Jones.

"You off now, Casey?"

"Casey's off now, Miss Maureen."

"Well, don't worry, I'll take care of the house."

For months now, Jane's been getting up at 5:30. A change has come over the status of Miss Wyman of Warner Brothers. There was a time when she hadn't enough to do, when she wailed for work. Since "Animal Kingdom" she hasn't stopped working. Since "Make Your Own Bed" she's been a star. Ann Sheridan says she'll be the talk of the town when "The Doughgirls" comes out.

Of course she's pleased, who wouldn't be? Some reach stardom quickly. She made it the hard way. But Jane's not one to get excited over billing. "So they call you Miss Wyman instead of Jane. I'd rather be Jane." What matters is that she's been promoted from "Sorry-Janie-there's-no-story-for-you-right-now" to "We've-bought-such-and-such-a-story-for-Wyman." What matters is the sense of breaking a stalemate, of being on her way at last—

"I wanted to move," says Jane. "Preferably up. But even down would have been something. Only if you're going down, go. It's sticking in one spot that drives you mad—"

She wrote to Ronnie: "Don't look now, hon, but that little speck miles down the road behind you is me. Took me two and a half years while you were in the service to get even that close."

They had to talk her into doing Vivian in "The Doughgirls." She made a test and thought it was horrible. Up in Mark Hellinger's office one afternoon, they all went to work on her. It was pressure, rather than conviction, that broke her down. "Ah, do it!" pleaded Annie Sheridan. "What can you lose? A lousy fortune?"

Now she shudders at the thought that she might have missed it. There'll never be another picture like "The Doughgirls"—so good and such fun to do. There'll never be three sweller dames than Ann and Eve Arden and Alexis Smith. Or a director to beat Jimmie Kern—

Jane and Ann and Alexis wanted to give Jimmie something to remember them by. Something unique and original and different. For days they racked their brains, till Jane was finally smitten by inspiration.

"How's this for an idea? Our three miniatures on ivory in a silver frame for his desk, inscribed, 'From The Doughgirls.'"

"Marvelous! I know a guy who does beautiful work," said Alexis. "He's right here at the studio. Let's get him down."

The guy came down. Yes, he'd be glad to do it. A charming idea! It should be done thus and so and et cetera and et cetera. The spiel went on and on, embracing every detail but one—on and on, while the girls listened fascinated, and no one dared mention anything so vulgar as money.

down to earth k . . thump . . .

It was Jane who finally took the bull by the horns. This was all very ethereal, but somebody had to find out one of these days—

"Uh—what do you think it'll cost?"

"Cost?" He touched the word so disdainfully that she felt like a worm for having brought it up. "I get anywhere from 500 to 3000 dollars for my work."

You never saw tongues go down three throats so fast. They were afraid to look at each other. Ann's resistance to laughter is low. All Jane has to do is go boo, and Annie breaks up—

Somehow they got rid of him before hysteria set in. By the time their shrieks had died away to moans, they decided it was too good a joke to keep to themselves. Jimmie had to come in and hear the whole story—

"That," he said, "is the best 3000 dollars worth of pictures I never got."

"At 3000 dollars," Ann snorted, "I not only wouldn't have my mug painted, I wouldn't have it lifted."

They gave Jimmie an un-unique, unoriginal and un-different cigarette lighter, with their names engraved on it. And they gave Alexis the name of I-Know-A-Guy Smith.

Naturally, it wasn't all fun. Work as such can't be fun to Jane. She takes it too hard. It's Ronnie who's Irish, but Jane who's moody. Up in the clouds or down in the depths of gloom—never a happy medium, no matter how she tries, and she tries hard—

"My husband and I," says Jane, "are like Scotch and Soda."

Soda takes after Ronnie, Scotch after her. One day Scotch got mad and started snapping at Soda. For a moment, Soda watched him tolerantly—"Pipe down, brother, pipe down." When that didn't work, he lifted his paw and laid it quietly on his brother's nose. It worked like a charm. Scotch subsided, Soda removed the paw, and they trotted off together in brotherly love.

"And if those aren't my husband's tactics, I'll eat my hat," remarked Jane out loud, though no one was around to hear.

oil on the waters . . .

Few people are as honest with themselves as Jane. Few people see their faults so clearly. If things at the studio upset her, she gripes about them at home. She flies off the handle. She knows she shouldn't, but she does. When Ronnie's around, he tries to calm her down. But she doesn't want to be calm, she wants to storm—

"You don't know what things are like. You've been away too long."

"Things like that don't change. It's just a question of diplomacy."

Time passes, and she cools off—realizes that Ronnie has his own problems, that it can't be much fun to come home on a week-end pass and listen to her beef. Her conscience smites her. Jane's temper is warm, but not nearly so warm as her heart—

Only you can't apologize to Ronnie. He doesn't have that kind of self-righteousness. So she takes the indirect approach—

"Look, is it all right with you if I'm a jerk?"

"I don't know—what—you're—talking about."

"I'm talking about me being a jerk last week."

"You suit me, hon. If you didn't blow up now and then, you'd be somebody else. What's on for tonight?"

A movie's on for tonight. Or a gin rummy game with Joan and Ken Niles. Or they'll drop in on Gracie and George Burns. Jane's admiration for Gracie knows no bounds. "You can't imagine being anyone but yourself," she says soberly. "But if I weren't myself, the woman I'd like best to be is Gracie Allen. I'm not one to go off the deep end, as a rule, but to me Gracie represents a kind of ideal—as a wife, as a mother, as a friend, as a person."

nothing but the war. If you talked about anything else, he was very polite, but he didn't really hear you. Now, as with most of us, the invasion has wrought a subtle change. The war remains all-important, the road remains long. But light glimmers on the horizon, and sometimes he lifts his eyes to it for a moment.

He and Jane had dinner out one Sunday. While he made a phone call for her, she ordered more coffee.

"For Mr. Wyman, too?" asked the waiter.

She choked. "Don't let him hear you say that, or he'll murder the two of us." But she was still grinning when he got back.

"What's funny?" She told him. "Wait," he said. "Just wait till I get out of this uniform." It was the first time he'd shown any spark of interest in what was going to happen after the war.

Since then, he's shown other sparks. Last Christmas, Jane gave him two lots adjoining their property. When the war's over, they'd remodel the house. Ronnie couldn't get worked up over the project. "The war's not over yet," he'd say.

Recently, he brought a big, cellophane-wrapped sheet of cardboard home from the post with him.

"What's that?"

"Something I'll show you after dinner."

It was a plan of their remodeled house and grounds, all drawn to scale. He'd cut out little trees and pasted them in such a way, that they could be laid flat against the board or made to stand up. A girl with a golf club, a tiny girl scampering behind her, chased two Scotties across the lawn.

Jane went out of her mind. "But where in the world are you?"

He pulled up a limb of a maple tree. Under it, smoking his pipe, lolled plain Mr. Reagan.

"But the war's not over yet," teased Jane.

"No, it's not. And I'll be in it till the last dog's out. Like any soldier." Then he looked down at the house and the girls and dogs. "But a guy can dream, can't he?"

You, too, can help deflake that faded, coarse, aging 'TOP-SKIN'

Also Marvelous For Enlarged Pore Openings and To Loosen Blackheads!

Girls: A deflaking process of dried up, faded skin cells must constantly take place in the skin (even in young girls)—otherwise your complexion often appears drab, coarse, so lifeless looking.

And here's one of the most effective and quickest ways to help clear away this unlovely "top-skin" debris.

A Real Short Cut To Beauty

Just spread Edna Wallace Hopper's White Clay Pack over face and neck. Let dry. (Usually takes about 8 minutes.) Then wash off.

Yes! It's hard to believe but this petal fresh, radiant skin loveliness is really yours. Notice how that tired, faded look vanishes. The mild "blushing" action of Hopper's Clay Pack is what gives your skin such a youthful glow.

Hopper's White Clay Pack is also a marvelous quick beauty pick up. It helps you look your dazzling best on short notice. Used weekly—it helps maintain heavenly smooth, clear "top-skin" beauty.

Edna Wallace HOPPER'S WHITE CLAY PACK

the glassy-eyed, white-lipped grin of the gal who's positive she's in for a bad night, but a sweet, half-smile that intrigues them. There's nothing wrong with scattering a few come-ons where they'll do the most good, either. "I heard something nice about you, Johnny," or "I won't go home till you rumba with me, Joe." Nothing brazen about it. It's just good strategy.

In the powder room, get a group of your true buddies to agree to share their men. That is, you each promise to get your beau to break on each of the group.

Out on the dance floor, relax. Chat with the boy you're with just as if you were home, dancing to Dorsey on the vic. Don't peer nervously around to see how everyone else is doing. Remember, the stags are attracted to the gal who looks as if she's having fun. If she and her guy are laughing their heads off, they can't stand it until they know what the joke is—and how can they find out without cutting in? Summing up, it's almost a guarantee that if you can lose that paralyzing, tongue-tying terror of being stuck—you never will be.

There'll be off nights of course, when you can't seem to get started, when you might as well be invisible for all practical purposes. Everyone has 'em, and don't get panicky. Say something casual to your date like, "I know what it is. I forgot my Woodbury cocktail." At least then he'll know that you know, and the tension will be gone. If it's a boy you know very well, tell him you'll go spray on some perfume, while he busies himself distributing five dollar bills to reluctant stags. Vanish to the ladies' room, give him time to work, then reappear to start on a belated whirl. Once the jinx is lifted, you'll have a gay, gay time.

More of the same next month, and if you have any stumbling blocks on the way to smoothness, let us know, and if we possibly can, we'll clear 'em up.

Co-Ed Mailbox

I've been overseas for two years during which time I've written every day to my girl and sent her as much of my pay as I could afford for her to save for our marriage. Lately, she sends me pictures of herself with other soldiers, inscribed, "He says to tell you how lucky you are," etc. She writes me very rarely now, and when she does, her letters aren't the least bit affectionate. She makes fun of what she calls the "mush" in mine. Do you think she's tired of waiting for me? My heart aches. PFC. John Hart, Somewhere-in-France.

John, try not to feel too badly about what your girl writes to you. Ever since Eve, girls have played at that stuff: Flaunting other men in their sweethearts' faces just to extract anguished protests from them. Acting cool for the sole purpose of worrying them. There's nothing new about it and nothing very signifiicant, but against a background of war, coy tactics are pretty cruel, pretty young. However, the very fact that she bothers to tease you shows that she is still fond of you. If she weren't, she'd simply stop writing. In your letters to her, be unimpressed by her conquests and mention a few of your own, fictitious if necessary. Be cool, but not huffy. She'll snap out of it.

I understand there's a terrific demand for high school girls to take care of children. I am in my last year at junior high and would love that sort of work, if I only knew how to get it. Ellen Duddy, Astoria, L. I.

You might see if your high school has a registry. If so, have your name added to the list of baby-sitters. Call the Chamber of Commerce and list yourself with them, stating the hours at which you are free to work. If there's an Army camp near you, Army wives would be thrilled to know about your services, so put yourself on file with the War Housing Committee or any comparable organization in your locality. You might also advertise in your community newspaper. It would be worthwhile to keep an ad running all the time giving your qualifications, available hours, rates, etc.

I am to be married soon and am simply appalled at all the details connected with the ceremony. Can you tell me the answers to these questions: Is the bride always given a white bible, and who gives it? If it is a double ring ceremony, does the bride buy the groom a ring? If the bride's gown is formal, is it necessary for the bridesmaids to wear formal dresses? A. J., Phoenix, Ariz.

The bride often carries a white bible in which there is a spray of white flowers, but this is strictly up to the bride. A bouquet of flowers (white, of course) is perhaps more customary. The bride would buy herself the bible. Yes, in a double ring ceremony the bride gives the groom a ring. Be sure to ascertain his finger size and also consult him about style before buying it. When the bride wears a formal wedding gown, the bridesmaids usually wear long dresses, but they don't absolutely have to. They may wear short, afternoon dresses in pastel colors and carry small bouquets.

Is mail to servicemen censored? Betty Marks, Grosse Point, Mich.

Not all of it. One out of every five or six letters received at the Fleet or Army Post Office is opened and censored. This spot-checking on outgoing mail should inspire caution in all of us. Enclose no plans of machines with which you work at the war plant, give no statistical information about production, refrain from demoralizing comments on the Government, the rationing system, etc.

I received a letter from my husband—he's with the Seabees in the Pacific—and he says to stop dishing him sweetness and light in my letters. He tells me to let him in on the seamy side. Here I thought I was being a morale-booster, and I get myself bawled out. What shall I do now? Mrs. A. S. Harrison, Los Angeles, Calif.

The phoney cheer of some of our letters to servicemen worries them. They think, "Gee, things can't be that good." And they begin imagining fictitious catastrophes. There's a fine line between out-and-out griping and the sharing of small disappointments and annoyances. Let him know that you ran out of gas and had to be pushed home, that the gal next door continues to bore you stiff. Just don't wail about it, though. Give it a humorous slant, the way you would if you were telling him about it. Don't burden him with financial anguishings, with in-law troubles. He's absolutely helpless to do anything about these things, and it drives him crazy to think of you coping with them singlehanded.

Gosh, thanks for all the mail. We feel like Hedy Lamarr or someone. Keep it coming, won't you, gals? And boys, too. If you're overseas and need a trouble-shooter, that's us. THE FIGHTING GRANTS have at least three. We're praying, both of us. Maybe our dreams will come true."

Barbara Hutton and Cary Grant live comfortably, spaciously, richly, if you will—but not grandly. Their house is a gem of loveliness situated far off the main boulevard in the Riviera section, up in the hills, lushly green in the early summer, with a beautiful view of the Pacific far below and ten miles away. Elissa Landi lived in that house some twelve or fifteen years ago. Then for a long time it was unoccupied until Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. and his pretty bride took it over, remodeled it and built additions.

paper doll, iron will . . .

Barbara fits very pleasantly into that homey place. She has really made it her own now, hers and Cary's, for much of the décor, paintings and bric-a-brac are things she has picked up all over the world.

We had a wonderful afternoon together, and I'm quite sure that never before had she spoken to anyone for publication so freely and unrestrainedly. She so much resembles a delicate Dresden china doll—a frail shepherdess, I think, comes closer to what I mean. So little, so appealing. But when she talks of her son Lance, now nine years old, fire leaps into her eyes, and unwittingly she makes one realize that although her millions may be an accident, her birthright and heritage aren't. There's plenty of fight in that hundred-pound body!

We talked of everything under the sun but invariably came back to the subject closest to her heart, her boy. You know, her former husband, the Danish Count Haugwitz-Reventlow, brought a suit against her charging that she was, of all things, unmotherly; that she used improper language in the child's hearing. It's really all quite ridiculous. But to Barbara it's deadly serious.

"My lawyers told me I'll have to go to court and battle it out," she said. "I'm going to do it, right through to the end, no matter what it costs me."

She wasn't talking in terms of money, for

I SAW IT HAPPEN

It was Tucson's first premiere—and mine. I was terribly thrilled at the thought of seeing the famous stars who were due and especially my favorite, Melvyn Douglas.

It took a lot of persuasion to get my older sister to come with me to the airport, but finally she gave in and we arrived just as the huge silver bird glided in for a perfect landing.

Suddenly, the crowd started to surge forward and, as one person has very little say about the direction she'd like to move in with such a mob, I moved with it.

To steady myself, I reached out and took hold of what I thought was my sister's arm. We stumbled along for awhile, and finally I tugged at it to indicate that I just couldn't take the pace. I was tired and irritated so I said, "Will you please slow down. Who do you think you are, a privileged character?"

Whereupon the pace slackened, the arm relaxed, and Melvyn Douglas drawled, "Well, could be!"

the legal fees aren't so important. But what it's going to cost her in overcoming the shyness that is her outstanding characteristic is a great deal. Most of our poor little rich movie girls are inveterate seekers after publicity, lovers of the limelight. Barbara is the shyest, most self-effacing little thing I've ever seen. She has shunned newspaper notoriety like the plague merely because she simply cannot bear to parade herself in public. I think it must hurt her physically, and I know it sears her soul. Maybe it hasn't been too wise a policy on Barbara's part, for there have been many times when the reporters were hounding her, and she shut herself away. The press may have thought her arrogant. Wrong, she was only frightened to death.

The love of Barbara and Cary Grant is so deep that I think there's little likelihood of their drifting apart. I'm on a limb saying that, knowing well that nearly every "ideal" Hollywood marriage has hit the rocks sooner or later. But with these two, that ol' devil career is no hazard. Barbara yearns only to be wife, mother and chatelaine. Their arrangement is ideal. For instance, the day I was at their house Cary was absent at Arrowhead having a five-day powwow with his agent, Frank Vincent.

Friday night is fight night in Hollywood, and Cary always goes to the Legion Stadium with some men cronies. Barbara can't endure the fights. "They terrify me," she said, and I can sympathize with her. Years ago when I first came to Hollywood, I was told that everybody who was anybody had to be seen at the ringside. So I got myself all done up in a brand new gown to make my escort proud of me, and before the evening was over, it was ruined and even a couple of flying teeth fell in my lap.

Barbara misses Lance dreadfully when he's with his father. I asked her what she does with her time.

"I play tennis every morning," she said. "Afternoons, when Lance is home, we go to the beach to swim or ride—and in the evening I like nothing better, believe it or not, than to curl up with a good book. I read lots. When Cary is home, we often play gin rummy, and he usually wins. But he doesn't care for bridge. Most of the time we have a guest or two in the house. Just now Richard Owens, the art connoisseur, is with us—the father of a friend of ours. He's busy mending Lance's miniature boats so everything will be ready when he returns for the summer."

"Please show me the house, Barbara," I requested.

Lance's bedroom has windows on three sides—large and airy, done in cool green and yellow glazed chintz. He also has a playroom filled with maps, ships' models, ship prints and all that sort of thing. The youngster has a definite yen for the sea.

Barbara sleeps in a huge oversized bed which sits on a dais. It fits snugly into one end of the room and was, in fact, built specially to fill the space. The décor is very soft and feminine, like a boudoir. There's an open fireplace and overstuffed sofas with lacy pillows. And several excellent paintings on the walls. Rubin is represented by a number of works. Barbara went to that painter's first exhibition in America two years ago and liked his style so much that she bought a number of his canvases.

Cary's room, reached only by passing through Barbara's, is a lot bigger than hers, with an enormous bath three times the size of hers. Observing my smile, she said,

"Well, you see, this room was built by Doug Fairbanks, Jr., and he had lived a long time in England where we all know

"More than glamour needed," says exquisite BETTY RIBBLE

"Posing is hard, hot work, under blazing studio lights," insists beautiful, blonde Betty Ribble. "Yet I can't risk unglamorous 'wilting'—and I can't damage the high-priced gowns I model. I have to have a deodorant I can rely on for both clothes and charm protection.

"The answer for me is cool, fragrant Odorono Cream!

"Odorono Cream is so wonderfully effective because it contains a perspiration stopper that simply closes the tiny underarm sweat glands and keeps them closed up to 3 days. It controls perspiration and odor at the same time. And it's entirely safe for lovely delicate fabrics —I just follow directions.

"Safe for skin, too. It's non-irritating even after shaving—it actually contains soothing emollients.

"I'm so enthusiastic about Odorono Cream I'd pay more if necessary—yet it's really economical. I get up to 21 more applications for 39¢ than other leading deodorants give.

the man of the house thinks of his own comfort first."

Cary has an oversized daybed on which he can—and does—recline, with a gorgeous view of the ocean and a canyon that gives out on rolling hills. He has a fireplace, too. But the thing that makes the room distinctive is the furniture—some very fine pieces which Barbara purchased for him in New York and which he adores. Cary, too, who was born, you remember, in a British seaside city, loves ships, and his walls are decorated with fine paintings of ships and harbors.

In the upper hall there's a magnificent portrait of Barbara by Sorine. There's a small head of her, too, in the dining room, also by Sorine, done at her request in one of her favorite hats. The dining room is done entirely in old English furniture, imposing yet full of quaint charm, and Barbara has added her personal touch in the silver, crystals and china, all her own. She loves flowers and knows how to arrange them, blooms mostly grown in her own garden. The house is always fragrant with them.

renewing the old world . . .

Sunday luncheon is a gala affair at the Grant ménage. You're sure to hear half a dozen languages spoken round the festive board—guests whom Barbara knew abroad, and Hollywood is full of such folk, many of them stranded with little to live on. For example, there's Victor Francen, often a guest, a French actor formerly with the Comédie Française, who arrived in this country a year ago with $100 in his pocket and not knowing a word of English. "An enchanting person," she says. "He now speaks English like a native, and all he asks for is just enough work to keep him going. This is sheer modesty because he was one of the greatest stars of the French theatre and movies."

They had some forty of her old European friends at dinner last Christmas. Lance was with his father. She had specially prepared for each guest the kind of food that each might have enjoyed in his own country. There was a gift for everybody. Some of them were elderly men and women in their seventies.

A lover of art, Barbara hasn't gone in for collecting on a large scale—in fact she has no real extravagances—but she does own some exceedingly choice pieces, notably a Botticelli and three paintings by Canelleto. Barbara has visited Japan three times. She lent me a precious volume titled "Three Bamboos" which gave me a better idea of what life is really like in that inhuman country than anything I've ever read.

Her health is better these days than it has been. Perhaps this improvement in her physical well-being has had something to do with renewing her determination to seek justice for herself. Physicians searched for the cause of her frailness and finally discovered that when she had a tonsillectomy some years ago, some infected tissue remained which was steadily poisoning her system.

We're told that opposites attract each other, and in that trait of human nature, I suspect, one finds the real reason for the compatibility of Barbara and Cary. Cary is gregarious, loves people and crowds; Barbara loves to creep within herself and live contemplatively. It's well known, of course, that she writes exquisite poetry. Only very few are allowed to read it and none to talk about it. Barbara was born with the proverbial golden spoon in her mouth. Cary's parents were poor by comparison.

While she was attending fashionable finishing schools in Paris and making the European capitols and New York as well, her playground, Cary was getting his start as a Coney Island barker. She was surrounded by nurses and governesses, allowed to play only with the right children; Cary was rubbing elbows with humanity's dregs and learning life in the raw.

and never the twain will meet? . . .

Not that the seamy side ever really touched him. But it was a wonderful preparation for life for a man of Cary's qualities, for this handsome six feet plus of rawboned man who was to become the mate of one of our most famous women.

Their courtship and marriage was storybook stuff.. If the war hadn't come along, it never would have happened. Barbara came to California because she couldn't go abroad anywhere. She was lonely, distraught. Acutely sensitive, she had long ago instinctively withdrawn into her shell of reserve as a protection against her deep feelings of insecurity in a world made too boundless by her money. That it was a foolish gesture, she realizes now, but to the young, overly-shielded girl, it was the only way she knew of warding off the humiliations and indignities to which she was subjected. At the time Barbara needed, above all else, sympathy and comradeship, and meeting Cary was the greatest thing that could have happened. There's some of the charm of Valentino about Cary without Rudolph's ingratiating tenderness. Cary is, heaven knows, gentle as a kitten at times. On his bond tours women wait on the streets for a glance at him, and when he smiles at them, tears fill their eyes. Valentino had that effect on women. But Cary Grant never would permit the build-up for himself that Valentino received, and any studio publicity people who attempted it would feel the toe of his boot.

The lawsuit brought by Barbara's ex-husband has brought her and Cary closer together than ever. Incidentally, I can say from personal knowledge that his accusations against her were not only the summit of injustice but absurd to anyone who knows the gentle, shy sweet soul that she really is. Haugwitz-Reventlow is forcibly trying to take Lance away from the Grants, and keep him with him in Vancouver. What an atmosphere it would be in which to bring up a healthy, spirited boy, to forcibly alienate him from Cary, who is one of our most famous, loved and respected men—a man who lifted himself up by his own bootstraps to fame and wealth! "Now you understand," Barbara said to me, "why I'm fighting—right through to the bitter end."

FRANK SINATRA

The events leading up to said ride have been told so many times you must know them by heart, but like all good legends, Frank's improves with the telling.

His mother, you know, was a nurse, and his dad a fireman (recently made a Captain), and Frank grew up unspectacularly in Hoboken, N. J. A skinny kid who loved a fight and frequently got one. A fiercely loyal, generous little demon who was in and out of more trouble than your own kid brother or that rascal down the street. He outgrew a lot of the devilment, but fortunately not the loyalty or the generosity. The same open-heartedness that made him squander his life-savings at the age of five to get his mom a bottle of five-and-ten perfume for Mother's Day, is still with him knocking hell out of his bank account. He can't go by a jewelry store, a toy shop, a florist, without getting something for someone. A musical doll for Nancy Sandra, silver foxes for his mom, a new ring for Nancy, the gal he's been in love with for nearly ten years.

love in bloom . . .

He met her the summer he graduated from Demarest, and cornily enough, it was love at first sight. They were both vacationing at Long Branch, New Jersey—Frank with his mother and father; Nancy with her parents and six sisters. She had on a pink bathing suit, he remembers, the first time he saw her, and her dark hair was down over her shoulders. She looked like a sea nymph or a cover girl. No, better than that. She was the most beautiful thing he'd ever seen.

He wasted no time asking her out, and when she said, "yes," the angels sang. They were together every day after that, and every evening. They swam, and they danced, and they lay on the beach for hours talking and talking. Frank discovered he could tell her things he wouldn't have dared tell anybody else. The way he felt inside about the world, his half-baked seventeen-year-old philosophy, this crazy ambition he had to sing. And she listened and cared about what he thought. She listened to him sing, and she thought he was good. By the time he went home that summer, he'd decided that the engineering degree his parents so wanted him to have wasn't for him. He'd get a job and bide his time, and some day a good band would come along and sign him as vocalist.

He worked hard that fall and winter and all the next spring. He covered sports for the Jersey Observer by day, studied shorthand and journalism at Drake Institute by night. There was no time for women, and—more important—no money. So he put Nancy in a dark corner of his mind and tried to forget about her. It didn't work very well. He thought about her so much, he went around in a fog half the time. Finally, his cousin, Frank Sinatra (known now as Junior) lit into him about it.

"What's with you?" he asked him bluntly one day.

"Nothing. What are you talking about?"

"That puss. Like a sick cow. C'mon, squirt, what does?" Okay, he asked for it. He got it. There was this babe who lived in Jersey City. He'd kidded himself that it was just a summer romance, but now he knew. Only she was such a queen. And imagine courting a gal by way of the Jackson Avenue trolley and then not having any dough to take her any place.

Junior soothed him instantly. "Take it easy. Take it easy," he told him. "I've got a car, haven't I? We can take her for a ride, and you can stake her to a coke or something, can't you?"

So Frank and Nancy, and Big Frank and his wife became a foursome. They played poker at the Big Franks' apartment. Danced in their tiny living room. Ate spaghetti in their kitchen. On the nights Frankie took her out alone, there were long walks, ice cream sodas and an occasional movie. One night they saw a Bing Crosby picture, and on the way home, Frank told Nancy,

"That's for me, honey. I'll never be happy till I've got a singing job."

"Of course. I know you won't," she told him quietly. "What are you going to do about it?"

Next day he quit his job at the Observer. An audition with Major Bowes was the first step, and when he won First Prize for his "Night and Day," he thought, "Oh golly, this is it. I'm famous." Only the tour with the Bowes unit took him thousands of miles from Nancy, and after three months, his loneliness was too big to bear, and he came home.

He got auditions with a number of radio stations and was eventually heard on eighteen sustaining shows, getting not a thin dime for any of it, except his seventy cents carfare. He was ashamed that he could never take Nancy any place, but now their love for each other was so deep and strong that a wee thing like poverty didn't really bother them. Nancy's family adored him, and he felt warm and relaxed in the big, noisy girl-jammed house. Nancy's younger sister Tina, was his greatest booster, and he was as fond of her as if she were his own sister. He kept wishing there was something big he could do for her, and eventually there was.

WE'RE COMIN'

Yes, we're coming October 10. But seeing as how MODERN SCREEN is the biggest, fastest seller in the field, better place your reservation for the big November issue today. You know that sinky feeling when you look forward to a thing and presto, it's all gone.

So remember, October 10!

One summer, Tina saved enough money to go away to camp, and Frank and Nancy took her over to the train. At the actual moment of departure, all her enthusiasm forsook her, and she looked at them with great tragic eyes. She'd never been away from home before. She'd never wanted to be. Frank knew how she felt, and he knew if he said anything sympathetic, she'd have been lost. He just dug into the pocket of his slacks and came up with sixty-five cents. "Here," he said quickly, shoving it at her. "Have yourself a time on the train. You know, gum, magazines and stuff."

And then the train was moving, and Tina was waving at them and smiling and throwing a kiss to Frank. She's never forgotten him for that. Giving all the dough he had in the world to a scared, silly kid. She didn't know it then, but he was giving her, too, the things he'd learned the hard way—courage and the ability to stand on her own feet.

Walking away from the train, Nancy spoke. "What are you going to do for carfare tomorrow?" she asked him gently.

Which Deodorant wins your vote?

☐ CREAM? ☐ POWDER? ☐ LIQUID?

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

. . . created especially for this purpose—QUEST* POWDER—soft, soothing, safe. It's the Kotex* Deodorant, approved by the Kotex laboratories. Being unscented, it doesn't merely cover up one odor with another. Quest Powder destroys napkin odor completely. It's your sure way to avoid offending.

Good for headaches, too

"Don't you worry about it," he told her brusquely, which was by way of saying "Shut up. Forget it. Pretend you didn't notice anything." To this day he's embarrassed if anyone catches him doing a good deed. He'd have you believe he's so tough. Such a mug. Oh, Frankie, we know better.

His break came at last in the winter of 1938 when he got a job at $25 a week singing at the Rustic Cabin, and on February 4, 1939, he and Nancy were married. There was a family tussle about it, believe it or not. You'd have thought after four long years their families would have seen the handwriting on the wall. But no. Both families threw their hands up in the air. The Sinatras thought Frank was too young, and the Barbatos thought likewise about Nancy. They bowed to the inevitable, of course, and after the first shock, they were very happy about it. Even went so far as to furnish the newlyweds' three-room apartment in Jersey City.

When Frank and Nancy came back from their three-day honeymoon, they were like two kids living in a dream. Mr. and Mrs. Francis X. Sinatra. They'd keep saying that over and over and giggling like fools at the wonderful sound of it. Nancy had a job in a store, and Frank had to be out at the Cabin at dinner time, so there were few evenings together. But there was all of Sunday, and an evening here and there. And what did they want? Egg in their beer? It was enough just to be married, and the magic of it grew and grew until it used to scare them, they were so happy.

One night while Frank was doing his stint at the Cabin, a long guy eased into the place and hung around for hours listening to him sing. It was Harry James, and when he offered him a spot with his band, Frank rocked back on his heels. "Who, me?" he said incredulously.

"Hell, yes," boomed James. It was a deal.

this dream's on us . . .

They were out of the woods at last, Frank and Nancy. Paying their light and gas bill on time and putting money in the bank just like regular people. That summer their little girl Nancy Sandra was born, and their cup of happiness ran over.

It was only the beginning of good things, though. After James, came Tommy Dorsey, and after Dorsey, Frankie struck out on his own. We all remember the way he sent those kids at the Paramount in the fall of '42. How he was signed for two weeks and held over for eight, breaking a fifteen-year record at the theater. We remember the shrieks, the swoons, the scrawls on the Paramount wall. "I love you, Frankie," written a thousand times. And the predictions of the know-nothings that he couldn't last. That he was another fad like swimming the channel and walkathons and the boyish bob.

Nancy knew he wasn't a fad, but when she'd tell him how good he was, he'd say, "You wouldn't be prejudiced, chum, would you?" And of course she was a little, so she just shut up and gloated silently over each passing month that found him still Mr. Big with the kids and with an increasingly large number of adults.

We remember the way they loved him at the Wedgewood Room, and how he packed the place every night with names like Cole Porter and Ethel Merman. How he took over Boston in one easy chorus of "Pistol Packin' Mama." We remember the way they lined up outside the RKO Theater at six o'clock of a bitter December morning to get into his show. Not just the youngsters, either. The Back Bay matrons, no less. The bluebloods who reputedly speak only to God. And then there was Pittsburgh and Chicago and Hollywood, each one falling in turn like Prussian towns under a Red Army tank attack.

And the strange and wonderful phenomenon is this. Half the people came to hear him prepared to scoff, and they would go away converted. Like the cops who were detailed to guard his dressing room in Boston. Before he came, they used to gripe continuously among themselves. Who the hell cared if the kids busted the door down and clawed him to death? Not them. Good riddance. But then he came, and they heard him, and heck, he was all right. Gentle with the kids who mobbed him, friendly with the stagehands and the press. And gee, he always had a big grin for the Law.

they had him wrong . . .

They'd had him wrong. Before Frank left, they were smuggling him in sandwiches and soft drinks so he wouldn't have to buffet the throng at lunch and dinner time. They were triumphantly bearing home authographed pictures to their kids. When, a week or so after he'd left Boston, they received a letter from him, thanking them and saying that Edgar Hoover couldn't have taken better care of him, they were completely sold.

The servicemen who jammed the Hollywood Canteen the night Frank appeared there came prepared to dislike him. They thought he'd be a patronizing little show-off, and when he turned out to be just a good guy who was willing to sing for them till his voice cracked, they couldn't believe it. They kept him singing for hours, and finally, when it was very late, they lifted him on their shoulders and paraded him around the Canteen cheering louder than anything in bobby-sox has ever cheered. No one at the Canteen has ever gotten an ovation like that before or since.

The even stranger phenomenon is that fame touches him so little. He's still amazed when newspapers carry pictures of Nancy and him at a premiere instead of people like Crosby or Gene Kelly. He's still just as wrapped up in his family as when he was not much of anybody. When he'd finally finished "Step Lively," and his cronies with whom he'd been living (Axel Stordahl, his musical arranger; Hank Sanicola, his manager—whom he's christened Cordell Hull; Junior, his jack-of-all-trades) wanted him to scoot up to Palm Springs with them for a week or two, he just looked at them as if they were completely out of their heads. "Are you kidding?" he asked them, and began throwing clothes into a suitcase. "You think I want to prolong this—looking at you mugs when I could be looking at that?" He gestured toward a picture of Nancy. "Don't you know I'm going nuts to see my wife and kids?"

"Okay, okay," Axel said. "Forget we said anything. Confidentially, we can do very well indeed with no Sinatra for a while, too."

Frank paused in his packing, a pair of socks in one hand, a shirt in the other. "What's wrong with Sinatra?"

"He snores," said Axel.

"And wants too damn many windows open."

"He makes too much fuss over those couple of little setting-up exercises he does in the morning."

"And he snores," reiterated Axel. Then they all began singing "Suitcase Packin' Papa" at the top of their lungs, and laughing so hard at themselves they couldn't stop. What, no reverence at all in their dealings with The Voice? Well, no. And Frankie would die a thousand deaths if it were otherwise. Finally, when he could get his breath, he flung at them, "New Jersey was never like this, thank God."

Which was where he was wrong. New Jersey, it turned out upon his return, was a bit of bedlam, too. Frank had bought a house in California, and Nancy was in the throes of getting things moved. They'd agreed to take all the furniture from their Hasbrouck Heights home out to the Coast, and the noise and confusion was harrowing. Nancy Sandra and her buddy, Mary Ann, hid in packing boxes and barrels and leaped out at them. Goggle-eyed fans lined the sidewalk. His son, thank fortune, was a silent one, and when Frank wanted to get away from it all, he snuck off to the nursery and communed with the chubby little guy in the sissy bassinet.

Nancy hadn't wanted Frank to see the house completely dismantled. They were sort of sentimental about the place, and if it gave her a queer feeling to see it this way—she knew what it would do to her softie husband. "Stay at a hotel till we're ready to leave for the Coast," Nancy advised him. She and Tina, who lives with them and is now Frank's secretary, and the kids could camp out on packing boxes (beds and the stove, of course, were left for last minute moving).

And now, at last, they are settled. The family from whom they bought their house finally moved out, and the redecoration is practically complete. (This was a terrific job, for when they got their old furniture, they realized it wasn't right, and they had to get all new things.) They've even had their house-warming.

And that was a party. There were tables and tables of food—sliced turkey, whole hams, enormous bowls of spaghetti. There was a smiling bartender called Joseph to whom Frank introduced you on your arrival, and who actually remembered whether you were drinking Scotch or Pepsis. And best of all were the people who were there. Old friends mostly, like Hank, Axel and George—Frank's personal press representative and also one of his closest buddies. With a sprinkle of new ones—

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Rosemary Lane was in town recently to appear at a Bond Rally. And while she may have "muffed" her act, she certainly won the love and respect of everyone who heard of the incident.

It seems that Miss Lane has a story which she always tells at patriotic assemblies, a "shocker" dealing with the sacrifice and heroism of the front-line combatants, and which she planned to deliver that evening. The lights were lowered, the spot focused; she stepped onstage, jumped into her opening lines, gulped—and stopped. Embarrassed, she murmured, "Pardon me, please," and ducked back to the orchestra leader and whispered to him.

A few moments later, she resumed the act—singing. It wasn't till much later that her behavior was explained. Miss Lane hadn't been told that her audience was to be composed of wounded soldiers recently returned from overseas, and fearing that her story might disturb them, she chose to ruin her act rather than risk a possible humiliation.

What a wonderful gesture that was!

the Keenan Wynns, the Gene Kellys, gangs of servicemen Frankie had picked up in his travels that day.

They had only asked the people they really wanted. There was no mob of big shots, no frantic attempt to include the right people. When the newspapers got wind of the party and wanted to send over photographers, Frank begged off. "It's not going to be that sort of party at all," he told the editors. "Gosh, our pals would think I was an awful ham. Skip it, will you?" They skipped it, scratching their heads. Who ever heard of a movie star passing up a nice hunk of free publicity?

The photographers would have ruined its lovely un-Hollywood atmosphere. As it was—except for the abundance of the hospitality—they could have been any young couple entertaining their chums of a Saturday night. Nancy, in a sweet off-the-shoulder cotton dress, showed each new arrival over the place, beaming when they exclaimed over the lovely dubonnet and green living room with its deep couches flanking the fireplace, the gleaming concert grand, the lovely flowered wing chairs by the window.

"Do you really like it," she'd say. "I mean really. I've looked at it so much now I can hardly tell what it looks like." She was thrilled when they rhapsodized over the master bedroom with the enormous bed, the pale blue quilted headboard and spread to match. The soft blue chairs and the chaise longue.

"Who decorated it for you, Nan?" they'd ask her. For in Hollywood when you buy a house someone almost invariably "does" it for you.

"Us," she'd say with that kind of breathless little girl way she has of speaking. "Oh, we had help. I asked people at the stores a million questions. But we chose the actual colors and pieces of furniture. We just couldn't live in anything that was somebody else's idea of a house."

Just one room did Frank insist on showing the people himself, and that was his dressing room. He couldn't wait to let the guests do their own raving. "Isn't it terrific?" he'd asked them before he'd even gotten the door open. "How do you like the plaid wall-paper? Look at those built-in drawers. I designed it myself, you know."

"Obviously," George told him drily. But he had to admit it was darned good-looking.

They were both so proud of their house that night that they couldn't stop grinning, and if anyone noticed a particularly lovely drum table or an especially striking picture, or the flowered draperies, they just about burst on the spot.

swinging on a star . . .

The party wound up in the small hours. No one wanted to go home as long as Frank's pal, the brilliant colored pianist Cal Jackson, could be induced to play one more song. Or while Frankie would give them just one last chorus of "Swinging on a Star." Or while their own voices held out on "Dinah" and "Casey Jones" and "Workin' on the Railroad" and the other oldies they all loved.

Now with the excitement of decorating the place and warming it behind them, life has settled down a bit. It is new and wonderful to have breakfast together every morning, even though six o'clock does come pretty early, and they aren't too chatty. It is marvelous, too, to have dinner together most nights, and Nancy Sandra doesn't know what to do with herself she's so thrilled to have a "regular father like the other kids." Frank, Jr. doesn't say much, but he's apparently thriving in his new surroundings. At six months, he was wearing little boy s[illegible] weighing, his nurse Miss Hewitt spouted proudly, over twenty pounds.

There are still minor crises, of course. Like the cook and maid walking out the day before the party. Like Frank calling one afternoon and saying he was bringing eight of the kids home to dinner—the one day Nancy hadn't gone to market pot luck pottage . . .

"But honey," she protested. "I haven't anything to feed them. Just a lot of odds and ends and junk."

"Swell," he told her. "We'll fix our own supper." They did, and the kids loved it, but the sight of them gorging on any old left-over aged Nancy twenty years.

There was the crisis when he almost didn't make the Hit Parade. He'd been doing a Command Performance with Bing Crosby one Saturday night, and it finished up at ten minutes to nine, giving Frank exactly ten minutes to get to the studio. He started to dash out, then he turned around and went into Bing's dressing-room.

"Hey, sit down, sit down," said Bing, who has no idea of time and didn't realize that Frank was practically on the air.

"Can't tonight, Bing," Frank said. "But I just had to tell you, it'll never stop being a thrill and thanks a hell of a lot." He stuck out his hand, and Bing shook it hard. Then he streaked for his car and made the show by the skin of his teeth. But not before the studio had hounded the life out of poor Nancy about his whereabouts.

Oh it's not all fun, being Mrs. Sinatra, don't think it is. She'll sit around waiting for him to get home to dinner till she thinks she'll go mad, and then he'll come in and say, "Sorry, sweet. There was a gang of servicemen around the car, and hell, the least I can do is sign a couple of autographs." Or going over their bank book with Tina, she'll discover a check is missing and unaccounted for, upsetting the whole balance. She'll nail him at dinner.

"Oh that." He looks embarrassed about it. "I saw a little squib in the paper that a soldier on a furlough lost his wallet with a hundred bucks in it. I figured maybe he'd want to go home or something, so I sent it to him. He'll probably think I'm an awful horse's neck—"

And what can Nancy ever possibly say to that?

Maybe a benefit will come up on their anniversary, and their little binge will be cancelled. Maybe he'll have to do retakes the week-end they planned to whip off to Palm Springs. But what the heck? Once in a while there's a free Sunday. What do they want? Egg in their beer?

HEADLINES FOR FALL

What color for you? For redheads, there are henna and auburn rinses. Blondes can keep their gold glistening by using a light golden blonde shade. Titian blonde rinse gives light hair a fascinating dash of red. Brunettes who want a really dark effect should try blue-black rinse. Emphasize natural reddish highlights with henna. Brownettes will like a warm chestnut brown rinse that adds a coppery luster. Auburn gives a rich glow.

SNOWFALL. A pretty sight, but not when it's dandruff snowing on your shoulders! Dandruff forms in the first days after washing when the scalp is temporarily de-oiled; so as soon as you've shampooed with a special dandruff-removing preparation, massage your scalp gently with an oily pomade. If you've been indulging in orgies of perfume-spraying directly on the hair, you have one clue to your trouble right there. Perfume's an aider and abettor of flaking. Substitute an elegantly-scented hair oil or tonic to perfume your curls, lubricate your scalp. Wash your comb daily to keep from re-infecting yourself. And don't lend it to a living soul!

HOW DRY I AM! Does your hair resemble a discontented haystack? Then its crying need is lubrication, plenty of it, to counteract brittle ends. Follow along with a special hot-oil treatment which, incidentally, is more effective right before your shampoo. Massage the warm oil well into your scalp. Wring a towel out in hot water and wind it around your head so that the oil can get in its best work. After the lubricating job, rinse your locks in cold water (that's so the shampoo on your oil-laden curls will lather easily) and proceed with your washing as usual.

WIELD YOUR BRUSH. Do your locks have that 100-stroke sheen? Take a tip from Rita Hayworth and brush not only the top layer, but underneath the hair, too. Hang your head and brush swiftly from the nape of the neck to the ends of your curls. Work hard, particularly around the back of the ears.

SET YOUR HAIR. Every girl her own Antoine is my motto! Learn to set your own hair, and you'll be hitting in Hayworth's league. Touring Army camps and such, Hollywood girls must look their best, and they can't always bring along a hairdresser. The solution: They do their own! And so can you if you invest in some hair-setting lotion, some precious bob pins and curlers. A contribution to the sleek-as-a-kitten look is a lacquer that coaxes flyaway hairs into perfect order and provides them with a brilliant sheen. It's good to know, too, about rose hair oil that, faintly scented, adds luster to all shades of hair.

Featherweight, 3-way grip combs and comblike "hairtainers" are wonderful for all coifs. Every tooth is split, making it just like a tiny spring exerting gentle tension. They can easily be inserted in rolls, puffs, curls or pomps. Presto, the hairdo is held securely. Too, they can't be beat at holding bows and flowers in place. Brides and bridesmaids (I'm incurably romantic) in current Fall weddings are using plenty of them. No bridal veil or orange blossom wreath can fly away when anchored with these clever little hair retainers.

Treat yourself to a permanent to revive lank and weary waves. Machine or ma-

"Guess My Age!"

New Kind of Face Powder Makes Her Look Years Younger!

ONCE this lovely girl looked quite a bit older. Some people thought she was approaching middle age.

For she was the innocent victim of an unflattering face powder! It showed up every tiny line in her face—accented every little skin fault—even seemed to exaggerate the size of her pores.

But look at her now! Can you guess her age? Would you say she is 20-30-35?

At last she has found a face powder that flatters her skin—makes it look younger, more enchanting!

Why Lady Esther Face Powder Is So Flattering

Lady Esther Face Powder is extra flattering because it's made differently. It isn't just mixed, just sifted, in the usual way. It's blown by Twin Hurricanes—blended with the speed and power of hurricanes—to look clearer, smoother and more flattering on your skin!

Because of this patented, exclusive method of hurricane blending, the texture of Lady Esther Face Powder is much smoother and finer than ordinary powder. The first touch of your puff spreads a delicate film of beauty on your skin, hiding little lines, little blemishes. And Lady Esther Face Powder clings longer, too—clings four long hours!

But the most exciting difference is in the shades. Lady Esther shades have a subtle new quality—because the color is blown in by hurricanes. Many women say that the Lady Esther shades are so fresh and alive that ordinary powder shades seem dull and drab by comparison.

Try Lady Esther Face Powder! See for yourself, in your own mirror, how much smoother and younger it makes your skin look. Get the small-size box and try it today!

MODERN SCREEN'S FASHION GUIDE

was recently introduced to the Money Bag Set at $60,000 a throw, it was cut along lines very much like the ones you see here. Coat hanger shoulders, tuxedo fronts, armholes deep enough to slip over suits, convertible turn-back cuffs.

Aim for this simplicity if you want to look expensive. And don't try to be too individual about furs. Short tunics, for instance, can be pretty super on occasion. But—come Winter—when your knees go "knockity knock," it mayn't be love. So think twice. Even about the shorties shown here.

You buy for looks and for keeps when you settle on mink-blended muskrat. Northern muskrats are the most durable and the best coats use only the backs of the animals. If you want a really solid job, ask for a "let-out" coat. This means the fur has been cut in narrow strips and worked just like mink. Costs more than when the skins are simply pieced together. But, whatever you pay for muskrat, expert blending means permanent beauty. So focus on the hang tag before you buy. If it says "Hollander"—worry not.

Persian lamb? Still tops among the slimming black furs. Not quite the all-around sport that muskrat is, but with fair treatment, it will give you excellent wear. Your cues to good Persian are: Soft leather, high luster, tight curls. The Hollander crowd is sorta wizard at making this fur lightweight, drapable and blackest black in color.

Beavers and their ilk are hard-working casual furs—and beautiful! You spot a good beaver by its blue-brown cast and dim luster. Mendoza beaver-dyed coney presents a reasonable facsimile of the busy beastie itself. And I do mean reasonable. Coney, of course, is rabbit but not the Easter Bunny variety. The best fur coat breed comes from Australia or New Zealand. Sturdy as the ANZAC in its own peaceful way. You can have it seal black, too. but it's not in the running with beaver for smartness.

Strictly on the sports side—Laskin Mouton (lamb, lambie pie!). Scarce as nylons last year, it's back in circulation and will circulate you plenty if you travel in school circles. Warm and hardy enough for Alaska. Satisfied?

Seein' spots before your eyes? Like leopard, ocelot or spotted cat spots? Perfectly natural if you're young enough to crave gaiety in furs. The coat on hand here is leopard-stencilled calfskin and—surprise!—it comes with enough extra fur for a hat. This "Hatmatcher" set-up includes pictures and patterns for making

HOW MY BAD SKIN CHANGED OVERNIGHT

Only a woman who has suffered with bad skin can know what joy came over me when I awoke to see my face so fresh, clear and smooth again. It seemed like a miracle! If YOU have pimples, blackheads, big pores, oily skin eruptions and ugly spots (externally caused), don't fool around with greasy, messy make-shift. Let NATURE help you. Use my private secret skin formula. See its amazing effects start overnight. I call it NATURE'S BALM OF BALSAM. Try it for seven nights. If it doesn't beat anything you ever tried send back and get your money. This may seem too good to be true, but the test will tell. My MONEY-BACK guarantee protects you. SEND NO MONEY, unless you wish. "When the postman delivers, pay only $2.00 plus charges for big special double size. Orders with $2.00 cash mailed charges prepaid." See if you don't bless the day you found NATURE'S BALM OF BALSAM. Write today—NOW! Miss ALMA, 103 Park Avenue, Suit 29-H New York City, New York.

six different swoony styles. Slick idea?

O. K. All this leaves you cold, because you're aching for glamour with a capital glam. How about stone marten then? Sure, the McCoy costs thousands. But look how cleverly raccoon impersonates it this year. A new bleaching and blending treatment produces the identical shadings of precious marten. Terrific for afternoon and evening. Definitely not for the tweedy side of your life.

In case this is too rich for your diet, skunk stands ready and willing to oblige. Teams with everything from formals to tweeds and positively teems with wear-resistance. So it's not just luck that skunk's still the most popular long-haired fur.

But . . . time's up (paper shortage, you know), and now it's your turn. If you want to know where to buy these furry beauties, write and tell me where you live. If you want the low-down on a fur I haven't mentioned—or want advice of any kind about clothes—just take your pen in hand pronto. G'bye fur now. THE PERMA-LIFT PRINCESS

Once upon a time, there was a fair maiden with cool blue eyes and a bewitching smile. One day . . .

Cinderella story? Plus a fairy godmother, with the time being 1943, the place Chicago and the Cinderella slipper belonging to Greta Christensen, the starlet who has RKO swearing off the usual easy-come, easy-go publicity campaigns for fear they may magic-wand her right out of the stardom they're sure she'll achieve!

Before her discovery, Greta was tops in the Chicago glamour clique, so when a friend of hers, famed magazine illustrator Pearl Frush, chose her to be the nationally publicized Perma-Lift Bra Girl, she accepted the job as a routine, if flattering, assignment.

Then came the deluge. A Hollywood talent scout spotted the ad in a State Street store, ferreted out her identity and telephoned to make arrangements for a screen test. Whereupon Greta promptly hung up! She knew that routine backwards!

But talent scouts are made of sterner stuff, and before she could say "Abracadabra," the G. I. pin-up pet was whisking off to the cinema city on her magic carpet of youth, talent—and Perma-Lifted figure!

I was ashamed to ask other women—these intimate physical facts!

"There was so much about intimate feminine hygiene I wanted to know but didn't. And I was ashamed to let other women find out how ignorant I was.

How glad I am now I didn't ask them because I've learned since so many women know only "half-truths"—or misinformation as out-dated as that of their mothers and grandmothers.

Instead I went to my Doctor. He told me about a newer, modern, scientific method of douching with Zonite—the discovery of a world-famous surgeon and renowned chemist. He explained how feminine hygiene is so important to a woman's charm, beauty and health. And how Zonite helps solve one of woman's most serious deodorant problems."

Smart Women No Longer Use Weak Or Harmful Preparations—

Old-fashioned mixtures of soap, soda or vinegar DO NOT and CAN NOT give the germicidal and deodorant action of Zonite. And don't let anyone tell you they do!

On the other hand don't use old-time over-strong solutions of harmful poisons (many with warning on label) which can actually burn, severely irritate and damage tissues—in time may even impair functional activity of the mucous glands. Untold misery may come from this. But with modern Zonite you take no such risky chance.

So Powerful Yet So Harmless

No other type of liquid antiseptic-germicide for the douche of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SO SAFE to delicate tissues as Zonite.

Zonite actually destroys and removes offending odor-causing waste substances and helps guard against infection by instantly killing all germs and bacteria it touches. Of course due to anatomical barriers it's not always possible to contact all germs in the tract. BUT YOU CAN BE SURE OF THIS! No other germicide kills germs any faster or more thoroughly than Zonite! Zonite kills every reachable germ and keeps them from multiplying.

Yet Zonite is so harmless, POSITIVELY non-poisonous, non-caustic, non-burning. Use Zonite as often as needed without the slightest danger. Follow directions.

Buy a bottle of Zonite today for "feminine daintiness" and charm.

GOOD NEWS

Alan Ladd refused to have a double for the scene when he shinnys up a 92-foot mast in "Two Years Before The Mast."

Before Alan became famous, he used to be a "grip" at Warners' and worked in the catwalks.

* * *

Betty Grable is certainly the original "rumor" victim girl. But here are a few you need NOT believe:

Betty is retiring from the screen to welcome the Stork again. She has her hands full with Victoria Elizabeth James and making her new movie "Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe."

She and Harry are having "career" troubles. Harry will soon open a night club of his own in order to remain in Hollywood with her and the baby.

She is on a strenuous diet to keep her weight down. Forget all that talk that she is starving herself. Betty has always been a gal who could put away a husky meal.

* * *

I've never seen more stars than turned out for the Hollywood preview of "Since You Went Away."

Shirley Temple was the darling of the evening, and I noticed for the first time that Shirley is wearing make-up. Oh, very discreetly—but she had on lipstick, a bit of rouge and a hint of brown mascara.

Deanna Durbin is wearing her hair very long and very blonde.

Maria Montez had an enormous beaded shawl draped around her head and shoulders. Maria smiled constantly. Even when the lights dimmed and the picture went on.

Joan Crawford wore a salmon colored cocktail dress and with her heavy tan and russet colored hair, she was très chic. Salmon seems to be the smart new color.

There's no rivalry between June Allyson, the blonde, and Gloria De Haven, the brunette, even though the girls are forging along neck to neck on the M-G-M lot.

The gals even date the same heroes including the popular "Hi" Hodiak. They dress their hair alike and wear the same color nail polish and lipstick.

"The days of feuds are over," June told me, "It's so silly for players to have to work together to be jealous. Gloria and I are friends, and we're going to remain that way."

That's all well and good—but as a newspaper woman, I think some of Hollywood's famous "feuds" have been very colorful. Remember Joan Crawford and Norma Shearer—and Crawford and Jean Harlow and Bette Davis and Miriam Hopkins and Gloria Swanson and Pola Negri?

Guess those were "the good old days."

* * *

Rita Hayworth is hoping her baby will be a girl. But after the "arrival" she is not going to take a long vacation from the screen as Alice Faye and Betty Grable have done. Rita wants to make a movie as soon as possible. There's only one thing—she'll confine herself to emoting and absolutely no dancing.

"I can't be a Dancing Mother too soon," laughs Rita.

I'm delighted with all the letters from you Modern Screen fans. Believe me they are being answered just as fast as I can get them out. You're very helpful to me—not only in telling me the stars you want to read about in this magazine, but your interests and enthusiasms give me vital tips for my Hearst papers column. Thanks again—and keep on writing.—L. P.

I HATE GRAY HAIR

OF COURSE you do! Gray hair makes you look years older . . . kills romance . . . might even cost you your job! Yet you are afraid to color your hair—afraid people will know your hair has been "dyed"!

WHAT A MAN!

picture, that people wondered if she could pronounce the words Y-E-S, or even M-A-Y-B-E if somebody wrote them up on a slate.

It was to take a long last chance at this that producer David Hempstead, who had been eagle-eyeing every available leading man in Hollywood at that point to find the right guy to make Ginger happy in her work, staged this Hollywood frame-up. Although they worked on the same lot, Mr. Hempstead knew the only time Ginger had had a gander at Bob was in a movie called "Behind the Rising Sun" where about all Bob did was to smash and tear in little pieces a huge Hollywood wrestler named Mike Mazurki in a Jap-versus-American battle that was probably the brusiest, goriest screen fight put on since the famous Farnum-Santschi scrap of the old silents. He also knew Ginger's reaction to this sluggy scene was one of horror.

"Why, that big bruiser wouldn't make love to me," gasped Ginger. "He'd eat me up!"

"Have you ever met Bob Ryan?" inquired Mr. Hempstead.

"N-no," admitted Ginger.

"Will you?"

"Why, yes—of course."

"Drop by my office this afternoon, and I'll have him there," promised the producer. And that's how the trap was set.

Well, right in the middle of one of those awkward two-stranger conversations about the weather and how have you been, Ginger strolled over to Hempstead's desk and scribbled on this paper. Then she said she had to leave to pack for her ranch in Oregon and tripped airily out of the room. But when she left, everything was all settled—rosy-dosy, on the beam—just like that.

Because what Ginger wrote on the paper was, "Wow—What a man! This is the guy!"

exactly like you . . .

Now that may be a long, round-about way to get across the fact that Robert Ryan is something special in the male animal line. But if Ginger Rogers doesn't know a Grade-A article in that department when she meets one, who does? And the point is, it took a look at Bob in the flesh. But even from those scattered pictures where he was usually messing somebody up or getting bumped off himself, Robert Ryan's charm has seeped through to the world until the postman made his RKO bosses sit up and take notice.

It finally got around that a girl or two in the out-country could care for a man like Bob if he'd stop chunking other males around for a minute and relax. But still, like I say, it takes a personal look to convince thoroughly. 'Cause when you meet Bob Ryan, you know you've met somebody.

Like the sailor who came up to him at the première of "Lady in the Dark," right before Bob left to join up with Uncle Sam. At that point he wasn't too well advertised locally, and even though Bob and his pretty red-headed wife, Jessica, got all gussied up with evening clothes, they still drew no more notice at the gala event than a glass of milk at a cocktail party. In fact, they were standing with the crowd, gaping at all the glamorous stars when this sailor tugged Bob's sleeve.

"Can I have your autograph?" asked the sailor.

Bob said sure and wrote it.

"What does it say?" asked the sailor.

"Why, 'Robert Ryan'."

"Darn it," said the gob. "My mistake. I thought you must be somebody. You look like you ought to be somebody." Bob didn't dare tell him that he was sort of somebody. He just got a good laugh out of it.

When he joined the Marines last February and entered boot camp down in San Diego, Bob Ryan could have claimed a couple-dozen home towns if he'd wanted to and got by with it. Because his buddies in boot training all were sure they had known him somewhere. Every day he got, "Say, aren't you from Birmingham?" "Ain't I seen you around?" or, "Ain't you from Atlanta, or Kansas City or Peoria?" For a while he thought it was because they'd glimpsed him in a picture, and sometimes they had. But usually it was just because the face and figure of Big Bob struck a familiar chord somewhere. He stood out.

timber-topper . . .

It isn't all because he's so tall—although Bob is a moose of six feet-three in his socks, and his 195 pounds are tailored to size. He was such a timber-topper, in fact, that he cost RKO some expensive retakes on "The Sky's the Limit," where they had injudiciously slipped him in a couple of scenes with Fred Astaire, the star. When the picture was run off, poor Fred, alongside Ryan, looked like a midget. In the new scenes the director kept shouting at Bob, "Stoop down, Ryan! Bend over! Bend over!" Bob did, and even if he looked a little like a chimpanzee taking a stroll, it was easier on Fred Astaire, which is what counted then.

But Bob Ryan has a lot more than mere altitude to keep his personality warm. It takes no slide-rule to figure out from his name—which is his right tag—that he's Irish, all on his dad's side and half on his mother's. His face is one of those pleasingly rugged maps, not pretty, but like Gary Cooper's, mighty easy to look at, especially when he cracks a wide grin and dimples—just like Coop's—pop out. His curly hedge of brown hair sticks up a little too far, and his ears wind-wing out a bit beyond regulations, but nuts—if you took Gable apart you wouldn't end up with Adonis. Let's say Bob's a handsome hunk of rugged man from all angles and let it go at that. What's better, he's a regular guy, easy going as an Alabama freight train, and like most big bruisers, blessed with a Lincolnesque sense of humor and a disposition like an angel cake.

He proved that one night at a Frank Sinatra broadcast. Bob's a great pal of Frankie's. They got to know each other on the RKO lot, and despite his wafer size, Frankie is fast on his feet and nutty about boxing. In fact, as you know, Sinatra owns a part interest in a professional fighter and would rather be around the smell of sweaty leather, arnica and resin than the fragrance of all those sweet things who make life one perpetual mob scene. So Bob, who's an expert at the manly art, and Frank put on a few bouts for exercise at the Hollywood Athletic Club between jobs, and it got in the papers.

Well, this night, Bob was on his way to the broadcasting studio to catch Frank at his swoon work when he waded into a mob of bobby-sockers milling around the gate, and one of them recognized him. She rushed up with fanatical fire in her eye.

"Aren't you Robert Ryan, the fellow who boxes with Frank Sinatra?" she cried.

"That's right," admitted Bob.

The filly sighed. "Can I touch you?"

"Why—uh—I guess so."

The fervent girl pressed his arm. Then she turned triumphantly to the mob of Sweet Hysterias behind her.

"Girls—look," she exulted triumphantly, "I just touched the man who touched Frankie!"

That wasn't such a compliment, especially since by that time Robert Ryan had done a few things himself, like "Bombardier," "Rising Sun" and "Tender Comrade." But he just grinned amiably and promised with a twinkle in his eye "not to touch Frankie too hard."

Bob just doesn't rile easy. Right now, for instance, he's assigned to physical instruction at the San Diego Marine Base and spends most of every day teaching raw rookies how to handle their dukes in case they get close enough to a Kraut or a Nip to use some knuckle dusting, Judo, alley scrapping—or what is required. Most of them are strictly from arms and elbows, and it's a case of the elementals. But sometimes a wise guy who knows more than he lets on steps up sweet and innocent and inquires naively, "Is this the way you stand?" "Is this the way you put up your fists?" And then takes a professional poke at teacher aimed at a haymaker and a certain prestige among his pals. 'Twas ever thus with pupils and teachers, of course, and Bob is wary. "Some of them are good," he admits candidly. "But usually not good enough to do it more than once."

That's because Bob Ryan has studied boxing and practiced same ever since he was a nipper. He was heavyweight champ at Dartmouth College from his freshman year on and the only battler in college history to hold the school title four straight years. He got started in Chicago early, oddly enough, because his mother made him take violin lessons. Chicago, then as now, was rugged. "H-m-m-m," mused Bob's Irish dad, "if the kid's going to lug a violin case through these streets, he'll get 'sissy' tossed at him every two blocks. If he gets that, he'll have to fight. He'd better know how." So before he hung up his knee pants, Robert Ryan could feint and jab and bob and weave with the best of them. He still can at the age of thirty-four.

i cover the water front . . .

Bob looks like he hails from the Hills of Old Wyoming or at least from somewhere West of the Pecos, but fact is, he's strictly a city boy—always has been. A couple of years ago he and Jessica went in hock for a Hollywood house, the first bona fide house Bob had ever lived in. They rattled around, and it didn't last long. Right now the Ryans are camping in a seaside "villa" at Pacific Beach, a bleak strand a few miles above San Diego. It's built out on a pier, and the attractions, if any, are bathing and fishing. Bob gets a bad sinus when he swims, and he's so allergic to fish that he turns green at the sight of a fin. But still he thinks at 25 bucks a week the candy box place is a bargain. "Real homey," he sighs, adjusting his long frame to the sharp angles. You see, for years Bob, and later Bob and Jessica too, dwelt in rooming houses, dinky hotels, cracker-box apartments, in attics, basements, over garages and under delicatessens. Pursuing art they were, and fame—and as any dope knows, that's no formula for creature comforts—especially when you're busted, as Bob Ryan usually was.

He didn't start out that way. In fact, the Ryans were pretty well fixed in Chicago when Bob grew up. His dad was a successful contractor, and Bob went to a good Chicago school, Loyola, where he not only starred in football, baseball and track, but even scribbled poetry and decided he'd be a writer of some kind someday. His pop still had enough sugar to pack him off East when college time arrived, and Bob chose Princeton but got touted off at the last minute to Dartmouth, and like all Dartmouth grads, he regards that nowadays as a holy place, slightly up the hill from heaven.

That's an occupational disease of Dartmouth grads, but still Bob Ryan had good cause to like his college setup. He joined a good fraternity, Psi Upsilon, made the football varsity until he wrecked his knee in the Columbia game, wrote some more poetry (which was very ripe, Bob admits) and did progress on that writer ambition knocking out some essays and theses which are still called models of this and that back in Hanover. One was artistically titled, "Alice and The Toilet Bowl" and kidded the hard boiled vogue of gutsy writers like Hemingway and Faulkner. They say it was pretty cute.

career—corpses 'n' cowboys . . .

Vacation times, the youth Ryan got around plenty earning a dollar here and there—once even as a fake cowboy (his first actual acting job) on a Montana dude ranch (maybe that's where he got that Cooper cowboy look). Incidentally, he took an incognito flyer at the prize ring out West under the alias of Kid Flanagan. Next summer he peddled cemetery lots and did all right, too. And working back from there, Bob wound up his between-the-semesters career in his home town signing on as a "chauffeur-secretary" to a swarthy gent with big diamonds and black cigars and a suspicious bulge over his hip. Turned out to be a bootlegger who wanted a muscle man around in case of trouble.

So by the time they dressed Bob up in a mortar board and a black nightgown and handed him his B.A. at Dartmouth, he knew a thing or two about what made the world tick—or so he thought. Only the world wasn't ticking when Bob emerged, all wound up for action. There was a slight Depression—remember? From then on he became the Depression Kid—and no kidding. He had to earn his cakes, and the going was rugged. But the scads of lowly depression chores he waded through in those years added up to a big fat break later on—but that was later on.

First off, Bob Ryan swallowed his Dartmouth pride and education to lean on his big muscles as a "human mule" pushing barges of rock and slag in a Chicago sewer tunnel project. It wasn't exactly elevating work, and a time or two Bob almost got his beautiful body crushed and mangled to hamburger. But to show you how a guy can dream in the depths even, of a sewer—

Once, Bob recalls, he was parked alongside of the big ditch with some hunky sandhog colleagues of his, gnawing a sandwich at lunch, and the conversation turned, as it usually does in ditches, foxholes or exclusive clubs, to women. Especially movie women. Specifically, the topic was, "What Hollywood dame would you rather kiss?" There were lots of candidates among the starry-eyed sewer gang. Garbo, Norma Shearer, Joan Crawford, Virginia Bruce. Came Bob's turn. He sighed. "The girl I'd rather kiss" (and he meant it) "is Ginger Rogers."

It sounds like a corny press-agent gag to report that the first Hollywood "movie dame" Bob Ryan did play opposite, did hug and did kiss (even if he had to pinch himself at the time) was Ginger Rogers. But that's gospel. And incidentally, that kiss has been good for a lot of extensive masculine conversation a second time. About ninety per cent of Bob's Marine buddies want to know first thing. "How does it feel to kiss a movie star?" Bob has to tell them he's only kissed one—Ginger. "How does it feel to kiss her?" they press.

Bob always gives them the same reply. "Ever kiss a girl?"

"Sure!" (a bit indignantly).

"Well!" snaps Bob. That goes on a dozen times a day.

But back to Our Hero's sad saga as Busted Bob, The Depression Waif:

I could rattle off the up and downs of Robert Ryan until next Christmas if the paper shortage okayed it. He did about everything you can think of. He tried gold mining in Montana and made exactly eight bucks in five months of back-breaking toil. He tried New York for a newspaper job, but instead of holding the presses, Bob ended up holding the torso of some strange tootsie and leering at her in confession magazine illustrations; posing his rugged map for dandruff ads, cigarettes and foot-eases. He signed on the black-gang of a freighter bound for Africa and got himself drenched in sweat stoking his way through the tropics. He came back to the States and peddled this and that, slaved as a mucker in another sewer gang, drilled with a dynamite crew, dug a ditch here and there. Ups and downs, mostly downs.

But there was one strictly-from-hunger job Bob Ryan had that tips off the kind of fellow he was throughout all that big league loop of lousy luck. He didn't mind breaking his back or tearing his big arms out by the roots, or even prostituting his manly beauty for sensational sheets. But —well, once he tied into what looked like a soft touch in Chicago—a white collar job as collector of bad loans.

heart-on-his-sleeves legree . . .

Bob spent a week shagging through the dismal slums of Chicago trying to pull pennies out of down-and-outers. What he saw made him sick at the stomach and sicker still when he realized he was working for a loan shark outfit. When he got his check, he hustled right back down to the places he'd put the bite on. There he doled out every cent of his pay to the miserables. Then he felt a lot better. To this day you can't knock social progress or security for the underprivileged to Robert Ryan. He doesn't see red very often—but if you'd like some fireworks, just start picking plutocratically on the common man—but choose a quick exit.

How Robert Ryan ever hoisted himself out of that slough of shabby existences is a miracle. Isn't it a miracle when you shoot your only savings—$300 bucks—in a Michigan wildcat oil well and the darned thing comes in? Maybe even more miraculous was a pose he got by with in Chicago—at a girl's school, of all places. You wouldn't think Bob's activities then would have led him within a country mile of a young ladies' finishing school. But for one thing, he'd never lost that literary ambition and dabbled at night with plays and things, and for two, he still had plenty of nerve that even a Depression couldn't tame.

So the minute Bob read that the Stickney School for girls was staging its annual play, he showed up and snagged the job directing it. "New York experience," he lied airily and got by with it. Bob built the scenery and made the schoolgirls get to work, and ended up with a "Dear Brutus" production that wowed the mamas and papas. Right about then in came this $2,000 profit from the wildcat well. Guys and gals have climbed off the train in Hollywood with a lot less encouragement and very much less cash. Robert Ryan was going to be a great director. He figured the place to learn was with Max Reinhardt, who had a school in Hollywood. So there he was, in no time at all.

love in gloom . . .

On the care and feeding, past and prospects of Bob Ryan, Actor, there's no better authority in the world than his wife, Jessica. Bob met her the first day he started cramming at Max Reinhardt's, and that minute he knew he was a gone goose.

Jessica is a tall, pert redhead with shiny, brown eyes and a frank and breezy personality. She was just down from San Francisco where, as Jessica Cadwallader, she'd been exposed to the Anna Head School in Berkeley which usually turns out girl tennis champs (Helen Wills, Helen Jacobs and Alice Marble all went there), but in Jessica's case the place brewed acting ambitions. By the time they met at Reinhardt's, she'd already played two years with a San Francisco acting group and taken a crack at Broadway and Hollywood, too, which made her several up on Bob.

How they ever managed to become one is a mystery to both; and a tribute, maybe, to Bob Ryan's Irish bull headedness. Because they got off to several flying wrong starts. As Bob recalls, he made a date the first day he met Jessica and decided he ought to take her somewhere fancy to make an impression. He was ready to blow a small wad of hoarded cash all right, but his knowledge of Hollywood night life was limited. He thought he was taking Jess to a swank place, but the joint turned out to have a reputation lower than a snake in a swamp, which Jess knew, but Bob didn't. He couldn't figure out why he wasn't making much time. Then, he tried dancing, and at terpsichore Rob Ryan is no star. He hates it and—funy part—Jess hates it, too. So it turned out to be a rather grim evening.

Incidentally, Bob Ryan's still a bit backward on his cafe society, especially about what is what, where and when in Hollywood. Some weeks ago an old Dartmouth pal of his came to town and wanted to make the rounds. Bob rallied, and not to let his pal down, boasted, "Sure—I'll show you all the hot spots. Know the town like a book! First," he stated recklessly, "we'll do Ciro's."

With a fine, devil-may-care aplomb, he got on the phone for a reservation, but somehow he couldn't locate Ciro's. Finally the head operator gave him the news.

"Ciro's?" she repeated, as if talking to a small boy who doesn't know any better. "Why, Ciro's has been closed up for two years!"

When he's in the market for fun, however, Bob Ryan can do it up right—as RKO's cashier found out last year. After "Tender Comrade," the studio sent Bob and Jessica on a trip East, via his old home town, Chicago, all expenses paid. They told him to enjoy himself and not bother about money. Bob didn't. He took the best suite at the Ambassador East, Chicago's swankiest inn, and tossed a party for 200 old pals in the Pump Room, with cocktails, with caviar, with guinea hen, with champagne. The bill went to the studio, and the studio wired Bob, "Bill paid. Now do we own the hotel?"

Jess and Bob were pretty close to the late directing genius, Max Reinhardt, and when they got hitched, he gave them a book inscribed thus, "Your nuptial hour draws on apace, with pomp, with triumph and with revelling"—a nifty from Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and signed it. It was nice—but for a long time Bob was inclined to ask "What pomp, what revelling?" His stake then was $100 cash. He and Jess also picked up a German acting charm from Reinhardt which they use each time Bob goes into a picture. At that point, Jess pretends to spit on him and yelps, "Halsundbeinbruch!" which means "I hope you break both your neck and legs!" It's a quaint German way of wishing you the worst so you'll get the best.

Anyway, the charm and Reinhardt's revelling prophecy took a long time to work, because after they left the drama school, the Robert Ryans embarked on a stretch of concentrated acting and starving. To eat, Jess did some commercial modeling and Bob gave boxing lessons to Hollywood kids at a buck a lesson, and at his first Los Angeles stage bow a reviewer cracked, "Mr. Ryan used to be a boxer. Last night he talked like he'd forgotten to take out his mouthpiece!" But Bob got sharper and sharper, especially in the East where he and Jessica attacked the "borscht" summer stock circuit at various "straw hat" stops, including the Cape Cod Playhouse, the Millpond Theater on Long Island and the Robin Hood in Delaware. The rewards ranged from $2 a week and room, such as it was, all the way up to $40 a week, for a couple of weeks. Anyway, they managed to live, and Jess, who had never fried an egg successfully, learned how to cook an eight-course dinner over a Bunsen Burner. And eventually, Bob rubbed up against big timers like Luise Rainer, Katherine Cornell and Tallulah Bankhead, and almost landed in Tallu's play, "Clash By Night" on Broadway, only the Bankhead caught a flu bug, and his big break was canceled. Then, while Bob sat about biting his nails, that big break the Depression brewed caught him by the collar.

Pare Lorentz, the progressive film fellow, who made all those artistic documentaries, had a gigantic opus on the string for RKO called "Name, Age, Occupation," dramatizing an American guy's struggle to lick the Depression. Hipped on realism, he wanted a rugged, sweat-of-his-brow actor who had been through the Depression mill for the lead. Somebody steered him to Bob, and one look at Ryan's record was enough for Lorentz. Bob couldn't miss, he figured. Maybe not, but "Name, Age and Occupation," after filming for months, did miss. A studio shakeup took place at RKO, and the artistic epic lit on the shelf. But out of the wreckage, somehow, Robert Ryan found himself with a contract at RKO, to that studio's surprise and confusion. "Frankly," Bob confesses, "they were stuck with me."

His rugged body caught their eye and so Robert Ryan became a muscle man about the lot, in such hairy-chesters as "The Iron Major," "Bombardier" and climaxed by that bit of movie mayhem in "Behind the Rising Sun" where Bob reenacted Captain Clear's historic fight to the finish with a mammoth Jap Judo killer. Bob lost ten pounds the first day, got himself knocked colder than a pickle three times and chipped bones in half his knuckles. But that was his line of work at RKO. He wasn't in one solitary scene with a girl until—well I've told you about Ginger and the Great Discovery.

Offstage, Bob Ryan is probably the most unglamorous, unactorish star around.

Around Hollywood, before he put on a Marine uniform, he usually needed a shoe-shine, and some of his leisure clothes horrified even his wife. She had to hide one rig he fancied, a canvas coat, denim pants and sneakers. He's a guy of simple tastes in about everything—goes for beefsteak and lots of beer and cigarettes, hasn't a speck of jewelry, except a thick gold wedding ring and a wrist watch the studio gave him when he left for service, which refuses to run. His idea of fun is to stay up late drinking suds and talking weighty world problems with his friends, mostly writers, and a lot of Russians he's met through dabbling with the U. S. representatives of the Moscow Art Theater. Or reading weighty philosophical tomes and the lives of great men. He and Jess are both suckers for movies, and where they live now, that's all the excitement there is, so they're catching up on their movie misses about every night.

bury me not in the lonely files . . .

Kay Kyser brought his radio Kollege of Musical Knowledge to the San Diego Marine Base a while back, and as Bob and Kay had known each other at RKO, the old professor practically drafted him up on the stage to answer one of those jive quizzes. Bob was never so embarrassed in his life. All he could say was, "I don't know," and he flunked every question, to the bitter disillusion of his solid supporters. One girl wrote him sadly, "I am disappointed in you. You look so nice on the screen. I can't understand why you're so dumb!"

Jessica is my authority for some other facts and figures about Bob. To wit: That he hates to shave, gets his pajama tops and bottoms all mixed up, talks in his sleep, breaks out in hives if he touches mustard, fish or eggs, averages 15 cups of coffee a day and stubbornly messes up their joint bank account writing indiscriminate checks.

In spite of these failings, Private Robert Ryan, U.S.M.C., passed his Leatherneck tests with a 4-rating, which is doing o.k. in a mighty tough league. He thinks he's lucky to be with a rugged outfit, but it's purely and simply an example of good casting. Bob Ryan is a rugged guy, as you might have gathered by now. Of course, he's a mere private—no marine captain like he played in "Marine Raiders," finished, incidentally, three days before he entered boot camp. But I wouldn't sell Bob short in the service—or anywhere else.

And when the shooting is over, Bob's ambition is to be right back in Hollywood where he left off. He made that plain to me and also to a certain young lady at RKO studios who handles the stacks and stacks of pictures of RKO stars. Over her desk hangs a grinning portrait of Bob with his gay good-by crack:

"Oh, bury me not in the lonely files!"

After the hit Bob has made, there's some fat chance of that, war or no war.

secretary. It says, "Please enroll me as a member of your Frank Sinatra Club. I think Frankie's great. Bing Crosby."

But that midnight telephone conversation marks the first time on record that Bob Hope ever harpooned his chum, Bing Crosby, about the up-and-coming Crown Prince of Swoon. And it set off with a cross-country bang what has since become the greatest three-ring circus of wildly running gags, knockout punch nifties and free-for-all fun that a trio of upstairs stars ever put on in the Big Tent of Hollywood. No holds are barred, and there hasn't been any time out called yet. It has rollicked and raged all over the radio and in the newspapers, in Army camps and hospitals, on golf course, studio sets, dressing rooms, club houses and cafes. It's been beamed out to Saipan, Siena and St. Lo. But, if some sad people who had their Sense of Humor stunted at an early age, can call it a Feud with a straight face, well—they just aren't hep, that's all.

triple-threat wisecrack club . . .

Because what the triple-threat wisecrack club of Crosby, Hope and Sinatra cover up is really the greatest Mutual Admiration Society in the world.

Bob can call Bing "Hips" and "Flabby" and "Father Bobby-Socks" and brand him publicly, as he often has, "The Frank Sinatra of the Gay Nineties." And Bing can label Bob "Zoot-Snoot," "Jangle-Jaw" and "Hopeless" and shoot a dozen other off-the-cuff slurs at his looks, his acting ability, his golf failings, his ignominious canvasback past in the prize ring. He can expose Bob's best jokes as a Joe Miller jumble from a stable of gag writers, while Bob baldly points out the hairless state of Bing's noggin, the spavined gait of his race horses and the wild-Indian traits of his offspring. He can rag Bing's blinding crazy-quilt shirts and the chest that occasionally slips down to his middle, and Bing can come back with asparagus cast at the froggy tones of Bob's crooning attempts.

That had been going on for years, rapid fire, before Frank Sinatra joined the Socko Society. The rubber bricks that Bing and Bob have heaved at each other would shoe half the cars on the highways by now—if they were real.

Over the door of Bob Hope's dinky dressing room, which he started in at Paramount and which he's kept ever since because he's superstitious about moving to more glorified quarters, hangs a picture of Bing Crosby. It's about the dizziest looking portrait of the Old Booper you'll ever see, if you're ever lucky enough to see it. Bing's double-size eyes seem to float in a shiny mist of soulful surrender, and they're crossed sappily. His ears are three times as large as Gable's and stick out like handles on a chamber. The picture says "My Ideal," and Bob spent a long time cooking it up with a trick photographer he knows. He's got another of Bing with that beaver beard he had awhile back, faked on to a lovely young lady screaming in terror and a dozen other poses of the Crosby, tricked to make him look all the way from a Mongolian Idiot to Little Boy Blue.

And in Bing's gorgeous interior decorated Paramount hangout, which Bob loves to razz Bingo about and call "the Palladium," Bing comes right back with a picture set of Hope looking like the dogcatcher should be after him, and cartoons jaw like a bulldozer and hair like a dish of wilted spinach. That's just a sample.

Those two nutty nimblewits have never stopped kidding, in good times and bad, ever since Bob cracked his way into Bing's backyard at Paramount. Even when Bing's house burned down, and he lost half his treasures, Bob accused him of being a firebug for the insurance. And when he took Bing and Dixie and the kids into his house to stay for a while, he set right out sharking Bing at pool in his billiard room and told all their friends, "It's the only way I can get any rent out of the guy!"

But in all the mess of Irish confetti they exchange, Bing Crosby and Bob Hope have never had a mad-on for a minute, a pang of professional jealousy or even a tickle of temperament. They can both take it—plenty—and love it, maybe because both are so far out in front in their respective spotlights that they haven't a thing to fear from each other, and maybe because they happen to be Bing Crosby and Bob Hope—which is to say, two terribly funny, friendly and fabulous guys.

Anyway, when Frank Sinatra blew into Hollywood with all the squeals and shivers of female millions wafting after him, Bing and Bob were waiting for him. They needed new blood, and Frankie seemed a natural to make it three of a kind. But neither Bing nor Bob, and hardly anybody else in Hollywood, knew Frank. They liked the Voice, but what went on behind it was a mystery. So Bing and Bob decided to find out. Their first chance to apply the acid test was at a War Bond exhibition golf match at Lakeside Country Club where Bing and Bob slap the ball around.

the acid test . . .

It was a big Hollywood event, and thousands of people were on hand to watch the fun. It was also the first public appearance together of the Groaner and his sensational new rival, and to be fair, Frank was at a big disadvantage. Bing and Bob had played lots of Southern California benefit matches before. Both of them are super golfers: Bing had even been Lakeside champ for two straight years, and Bob was a close runner-up. Frankie was a mere dub at pasture pool. Although in a prize ring or a swimming pool he could make both Bing and Bob look awkward.

They went to work on Frank right away. First off, Bob turned to Bing. "Crosby," he said, "your caddy can carry the clubs. Mine can carry Sinatra." When Frank teed off, Bob got him talking while Bing traded a trick ball on the tee. Frank swung and "Bang!" it exploded all over the place. Then Bob had his caddy hand Frank a mammoth gag golf club, complete with rubber handlebars, a flashlight, a compass, a bicycle bell and other gags, gadgets tailored for a dub. And all around the course he and Bing kept up a running patter like this: "Hope, it sure is swell to have new blood in the game."

"Yeah, Bing, did you say 'no blood'?" (Ever since Bob has called Frankie "No blood.") Or, "Bob, why do you suppose this Sinatra's so skinny?" "I don't know, Bing. Maybe when he was a baby his mother tied his bow tie too tight." "Yeah, Bob, but not tight enough!" Well—that gives you the general idea. Frankie's number was really up.

But he took it with a wonderful Sinatra grin all the way around, and even poked back a few cracks himself, because Frankie is no slouch whatever on the uptake. He sang a duet with arms around Bing's shoulders and entered into all the silly business a mob of cash customers even for War Bonds, seem to demand around Bob Hope and Bing Crosby. Although afterwards, Frank sighed, "Whew! Next time I go out with those guys I'm gonna wave a flag or blow a horn or something to get a little attention. Boy, were they laying for me!"

He was right as a rabbit there. That pair certainly were laying for the Swoon King. But after they'd laid for him and got him, they liked him—plenty. And when Frankie Sinatra moved out to Bob and Bing's home territory around Toluca Lake, going in hock for a house right off the eighteenth tee at Lakeside, who do you think proposed him for membership in the exclusive club? Why, Mr. Harry Lillis Crosby, of course.

Frankie Sinatra is one of Bing's firm friends today. But even though he knows him well, Frankie's attitude toward the Great Groaner is still one of humble reverence. He's a Crosby man, as he was at the start, and even now after all the fame he's waded into, he still regards Bing with awe. It shows in all sorts of ways. Frankie, for instance, calls Bing, "the King." The other day, he confessed to a close pal of his, Hugh Daniel, that the biggest thrill he's had since he came to Hollywood was to watch Bing record a song that he, Frankie, had discovered and made famous. "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Town of Berlin" is the number. Frankie has already asked Bing for an autographed platter to add to his collection of Crosbyana. And you should get a load of Frank singing the parody he wrote on "Sunday, Monday and Always." Chances are you won't, because Frank uses the little ditty just at Army camp shows and sometimes now and then to warm up a radio studio audience, but never over the air. So I'll have to slip you a look at the lyrics. You can see right off the bat with whom Frank Sinatra brackets himself in crooner ratings. The first verse starts like this:

"I'll soon become a wreck. They're breathing down my neck—
Dick Haymes, Dick Todd and Como—
They're really coming fast. Who knows, I may be passed—
By Dick Haymes, Dick Todd and Como.
The fact that girlies scream, they say will cause me grief,
But if they ever stop, I'll find that I'm back on relief.
It'll mean the end of me, good news for Tommy D.,
And Dick Haymes, Dick Todd and Como!"

There's a stack of verses. But Frankie ends like this:

"I'll never sing like Bing, I know I don't compare,
I'll grant he's got a voice, if they'll grant that I've got hair.
But then why all the fuss? There's room for all of us—
Dick Haymes, Dick Todd and Como!"

crooner humor . . .

And he always winds up with an extra lick, "There's just one Crosby!"

Oddly enough, although it's a lyric built strictly for laughs, that's just about how Frank Sinatra really feels about Bing. He worships the guy like Lil Abner worships the "Ideel," Fearless Fosdick. Always has. Frankie was practically weaned on Crosby, like a million other boys and girls his age. And if Bing should start cracking his voice tomorrow and singing sour notes in Frank Sinatra's ears, he would still be Bing the Great. That's what happens when you get a kid crush on a stuck by Rudy Vallee all these years. Well, Rudy was the Frank Sinatra of the Terrific Twenties.

FOREST CITY PRODUCTS, INC. - CLEVELAND 13, OHIO

In fact, Frank has confessed a time or two that it was Bing who inspired him really to dig on this singing business and set out on a career. Frankie was still a New Jersey jerk then, trying to get somewhere on his newspaper job, and he'd got himself all tangled up in love trouble with Nancy, his present wife. Frank wanted to get married, and the sensible thing to do when you are figuring on becoming a husband is to have a steady job. But, sitting with Nancy in a Manhattan movie one Sunday afternoon, he ran into a Bing Crosby picture, and as the Old Master rolled his big blue eyes and gave out with some pear-shaped notes, Frank was carried away. "I'm going to quit my job and sing," he stated, "like I've always wanted to." And he did. And you know what happened.

no. 1 crosby fan . . .

The first time Frank met and had a chat with his idol was not long after he had come to Hollywood for "Higher and Higher." Naturally, with all the swoon build-up, the squeal stuff and the bobby-sock ballyhoo, Frank was a marked man, and naturally, too, the columnists and press agents had to build up some sort of a Crosby-Sinatra rivalry, because didn't both of them sing songs? The fact that Frank's style and Bing's are two separate articles entirely, the fact that Frank belongs to an entirely different generation than Bing (he's twenty-six, and Bing's in his forties), and the fact that you can like them both at the same time and probably do, had nothing to do with it. After all, there has to be an angle for some hullabaloo.

So—Frank's radio producers thought it would be a good idea to have Bing and Frank show up on each other's programs. Also RKO thought it might just be possible the Groaner would consent to a quick appearance in Frank's picture, and Frank could return the compliment in Bing's current epic. "Tell your agent to get in touch with Bing's agent," said Frank's radio boss.

Frank was horrified. "My agent?" he gasped. "Why I wouldn't think of that. Gosh! I'll go see Bing myself. Say—he's too big a man to treat that way!" So he called up Bing, and Bing invited him over to lunch at Paramount. They really got together then, and although the picture and radio swap was nixed by various managers and things, that started the personal friendship of the King and the Crown Prince. Frank came away and told his crew, "I've been talking to Bing. I actually had lunch with Bing Crosby, honest!" Just like a movie-struck fan who'd touched Garbo. They kidded him about it around the RKO dressing room for days, but Sinatra kids easy. He didn't mind.

Since then, of course, getting to know Bingo better and better and thereby having to learn to crack back or get annihilated by the wig-parters Bob Hope and Bing toss around, Frank has managed to punch back. For instance, last time he was in New York, walking up Fifth Avenue, he looked in the window at Sulka's, exclusive Manhattan haberdashery, and spied a sport shirt to end all sport shirts. The thing had Oriental sunbursts on it, birds of paradise, Dali-esque alligators and maybe the Great Chicago fire, too. Anyway, I have it on good authority that it was a shirt to make even an old scream-shirt fancier like Bing Crosby shudder and shake. "Hold on," Frankie told his manager, Al Levy. "This just has to go back to the G"

Maybe he'll be coming home in October—at least an furlough. Keep your hands caressable.

Frankie has learned to be quick on the uptake and handy with the touché retort, too. He's had to with those worldly wolves, Crosby and Hope, snapping happily at him. One place where the trio let themselves go is on "Command Performance," the GI radio show. The insults and lowerations flow fast and furious. Bing and Frank were warbling off a duet, for instance, the other day for the soldiers, Cole Porter's "You're the Top." Suddenly Bing heard Frank change the lyrics. "You're the top," Frank sang, "you're the head canary!" Bing thought that was pretty nice. But the next line showed Frank was just suckering him. "You're the top," he chanted, "though your top ain't hairy!" That's Bing's real weakness, his shiny head of vanishing fuzz. Another time Frankie played on the same theme. Bing had just thrown in a snide remark about Frank's emaciated frame. Frank got through bending his notes on "This Love of Mine."

"My, my," whispered Bing, "to think that such beautiful music can come out of a rag, a bone and a hank of hair."

"Anyway, I've got hair," chuckled back Frank. They go on like that for hours. "Just call me Bing," pleads Bing in mock friendliness. "I wouldn't dream of calling a man your age by his first name," Frank comes back. Whoever is hanging around those battles of wit and words has to join in or go under. Once Judy Garland came in to break it up with a little feminine song and charm. Bob Hope immediately pounced on her. "Where's Frank Sinatra, Judy? I thought you were coming together—or did you swoon?"

"Oh, no," said Judy, "we were coming together. But I couldn't carry Frank another block!"

Maybe the most telling wisecrack Frank ever got off at Bing's expense, was delivered in the warm-up before Bing's very own show at NBC studios in Hollywood. Even today one of the most rapt audience members of Bing Crosby's at the Kraft Music Hall is a certain F. Sinatra. He likes to watch Bing work. Well, this evening Frank went backstage before the show, and Bing dragged him out on the stage to help jolly up the auadience. Naturally, those two together didn't need to say a word; the studio went wild. But Ukie was standing around, Ukie is one who always stimulates Bing's razz glands. He started ragging him, and in self-defense Ukie finally burst out with,

"Oh, Crosby, why don't you give up?"

Then's where Frank stepped in with his Sunday punch.

"You heard what the man said, Bing. You heard what he said!"

It's not at all hard to prove, though, that Frank and Bing have a genuine regard for each other which all the comic crustiness can't cover completely. Bing showed that way back the very first time the news camera caught him and

What happens when your hat comes down?

SOMEDAY the War will be over.

Hats will be tossed into the air all over America on that day.

But what about the day after?

No man knows just what's going to happen then. But we know one thing that must not happen:

We must not have a postwar America fumbling to restore an out-of-gear economy, staggering under a burden of idle factories and idle men, wracked with internal dissension and stricken with poverty and want.

That is why we must buy War Bonds—now.

For every time you buy a Bond, you not only help finance the War. You help to build up a vast reserve of postwar buying power. Buying power that can mean millions of postwar jobs making billions of dollars' worth of postwar goods and a healthy, prosperous, strong America in which there'll be a richer, happier living for every one of us.

Frank together. That happened at the NBC studios, where Frank, a CBS man, was visiting on Joan Davis' show. Right before it came Bing's half hour. The NBC and CBS press agents got their little heads together and decided here was the Big Chance. The programs overlapped—that is, Bing would be leaving just as Frank started on the air. But there were three whole pages in the first part of the Davis show where Sinatra wasn't needed. They set it up with Bing to shoot the picture then and with Frank to run off the stage, make 'em and get back for his lines. Both Frank and Bing, approached separately, said "Sure!"

Frankie was so eager to make the shots that out on the broadcasting stage he kept craning his neck over to the wings, looking for Bing, and Joan Davis, who hadn't been told, wondered what the heck went on. When she saw Frankie trot off the stage when his empty spot came, she thought he'd gone crazy! So as he whizzed by, she grabbed him by the coat collar and hung on. That ruined the plans, but to everyone's surprise, Bing Crosby laughed and said, "I'll just wait around until after the show, and we'll make the pictures then."

speech is silver . . .

In the past ten years Bing had never been known to wait on anyone anywhere, he's that relaxed and indifferent. Nor has he ever given a hoot whether or not he ever had a picture snapped of him or an article written about him or anything else. But the next morning bright and early, Bing was on the phone in person calling the publicity boys at NBC and CBS. He said he'd sure like a quick set of those pictures of, as he said, "the two vocalists."

As for Frank Sinatra—how he feels about Crosby, comes out all the time. He was a guest on Bob Burns' show not long ago, and as Robin and Bing are pals of long standing, the Groaner dropped around backstage before the show for a chat and ran into Sinatra. Then he left, Frank thought. But during the program, where Frank and Bob Burns were rattling off some repartee about Bing, Frank tossed in a line of his own on the spur of the moment. "No kidding," he said feelingly, "he's the best there is!"

Whereupon, to his surprise Bing himself, who had been on the sidelines watching the show, walked out on the stage, smacked Frank with a big, loud kiss and slipped him a brand new, shiny silver dollar!

Frankie and Bing and Bop Hope are three of a kind in a lot of other ways, of course, besides snappy comebacks, cut-ups and respect for one another. All three have a tremendous and unique talent that can't be boobed, and all three, on the personal side, are Joes who haven't an enemy in town. Hunt all over Hollywood and parts East and West, and you'll be mighty hard put to find a bad word from anyone—male or female—about Hope, Crosby or Sinatra. But of the three, perhaps the softest-hearted, most generous and sentimental is Frank Sinatra. Bob Hope and Bing Crosby have been up there on the top for so long that a certain blasé crust has had to form to protect them from being washed to pieces by waves of public worship. But it's still all new and wonderful to Sentimental Sinatra, and maybe the biggest kick he's getting out of being a star is throwing his talent and the money it brings him around. Of course, with all the contracts and day and night jobs he has, the Voice hasn't yet been able to dash off to foreign battlefronts to entertain lonesome GI's. But every Saturday, and often Sunday too, an Army technical crew moves in on Frank wherever he is, and he puts in a few thousand dollars worth of bent-notes on wax for this and that camp or fighting sector. When Bob Hope sailed on his current entertainment tour in the South Pacific, he was hard up for new gags and material to keep GI Joe laid up with laughs. Bob uses up funny material like a Kentucky Colonel uses up bourbon. His stable of gag men were dried up and panting. When Frank heard about it, he sent his whole staff of radio writers out to Bob's house for a week, getting together a satchel full of funny business for Bob to use on his atoll-hopping tour.

singing saint . . .

The other day Frank read in a Los Angeles newspaper about an ex-sailor and his young bride (an expectant mother) who got in a jam with the law hooking some things off a store counter, to help them set up housekeeping. The sailor was just back from the wars, had seen rugged action, had a disability discharge. He wasn't a real thief but really a casualty of the war and a preview of a problem that a lot of kids might be tempted to have. Promptly Frankie scribbled a hundred dollar check and sent it to the pair as "my wedding present." "Keep your chin up," advised Frankie. The sailor did and won a dismissal of his case in court. (And he's going to name his baby after Sinatra.)

That soft side of Frankie is probably incurable, thank goodness. On his radio program the other night he was singing "I'll Get By" when a little white-haired lady, about seventy years old, whispered to a girl seated beside her in the front row, "Isn't he wonderful? I know now why all you girls swoon over him." Frankie heard her, and a smile cracked his face from ear to ear. After the program switch to New York that followed, he leaned down and said, "Thanks, Honey—now because you're so nice, I'm going to sing a song just for you." He announced it to the audience, "Here's one for my favorite fan here," and he pointed to the thrilled and fussed little old lady. Then he got down and on his knees sang right to her, "I'll be Seeing You."

The lady, by the way, had a taste of how it feels to be queen for a minute right after the show. Darned if the bobby-sockers didn't gang up on her for the autograph of "the girl Sinatra sang to!"

But Frank has one character spot that's right in line with his pals. He's nutty about kids. Bing has proved his passion for small fry with a dozen picture pals, from Don O'Connor on up and down. And in his own home he's done all right, although by now Gary, Denny and Linny have sprouted to a size where the old man has to be tough or get snowed under. If they get obstreperous, Pop Crosby wades in yelling, "Break it up, you hams, break it up!" and they break it up.

Hope the householder is tyrannized a little more by his kids, Linda and Tony, especially Linda, a blonde little dream who leads Bob around by his notorious nose any time she wants to. By now, though only five, Linda is plenty wise in show business. Whenever Bob has time on his radio camp shows or even commercial programs he slips in, "Good night, Linda and Tony." But sometimes the program is long, and he doesn't make it. And that's tragedy in the Hope home, and there have been complaints. Not long ago Bob set out from his house, as usual, in a whirlwind rush. Linda wanted to know where daddy was off to.

"Santa Ana Air Base," Bob flung back over his shoulder. "For a radio show. And if Daddy's lucky, he'll say 'Good night, Linda and Tony' right over the air."

"All right," agreed Linda. "But you'd better write it in the script now!"

Another time Bob's wife, Dolores, was scolding Linda for some cut-up or other.

"Okay, okay," retorted Linda, "I'll let Daddy get all the laughs around here!"

lullaby lane . . .

Frank's babies are still too much on the small side to pester their pop, but it's a cinch that when they get big enough, he'll be putty in their hands. When Frank came out to Hollywood and had to leave his wife, Nancy, and the new baby back East, he shipped Sinatra-crooned lullaby records back by the case loads to set the baby, two weeks old, off on the right sound track. And when there isn't one of his own around to make happy, some other kid gets the Sinatra sunshine. Frank can't help himself that way. Little Dean Stockwell, who plays with Frank in "Anchors Aweigh," found himself with a swell imported music-box the other day that plays Brahms' lullaby when you lift the lid. And when the sound man on that same picture announced that his new daughter had just arrived, he went home that night with a $100 war bond for the baby. That's Frankie, all the time.

The Hope, Crosby and Sinatra families don't see an awful lot of each other, so the fellows' friendship is mostly a work-a-day one. All of them are so busy these days that home is mostly a place to grab a quick bite and expire on a handy bed. And all the wives, too, are tied down with growing kids. But Frank Sinatra has bought Nancy a home on the shores of Toluca Lake, and already he has a couple of rowboats and some bikes to go visiting when he has the time. Bob Hope already lives there, and while the Crosbys are temporarily in absentia, being burned out and living near Beverly Hills, they don't like it, and it's a safe guess that come V-Day, Bing will be building himself a chateau and making the San Fernando Valley his home, somewhere comfortably near the first tee at Lakeside Country Club, his home away from home.

Then the Three Jokers can carry on their slam-bang palship over the back fence, and maybe then somebody can dream up a triple Hatfield-McCoy family feud—although you can bet right now it will be a phoney.

Matter of fact, the only real jealousy I can uncover so far in the friendship of Bing Crosby, Frank Sinatra and Bop Hope is the rankling envy of those two first guys for the last—and with a pretty good reason. Both Bing and Frank are pea-green because Bob has been out wowing GI's where the bullets fly and they'd give their gravel larynx and their best bow-tie, respectively, for the million unforgettable experiences Bob has collected up front with our fighting Yanks.

Perhaps the one serious wisecrack Bing ever made about his pal, Bob Hope, was when Bob's book about his front-line Army tours hit the stands the other day. It's called, "I Never Left Home," and when Bingo got his copy, he cracked ruefully, "It's a great book, Bob. But by the title maybe I should have written it."

Bing will be fixing that up, he hopes, as you read this. He's booked for a tour of Army hospitals when he winds up his summer movie and radio jobs about a month from now, and he's hoping to get overseas where the big show is playing. The same goes for Frank Sinatra, if he can ever wiggle off the hook of all his movie and radio contracts long enough to pack his bag and a kit of songs.

The way they figure, when they're old and gray, why should "Thanks for the Memories" be an exclusive Bob Hope tune?

"The gleam in your hair puts that gleam in his eye"

THE JAMES GIRLS

Ordinarily, Harry's word is law. But when he says, "Come see the baby, Punkin," Punkin tries to push his head between Harry's legs, under the illusion that he's an ostrich, and you can't see him. He's improving a little though—getting so he'll rush over once in a while and take a quick look, then run back to Betty or Harry and push with his nose, to make sure everything's the way it used to be, that they love him just the same.

"Sure we do," Betty comforts him. "You're the best dog we have, and Vicki's the best baby—" between two loves . . .

Harry'd left on a tour of one-nighters, to be followed by an engagement at the Astor Roof, in fulfillment of an old contract. Except for the contract, he'd never have gone. Married almost a year, it's as hard for the Jameses to say good-by as it was in those first months when Betty was working at Twentieth and Harry at Metro, and they'd meet halfway every day for lunch.

Harry was to be gone two months, and Betty'd been torn between her two loves. She just couldn't leave Vicki for all that time—being away from Harry was going to be terrible. But if she went with Harry, how could she stand not seeing Vicki? Like a sensible girl, she compromised. A month with the baby while Harry was on the road, then a month with Harry in New York—

She looked down at her daughter. "You won't miss me, honey, but I'll miss a whole month out of your life, and that's bad. But I'll bring Daddy home to you, and that'll be good—see?" Vicki winked at me, which means, "Go ahead, Mom. Just leave Noony and Granny and my bottle, and I'll be okay—"

May we pause here to make a point?

Because she's blonde and luscious, because she breezes around on the screen, because she's our No. 1 pin-up idol, people get the notion that Betty's a dizzy number, that she conga's through life, snapping her fingers and cracking wise. Nothing's farther from the truth. She's reserved, she's fastidious and a little shy. She doesn't know how to bubble or gush or put herself on exhibition. Her voice is low, her manner composed, and she rates as high in sound common sense as in curves. So you can total it up for yourself—and now that that's off our chest—

In her quiet way, she's breathless with happiness. Like a child tiptoeing round a Christmas tree, afraid to touch and almost afraid to look. Talk about fairy godmothers waving magic wands! Why, even the house they live in was a miracle—

When she bought the house in Stone Canyon where she lived with her mother, Mildred Lahr heard her say she was looking for a decorator. "Come over and see if you like our place," said Mrs. Lahr. "Then if you do, you can get the same man—"

Betty thought it was perfect, inside and out, and did get the same man. Then what happens? While she and Harry were hunting like mad for a house, she heard one day that Bert Lahr wanted to sell. She rushed Harry out there, and he bought it that same night—lovely furniture and all. All they did was change one room to a music-room for Harry and re-decorate the nursery—

From the first, Betty wanted a girl. Harry said he didn't care, but she felt a little guilty, because she knows men would rather have a boy. "You're sure you don't

E IS A VERY important letter in this war.

It's the name of the War Bonds you buy—"War Savings Bond Series E."

As you know, a Series E. Bond will work for you for ten full years, piling up interest, till finally you get $4 for every $3. Pretty nice.

There'll come a day when you'll bless these Bonds—when they may help you over a tough spot.

That's why you should make up your mind to hang on to every Bond you buy. You can, of course, cash in your Bonds any time after you've held them for 60 days. You get all your money back, and, after one year, all your money plus interest.

But when you cash in a Bond, you end its life before its full job is done. You don't give it its chance to help you and the country in the years ahead. You kill off its $4-for-every-$3 earning power.

This is good to remember when you might be tempted to cash in War Bonds. They are yours, to do what you want with.

mind if I wish for a girl, Harry? It'll be whatever it wants to be anyway—"

Girl or no girl, the nursery was going to be blue, because that's the favorite color of both. It was cleaned up and painted and wallpapered, with little capering lambs and a little lace edge running round the ceiling like a valentine. But Betty didn't hurry the decorator. Plenty of time for the furniture, she said. The baby wasn't expected till the middle of March. She wanted to put all the little diapers away herself, and all the shower presents that had piled up, but she'd rather keep that for the last, like dessert. Then, boom! she was in the hospital, and not even a stick of furniture moved in. She could have wept. Her mother and sister had the fun of putting the diapers away.

You've read about the tough time she had. According to her, she deserved a little trouble. "Because I had such an easy time beforehand." Up to the last, she'd been going to the Palladium with Harry, going to his broadcasts, driving the car and eating too much. She was ravenous the whole time—weighed 144 when she went in. It's okay, kids. Betty's herself again now.

She got to the hospital at 2 P.M. on Thursday. The baby was born 4:45 Friday morning. She was never wholly unconscious—they gave her a spinal for the operation—but her memories are hazy. Except for dashing to his broadcast and back, Harry never left her—she couldn't bear to have him out of her sight. She remembers his walking in with a stack of the crossword puzzles she's crazy about—and she remembers laughing in spite of the pains, which were lasting two minutes each. She remembers being shown a string of blue-and-white beads, tagged B. James, that would go round the baby's neck the minute it was born—

After that, she doesn't remember much but pain till she heard a cry, and saw the doctor leaning over her. "What did you say you wanted?"

So she started crying like a sissy. For a few minutes, everything broke her up. Somebody said, "Vicki's a big girl," and Betty cried. They wheeled her out into the hall where Harry waited with her mother and dad. "You've got a beautiful little girl," said Harry, and Betty cried. But she managed to whisper, "Next time we'll have a little boy—" a promise is a promise . . .

Then she remembered it was Friday. She'd promised not to have the baby on Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday, Harry's broadcast days. "I kept my promise," she murmured weakly to him.

After that, she did a lot of sleeping and, when she woke up, they brought the baby in and laid her in the crook of Betty's arm. And there she was—Victoria Elizabeth—not a hope, not a dream, but a warm pink morsel with fuzz on her head and blue and white beads round her neck. She stirred a little and made a face, and Betty looked up at Harry as if heaven had opened.

"She grinned at me. And don't let anyone tell you it was a bubble."

Two weeks at the hospital, with no visitors but the family. One day Harry said: "I'm having the house fixed up."

She couldn't quite dope that one out. "For instance, what?"

"Sent the curtains out to be laundered, so they'd be nice and fresh when you get back. Well, I had to do something—"

The only thing wrong with a hospital is having your baby doled out to you in snippets. Here she comes, and there she goes. It's necessary, but unsatisfying. Betty couldn't wait to get home, where she could see Vicki any time she liked—

So the great day came. Harry and Mrs. Grable and the nurse arrived with Vicki's carrying basket. Noony dressed her in her own little clothes and diaper. Betty, with hot and cold prickles running up and down her spine, was wheeled out to the desk, where she had to claim her child the way you would a parcel—

"Is your name James? Is this your baby?" It sounded silly, but wonderful. Whose baby did they think she was? They delivered her over to Noony. Vicki had her first ride in the family station-wagon. Betty went home in an ambulance.

The doctor's orders were for her to go to bed and stay there. Well, first she had to see the nursery. That was reasonable enough—she hadn't seen it since the furniture was in. So they wheeled her across the threshold, over the floor of robin's-egg blue to the bassinet that had once been a slave cradle. The first time she'd seen it at the decorator's, it was full of flowers—

"Now it's full of Vicki."

She saw the marvelous highchair Alice Faye had sent, that collapses into a low chair with a playpen in front. She saw the wide, chintz-covered windowseat that looks out on the garden and thought, "What a lovely place for a little girl to read." She saw the fuzzy animals on the shelf and the dresses in the wardrobe, and they opened the drawers to show her the diapers that she hadn't been able to put away herself.

Then they stuck her in bed, where she stayed a full half hour before she started wheedling. "Look, honey, I'm too excited to stay in bed. Just let me go to the nursery once more." But when she got there, she almost fell flat on her face. Harry carried her back, and that time she stayed put.

It was a heavenly interval. She had the baby, and she had Harry all to herself. His broadcasts were over, and he took almost a month off, just to be with her. It was the first time in five years he hadn't worked steadily, and the first time for Betty since she was thirteen. Convalescing might have been tiresome under other conditions, but she's never bored when Harry's with her. They had their meals together in the bedroom. They listened to records and played backgammon and gin rummy. Harry'd bring the baby in and lay her on the bed or convoy her around the room, and after a while he became very accomplished about changing her and burping her and giving her the bottle. His first present to Vicki was a musical lamb with a blue ribbon round its neck. He came in with it the day after they got home, and wound it up and held it to Vicki's ear, while it played "Merrily We Roll Along."

"So she'll like music," he grinned. "But if she doesn't like music, she doesn't have to." That's one thing they've agreed on. Because Betty's a dancer and Harry a musician doesn't mean that Vicki has to be either. She can be an elephant-trainer, if she wants to.

She does like music, however. Betty flatly asserts she can tell one tune from another, and that her favorite's "Sweet Leilani." Her father was singing it to her one day, and held a note, and Vicki came in on exactly the same note. "I know I sound like one of those mothers, and nobody will believe it, but it's true."

They have no fancy names for their offspring. It's Vicki or Baby or Honey. Or, "Hello, keed" from Harry—or at the most, "Hi, Shoog." She's crazy about her father. Keeps her eyes glued to his face from the minute he walks in, and when he walks out, they follow him all the way. "Nothing strange about it," Betty remarks, "just shows how very intelligent she is."

PANATE CO., Dept. G-241, 310 So. Michigan, Chicago

As Betty grew stronger, Harry'd carry her out to a deckchair beside the pool, and they'd have breakfast there. Harry eats enormous breakfasts. He's gained twenty pounds since their marriage, and if he doesn't look fatter, it's because he works off the calories playing baseball. If he hadn't been a musician, he'd have been a ballplayer. Before the baby came, they'd never say, "If it's a boy—" Either, "If it's a girl" or, "If it's a baseball player—"

Six weeks after they got home, the James girls went out for the first time—to see their doctors. Vicki looked simply beautiful in her fancy pants—soakers to you—and a little white dress and a white silk bonnet and coat. She waited with Noony in the car, while Daddy took Mother to see her doctor, then they went over to Vicki's doctor, and he said she was a fine specimen. Her parents knew it, but they thought it was sensible of the doctor to agree with them.

Now, on Noony's day off, Betty takes care of the baby. She was scared to death the first time—

"You'd better do it," she told her mother, "and I'll watch—"

But it wasn't two minutes before she was telling her mother what to do. "That's a new kind of diaper. You fold it square—" back-seat mamma . . .

Mrs. Grable's very tactful. "Goodness," she murmured, "what'll they think up next?" Having seen two daughters and a grandson through infancy, however, she couldn't quite take it all lying down.

"You're supposed to hold her head," said Betty the mamma.

"Look, honey," said grandma, "did your head ever roll off?"

Betty's an expert now. When the baby's awake, she lugs her round the house like a doll. Vicki never cries except when she's hungry or wants water. Noony fixes the formula before she leaves, and all Betty has to do is warm it up and give the baby her bottle. Oh, and bathe her—she's so cute in the tub. And stick her out on the nursery porch for her sunbath. And pop her into the bassinet for her nap—

It's a pleasant picture—Betty in the blue nursery, a yellow ribbon round her hair, laying her baby into the cradle, rocking it gently—

"This doesn't spoil her—much. I know it's against the rules, but I don't care. I'm going to spoil her—up to a point."

It's a subject on which she has firm ideas. No books on child psychology for Betty. Just common sense. Common sense tells you not to disturb her when she's resting. Common sense tells you not to overindulge her, so she gets false ideas of her own importance and grows up to be a pain in the neck. But this notion of never picking a baby up or cuddling her doesn't sit well with Betty—

"We're not going to ignore our child. We're not going to give her to the nurse and say, 'raise her for us.' That's what's so nice about Noony. She's not one of those characters that says, 'Don't come in now—the baby's asleep.' As if she didn't even belong to you. We don't moo and goo over her, but it's good for babies to be talked to and played with, to have them know they're part of your life."

Betty's not planning to stop at one baby. She hopes to have that baseball player yet, but not for a couple of years. On July 31st she's scheduled to return to work in "Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe." Harry'll be starting a picture around that date, too, so at least they'll be busy at the same time.

She's given a lot of thought to the marriage-and-career problem. Betty's too sober-minded to brush it off with a careless. "Oh, it can't happen to us." They're so in love, she doesn't see how it could, but believe us, she's going to keep her eyes open, and any time the career threatens their happiness, she'll quit—

Not that she doesn't enjoy her work. She does. And she's grateful for all it's brought her. But she's not one of those who must have a career or die. It was quite by accident that Buddy de Sylva discovered those diamonds in her feet, and built up her role in "DuBarry"—the role that skyrocketed her. At Twentieth, she's never made demands. She's been satisfied to let the studio pick her parts, and they've done plenty all right by her. She's worked hard, she's had fun, she'd like to go on. But while her responsibility used to be only to the studio, now she has a greater one to her husband and child—

Right now, there's a special reason why she wants to continue. Letters pour in from servicemen, begging her not to quit. Don't get her wrong. She knows the war will be won even if she never dances another step. But the boys seem to like the kind of pictures she makes and, as long as they get a kick out of them, she thinks it's up to her to make them.

Harry's never asked her to give up her work. He knows she enjoys it, so it's all right with him. Being in show business himself, he understands the headaches. And Betty has this advantage—she's married to a man who's as well known as she is—at least—and who makes a lot more money. He'll never be Mr. Grable.

and baby makes three . . .

So she thinks it'll work out, because there's just one point she's sure of. Harry and Vicki come first. If she finds that working means being away from six in the morning till six at night, coming home dead tired, not seeing enough of her family, not being able to give them enough of herself—well, there just won't be any argument, that's all—the career will go—

Sometimes she turns to Harry in a kind of bewilderment. "I don't deserve to have everything work out—first the movies, then you, now the baby and a girl at that. No one deserves to be so lucky—"

Harry doesn't like to hear her call herself lucky. "Say fortunate—"

"What's the difference?"

"I can't put my finger on it exactly. Lots of people have luck, but they're not all happy. It's what you do with your luck that counts, and that depends on something inside yourself. Character, maybe—"

And that's where we think Harry did put his finger on it. Exactly.

THE PRODIGAL WOMEN

By Nancy Hale

NO woman had ever excited men the way Maizie Jekyll did—no woman in all of Boston's turbulent history! She really couldn't help it. Every man who came near her sensed that strange hunger, bred into her by generations of Southern belles whose one aim in life was to please and be pleased!

Yes, during those jazz-crazy, gin-crazy years, Maizie was the most ravishing thing in town—until she met Lambert Rudd. She trapped him (untamed philanderer though he was) into marriage. Then life became a passionate hell—for both of them. Even though Maizie did everything, risked everything, to make her cruel, sensual husband happy.

Their Mistake In Love Was In Giving Too Much!

That was the curse of this clan of women, goaded on by an endless hunger that enslaved themselves! To Maizie's fun-loving sister it was to bring exquisite pleasure, and terrible pain. For Betsy, too, was the toast of the town—a pleasure-seeking, devil-may-care girl that men fought over—until dance-mad Oren Garth beat a jazz rhythm on her young heart.

But something still drove Betsy on a restless search from one man to another, for the kind of love she wanted.

She Loved Too Late!

Beautiful, ambitious Leda March, Betsy's best friend, was different! She thought she could spend long, lazy hours in an artist's studio—or leave them alone. But when she cold-bloodedly married her own rich cousin, she awoke, too late, to sudden passion for Maizie's husband—a passion more maddening than she had ever thought possible!

Why did these three lovely women waste their gifts of love? What strange contradictions of fate made them always receive so much less than they so prodigally gave? Read the thrilling answers in a book that is among today's leading best-sellers—

The PRODIGAL WOMEN

By Nancy Hale

Merely to get this book in your hands is to stay with it, fascinated, until the last exciting page! You'll be enthralled from beginning to end by this sweeping, deeply emotional novel that bares the hearts and souls of three passionate women in love.

Rarely, if ever, has any other book been so frank about a woman's innermost feelings. And so real is Nancy Hale's story-telling that you'll feel you've known these three "daughters of Eve" all your life—that you have actually lived these thrilling events yourself. That is why this amazing book is now a leading best-seller at $3 in the publisher's edition. But you get it FREE!

LEDA MARCH — sensitive, unhappy daughter of a well-known Boston family, who finds it impossible to forego the love of the artist-husband of her childhood friend! She posed for him, suffered under his jibes, played the waiting game that only a woman knows how to play.

BETSY JEKYLL—captivating younger daughter of Tom Jekyll; she watches in fascination the downward path of her sister, yet is unable to avoid the same temptations and pitfalls herself! "I don't consider I'm promiscuous," she said. "Not a bit! I'm good and choosy."

MAIZIE JEKYLL—Betsy's seductive sister, whose endless love for a self-centered, passionate artist brings her dangerously close to the very brink of insanity! Was she as bad a sport as her husband told her she was? Or did she have the right idea about men, and what a woman must do?

—and ALSO FREE

JANE EYRE

Now the Tremendous Smash-Hit Feature Movie!

In addition to THE PRODIGAL WOMEN you also get FREE one of the greatest stories of passion hate, romance and mystery ever written!—JANE EYRE, by Charlotte Bronte.

Here is the full unabridged text of the book that shocked London so intensely dramatic it has just been made into one of the greatest productions in motion picture history, starring Orson Welles and Joan Fontaine!

JANE EYRE tells of a woman's love for a married man—a married man with an illegitimate child, and an insane wife driven mad by her own excesses. He spent his life seeking a woman he could really love . . . first a French dancing girl, then a Viennese milliner, then a Neapolitan countess—and at last the one woman he adored, who was torn from his arms by the most terrible secret that ever cursed a man's love!

This is a book you will feel to the depths of your heart, remember as long as you live. It is yours FREE!—as the second half of this great gift offer!

He's far more apt to find you fair

If you have lovely, shining hair!

No other Shampoo leaves hair so lustrous, and yet so easy to manage!

Only Drene with Hair Conditioner reveals up to 33% more lustre than soap . . . yet leaves hair so easy to arrange, so alluringly smooth!

Does your hair look dull, slightly mousy?

Maybe it's just because you're washing it with soap or soap shampoos . . . letting soap film hide the glorious natural lustre and color brilliance. Change to Drene with Hair Conditioner. Drene never leaves any dulling film. That's why it reveals up to 33% more lustre than any soap shampoo!

Does your hair-do require constant fiddling?

Men don't like this business of running a comb through your hair in public! Fix your hair so it stays put! And remember Drene with Hair Conditioner leaves hair wonderfully easy to manage, right after shampooing! No other shampoo leaves hair so lustrous, yet so easy to arrange!

Sssssshhhhh! But have you dandruff?

Too many girls have! And what a pity. For unsightly dandruff can be easily controlled if you shampoo regularly with Drene. Drene with Hair Conditioner removes every trace of embarrassing flaky dandruff the very first time you use it!

THE GAYLY COLORED woolen "weskit" is new and smart. Wear it with an equally gay shirt, in contrasting color! And try this smart new hair-do, with the very low side part which starts 'way out at the end of the eyebrow. For glamorous, shining-smooth hair—use Drene Shampoo with Hair Conditioner!

Smile, Plain Girl, Smile..

Romance can begin with a lovely smile!

Let your smile bring new happiness! Help keep it sparkling with Ipana and Massage!

MORE POWER TO YOU, Plain Girl! You don't need to have real beauty to make you click.

Learn from the girls who have the most fun – girls who find happiness, romance. Yes, learn that you can cast a spell with a smile!

So smile, plain girl, smile. But be sure your smile is radiant, heart-warming in its charm. Remember, though, that such a smile needs sparkling teeth. And teeth that are sound and bright depend so much upon firm, healthy gums.

Never ignore "Pink Tooth Brush"!

If you see "pink" on your tooth brush, see your dentist at once! He may tell you your gums are sensitive—that modern soft foods have robbed them of exercise. And as thousands of dentists do, he may very likely suggest "the helpful stimulation of Ipana and massage."

For Ipana Tooth Paste not only cleans teeth but, with massage, helps the health of the gums as well. So massage a little Ipana onto your gums each time you clean your teeth. Circulation speeds up in the gums—helps them to new firmness.

Start today with Ipana and massage. Help keep your gums firmer, your teeth brighter, your smile more appealing.

It's a Great Life for the girl with a bright, flashing smile. Let Ipana and massage help keep your smile radiant!

The greatest star of the screen!

In Collier's, Good Housekeeping, McCall's, Woman's Home Companion, American Magazine and Cosmopolitan, the Picture of the Month is "An American Romance".

★ ★ ★ ★

The Picture Company of The Year is—but why say it.

★ ★ ★ ★

Getting downright serious, M-G-M has put a lot of laurel on this leonine mane in this Anniversary Year of 1944.

★ ★ ★ ★

King Vidor directed "An American Romance". One of the first pictures made by the company was his "The Big Parade". That was in 1924.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" is a Big Parade of our time, our country, our struggles, our loves. It is a "must" picture and is to be ranked along with those other recent "musts" "The White Cliffs of Dover", "Dragon Seed" and "The Seventh Cross".

★ ★ ★ ★

We're not going to expand further about the glorious and forthcoming

"Mrs. Parkington" which stars Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon. We're going to leave this expansion to kismet.

★ ★ ★ ★

Did you know that kismet means fate in Arabic? Well you will when you see the dazzling romance, the swirling orgy of panoramic color that stars Ronald Colman.

★ ★ ★ ★

"Kismet" is about the biggest eyeful that has ever happened on the screen.

Marlene Dietrich who dances her way to romance is clothed in Technicolor.

It simply isn't done—this hauling a guy off by a hank of hair. There are far subtler ways of dragging a man to our lairs these days!

■ Acquiring smoothness, chickens, isn't business like—say—catching the measles. You have to work at it. We told you that last month, but in case you were looking the other way, here we go again. It starts with looking your most lush all the time (and toward this end our fashion, beauty and weight charts will light your way). It includes knowing how to eat correctly, how to introduce people, how to acknowledge a compliment (and you'll find our Etiquette chart invaluable for that sort of thing). The really smooth person, you know, is at home in the world. She doesn't go to pieces the minute she's with a new man or a strange crowd. She knows how to cope with all the crises in the book, so that when they arise, they don't scare her. How do the smoothies get that way? Well, maybe by experience. Maybe by having a big sister who gave them ten easy lessons.

Stop envying them. Now. Right this second. And join the lodge yourself. Every month we'll give you a couple of pointers. Use 'em. Make them part of your bag of tricks. If you do—no matter what a mouse you are now—you'll be a dream kid by New Year's, and that's a promise. Last month we talked about getting stuck at dances, and if you missed the issue, steal it from one of your chums. This time it's that ticklish business of asking a boy to a party Read on!

ARSENIC AND OLD LACE

■ This hilarious story of two amiable old ladies whose hobby is poisoning equally amiable old gentlemen will provide you with more laughs than you've had in years. It's completely mad—and completely wonderful! Josephine Hull and Jean Adair, who starred in the Broadway version, continue their career of crime in the picture. Cary Grant plays their bewildered nephew, and Priscilla Lane is his unkissed bride. Raymond Massey and Peter Lorre handle the menace department.

The Brewster family of Brooklyn is as much of an institution there as the Brooklyn bridge. Miss Abby (Josephine Hull) and Miss Martha (Jean Adair) are known for their old-fashioned kindness and charity. Their nephew, Mortimer (Cary Grant) is a famous dramatic critic. He has just married the Brewster's next-door neighbor, Elaine Harper (Priscilla Lane), and they are to leave that night on their honeymoon.

Perhaps they would have, too, if an elderly waif named Mr. Hoskins hadn't stopped at the Brewster house to inquire about a room. But Abby's and Martha's kind hearts are always touched by poor old men with no place to go. They have long since worked out a plan to take care of these unfortunates. Just one sip of Abby's delicious elderberry wine (one teaspoonful of arsenic and a little strychnine to each (Continued on page 10)

One sip of the Brewster sisters' (Josephine Hull, Jean Adair) elderberry wine (teaspoonful of arsenic and a little strychnine per gallon), and their careworn guests are peaceful forever. Nephew Mortimer (Cary Grant) rebels, almost comes to a heavenly rest himself.

Could a strange guest destroy your home . . . ?

She came into their lives as she might come into yours—a charming and welcomed visitor—but as deadly as a cobra. Deep within her flamed strange, sinister, neurotic desires—she would stop at nothing to destroy those who loved her! Hunt Stromberg has made a daring motion picture from the daring play—the boldest love story that the screen has ever told—the most unusual entertainment of the year!

Now I can wear tampons, too.

Rounded ends make FIBS* Tampons easier to use!

Do you envy those other girls . . . who find internal sanitary protection so easy to use? Why not learn their secret? See what a difference there is between Fibs, the Kotex* tampon, and other tampons you've tried!

Fibs have rounded ends, gently tapered for easier insertion. The just-right size of Fibs means this tampon is not too big, not too tiny. And Fibs alone are "quilted" to give you greater safety, greater comfort. These are features, important to every woman, which only Fibs, of all leading tampons, give you!

So, try Fibs. Once you've tried them you'll find Fibs so comfortable and safe . . . so easy to use . . . you'll never go back to other kinds.

gallon), and the elderly gentlemen are at peace forever. Then Teddy Brewster (John Alexander), who thinks he's Theodore Roosevelt, buries them in the cellar. Abby and Martha are always careful to inquire as to their victim's religion, so that they may hold an appropriate burial ceremony.

So you see it's all very easy and pleasant. The sisters are definitely annoyed with Mortimer for making such a fuss when he finds the body of Mr. Hoskins in the window seat. Why, the way he rants, you'd think they'd committed a crime! It's too bad they hadn't gotten around to burying Mr. Hoskins yet, but the minister came to tea, and they were so busy. . . . Tonight, they assure Mortimer, they will tuck him away in the cellar with the other eleven bodies.

Mortimer continues to be unreasonable. He won't even start off on his honeymoon. Then to make matters worse, Jonathan arrives. Jonathan (Raymond Massey) is the black sheep of the Brewster family. He is accompanied by his friend, Dr. Einstein (Peter Lorre), who has assisted him in twelve murders over a period of years. Yes, twelve! His score, and Abby's and Martha's, are the same. That infuriates Jonathan, who decides Mortimer would make a lucky thirteenth to break the tie. . . .

You'll just have to go and see the picture. Nothing I can say about it does it justice.—War.

P. S.

Took two solid months of intensive shooting to capture this play on film, but everyone from stand-in to producer had fun. . . . The trio of happy lunatics—the two old maid sisters and their brother—were imported from the New York stage. Josephine Hull, Jean Adair and John Alexander did their parts so well no one could be found in Hollywood to replace them. . . . Every available inch of Warners' huge stage seven, the largest sound stage in Hollywood, was jammed with buildings and backings to represent the section of Brooklyn. Artists and technicians spared neither time nor expense to duplicate the Dutch dwellings found in Brooklyn in the eighteen sixties. The houses had real tongue and groove flooring, beamed ceilings and fireplaces that really worked. The main house boasted a large old kitchen with a Dutch oven and real closets loaded with real preserves. . . . A solid acre of canvas was used for the cyclorama which completely circled the setting. On it was depicted dwellings, the towering buildings of lower N. Y., and the vastness of the city proper in the distance was made felt by tiny lights which looked like traffic on the bridge and along the parkway. . . . Cary saw none of the $100,000 he was paid for the role. Half of the sum went to British charities and the remaining half to American causes. . . . Frank Capra, who served in World War I, volunteered during the closing days of the film to serve again with the armed forces. He's now a major in the Signal Corps. . . . Capra's only difficulty in filming the picture was keeping the actors from giggling through the thing. Cary, a veteran on the screen, broke up about fifty scenes—couldn't check loud guffaws when he was supposed to be seriously concerned about his imaginary aunts and their elderberry wine.

THREE IS A FAMILY

I'll bet there's a family right in your block where the married daughter and her baby have come back to live with Mother and Dad "for the duration." It's happening all over the country, so a picture built around this situation is bound to be timely. The play was a success on Broadway, and the picture will undoubtedly be one at the box-office. It's a very light comedy with most of its humor revolving around diapers, obstetrics and the maid shortage.

Marjorie Reynolds, as usual, is lovely to look at, in the role of Kitty Mitchell, who brings her baby home to her mother and father while her husband is in the Navy. Father (Charlie Ruggles) is an optimistic character who always thinks his next "deal" is going to make him a million dollars. Meanwhile he runs the house, while his wife, Frances (Fay Bainter) supports the family. Her acidly sarcastic sister, Irma (Helen Broderick), lives with them. When Kitty and the baby appear, Irma has to give up her comfortable room and sleep on the living room couch. "Even with a war on," says Irma, "no one should be asked to sleep on that couch. I'd take a fox hole in preference any time." And the baby yells all night, which doesn't help.

Other people beside Irma object. The cook leaves. The manager of the apartment house points out that the lease said very definitely "No children or pets." This last difficulty worries Archie, Kitty's brother (Arthur Lake), too. His wife, Hazel (Jeff Donnell), is going to have a baby, and where will they go if they have to give up their apartment? The Army settles the question of where he will go by inducting

WHO . . . ME?

"What do I know that would help our enemies?" Remember saying that at Mabel's hen party or that night at Joe's place? Look, Lady, we're not asking you to forget there's a war on. We're telling you that even one unimportant, silly little remark you may make about Hank's typhoid shots or the new two-inch thingamabob the plant's producing can jig-saw in with the 10,000 other unimportant, silly little remarks being passed half a continent away from you into a bloody blueprint of invasion plans that will tip off the Axis.

And don't think that just because you're with friends or family, you're free to talk. A leak of information which led to one of the greatest disasters of the whole Pacific campaign is suspected of having come from a town 300 miles away from the nearest known enemy agent! And from people who got their news third and fourth hand and rejected their responsibility to break the chain.

You can be in the Armed Forces or in a war or related industry such as transportation, you can be a clerk in a government agency or a G.I.'s wife or girl friend or mother and be guilty of sabotage! Remember, you don't have to know a big secret to give a big secret away. And Lady, you won't be stifling freedom of speech by keeping quiet—just preserving it.

So here's a little guide that'll prevent you from popping at the seams and squealing, "Can't we talk about anything?" You can, if you'll just remember these 3 rules: If you HEAR it from someone, don't repeat it. If you SEE it yourself, don't repeat it. But if you READ it in newspapers or magazines or hear it on the radio, then it's public property—and you can go ahead and talk about it as much as you like.

Pretty simple, eh? Simpler, at any rate, than trying all the rest of your life to forget that telegram—"State Department regrets to inform you . . ."

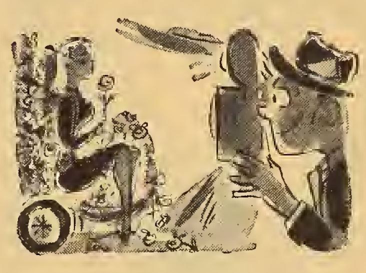
Meet Barbara Britton in "Till We Meet Again"



"Well, Paramount does it again! This time they picked a budding young star out of the Pasadena tournament of roses, and blossomed her into a beautiful leading lady . . . Some people have all the luck —but not so quick! Barbara waited over two years for the Big Break.

• • •

"This young lady is something to write about . . . Remember the pretty girl in 'So Proudly We Hail' who tries on the big straw hat with the cherries? . . . Well, that's HER!

• • •

"She starts out in this picture wearing a nun's robe, from then on wears nothing but a plain blouse and skirt, but still looks like an angel! For hers is a natural sort of beauty . . . soft blond hair, baby blue eyes, with the longest eyelashes —and they're real!

"It's no wonder that in this past year she's been the cover girl on eight issues of the greatest women's magazines!"

him, but that still leaves Hazel. Then the new cook drinks a hidden bottle of Scotch, goes mildly berserk and kidnaps Kitty's baby. In the midst of the ensuing panic, Gene (Fred Brady), her husband arrives on leave. He blames Kitty for everything, and the excitement makes Hazel's baby arrive before they can get her to the hospital. A Navy friend of Gene's shows up with a wife who promptly gets into the spirit of things by having a baby then and there. Everything turns out fine in the end, but it's a busy evening for the stork, who should certainly be listed among the cast. U.A.

P. S.

Film debut for Donna and Elissa Lambertson, nine-months-old twin girls. Casting list called for only one baby, and producer Sol Lessor saw 478 applicants before the Lambertson babies. When he saw them, he ordered the script to be rewritten around them. . . . Marjorie Reynolds, in a new romantic combination with newcomer Fred Brady, plays her first mother role as the proud parent of the two babies. . . . Charlie Ruggles and Fay Bainter play their first roles as grandparents. . . . Some of the most giggle-provoking scenes are those depicting the family's relations with the maid, Hattie McDaniel. Situation offers countless chuckles from the time she is hired in a crowded subway from under the noses of a carful of maidless people with the same idea in mind, through the trials of the family afraid to ask her name for fear of offending her. . . . Members of the cast and crew swear it wasn't power of suggestion, but a strangely large number of them increased their families while the picture was in production. Hattie McDaniel anounced she was to become a mother in the fall, Arthur Lake told friends he was to be a father for the second time, Authors, Henry and Phoebe Ephron, became parents of a third child during production. . . . As the aged, nearly blind, family doctor, pressed into service because of wartime shortages of doctors, John Philliber (whose screen career began at the age of seventy-two), plays his largest film role to date. . . . This is one of the first pictures to be shot in sequence. Usually a motion picture is made in sections, depending on location trip conveniences and stages available. Since ninety percent of the action takes place in a small New York apartment, the four rooms were constructed on one sound stage at R.K.O., and the script was done from start to finish as written.

LAURA

For sheer suspense "Laura" rates a couple of Oscars. And why not, with a fine, tight plot and a cast that is definitely all-star? Gene Tierney and Dana Andrews make a well-matched romantic team. Clifton Webb, Vincent Price and Judith Anderson handle their parts with the assurance born of successful years on Broadway. "Laura" might be called either a mystery thriller or a psychological study, but whatever you call it, be sure to see it.

One character in it will probably give you the creeps. He is Waldo Lydecker (Clifton Webb), columnist, collector, eccentric. The kind of man who is hated by almost everyone, but envied, too. He has a venomous tongue, a priceless collection of antique glass and love for just one person in the world besides himself.

That person is Laura Hunt (Gene Tierney). Waldo discovers Laura when she is an unknown young copywriter for an advertising firm. Somehow her charm and beauty pierce his selfish shell, and he falls in love. From then on, Laura's career

WHAT A WONDERFUL START THAT WAS!

When we asked you wonderful people to try to make up the million-dollar kitty that Virginia Zanuck needs to further her Naval Aid Auxiliary, frankly, we wondered . . . And the September issue hadn't been on the stands two days before the M.S. walls started to bulge with requests—"Here's my quarter, send me So 'n' So's autograph." "Enclosed please find two dollars, I'd like eight NAA star-autographed cards." And so it went, loyal kids tumbling over each other to plunk down their dime and nickels, 25c per autograph, and most of the time asking for three and four of them for as many quarters. They knew how their help is needed to provide milk for sailors' babies and medical care and lodging for their families and canteen aid and extra clothing and the million and one things a fighting man and his loved ones need when he's off to the wars.

So keep it coming. Fill in the coupon below, now, and send it out with a quarter for each NAA card complete with emblem and personal autograph of the star you choose from the list.

is assured. Through Waldo she meets everyone worth knowing. Her own talent does the rest.

But one of the people she meets is Shelby Carpenter, and that ends Waldo's chances. Shelby is handsome, amusing—and a heel. He has been having a useful romance with Anne Treadwell (Judith Anderson), who is wealthy enough to afford him and who has no illusions as to his character. Then he and Laura fall in love, and one night Death rings the doorbell of Laura's apartment.

Mark McPherson (Dana Andrews), the detective assigned to the murder case which follows, falls in love with Laura. Which is a very odd thing for him to do, since it's her murder he is investigating. Or perhaps Laura isn't really dead. Perhaps it was another beautiful girl who answered the doorbell's ring that night and was killed by a shotgun blast in her face.

Dana Andrews, as the hardboiled detective in love for the first time, will start you writing fan letters like mad. And Gene Tierney is prettier than ever, but top acting honors go to Clifton Webb for his eerie impersonation of Lydecker.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Since "Laura" is an escape story of a new type—escape into the mad luxury of pre-war New York cafe society life—Gene was provided with an elaborate wardrobe. Clifton Webb has forty years in the theater behind him (he made his debut at seven), was once one of the greatest living dancers, stepped into dramatic roles when he couldn't find a dance partner fast enough to keep up with him. . . . The sequence in Waldo's New York penthouse bathroom out-DeMilles any bathroom scene done on the screen. The room itself is of sea green tile with a chaise lounge of leopard skin among the other gay accessories. Those of the audience who like to loll away hours in the tub will get a laugh when they see a typewriter shelf which permits Waldo to work in the tub. A telephone and a

The slick chicks and the melting matrons were gnashing their teeth. The lights were flooding, the fans milling, the reporters roving—and Bob and Pete Lawford strolled into the premiere of "White Cliffs"—stag! It was too much. "But heck," grinned Bob, "we're celebrating. This is Pete's first American movie and me, well, the studio just announced that I'm getting star billing in 'The Clock.'" Private Hargrove's been baching it for quite a while now, ever since he and "Bernadette" split up. Not that it's a question of torch totin' or anything, but Bob's been playing the field and liking it. Our "Good Newser," Louella Parsons, was go-between for a date 'tween him and a very willing Diana Lynn, Glo DeHaven was in the running for a time, and then there was l'affaire topaz ring with which he gifted Jimmy Garland, Judy's sister. He's a busy fella, Bob, outgorging his two kids at the circus, yipping sore 'cause M-G-M "grounded" him because he was risking life and contract on those two fiendish motorcycles of his, desolate because he simply can't get a promotion. He was a corporal in "Since You Went Away," "30 Seconds Over Tokyo" and "The Clock," and now, he's on the downgrade for sure. Bobbie's a bell boy in his next flicker—with Lamarr!

handy reference library are all within easy reach. . . . Webb, one of the ten best dressed men in the world, lost his baggage en route from New York. Since he would wear his own wardrobe in "Laura," the bathroom scenes were shot during the days while he waited for the missing trunks to be forwarded. Webb spent ten days in a tub of lukewarm water, naked to the waist. . . . Dialogue of "Laura" is one of its outstanding features. TILL WE MEET AGAIN

This is another picture about the French underground, but it has a completely new type of heroine. Barbara Britton, one of Paramount's newest discoveries, plays a young nun. As Sister Clothilde, she has dedicated her life—and love—to the Church. There is no place in it for the affairs of the outside world.

Yet even in a convent, one can not entirely ignore the war. Clothilde discovers, to her shocked amazement, that the Mother Superior is a member of the Underground. The crypts beneath the ancient stone convent are used as a hiding place for those who seek escape from the Germans. To Clothilde, this seems like sacrilege. The Mother Superior wearily explains that here on earth the Church must fight for what is right. The girl tries to understand but still feels that the convent should take no part in such matters.

The next night, Clothilde finds a young American flier hiding in the crypt. She is frightened, but she tells the Mother Superior about him, and a plan is worked out by the Underground for his escape. The pilot, John (Ray Milland) agrees to carry some secret plans with him, and also a hand grenade with which he can blow himself—and the plans—up, if it should be necessary.

The plan calls for a girl to pose as his wife, since John is to play the part of a wounded veteran who has lost the power of speech. Someone must go with him, to care for him and speak French for him. Someone who can be trusted. That someone is to be Clothilde. She is at first reluctant. Then the Mother Superior is killed by the Germans during a raid on the convent, and Clothilde feels that she must carry on in her place.

During the long dangerous journey to the coast, Clothilde falls in love for the first time in her life. But John has a wife at home, whom he adores, and in any case her own future is promised to the Church. They are surrounded by peril, and when John is wounded and delirious, Clothilde allows herself for a few short hours to pretend to be the wife he calls for. That much happiness she may have and no more. The rest is danger and courage and sacrifice without end, but Clothilde doesn't mind. She has found the true meaning of life. . . .

Walter Slezak and Lucille Watson are particularly convincing as a collaborationist and the Mother Superior, respectively.—Par.

the picture. . . . Walter Slezak, son of the late great tenor, Leo Slezak, has made only four previous films. This is a new type role for him. In other four pictures he was a German so-and-so; in this he is a French so-and-so. . . . Cast has a strong international flavor Shayne and Sokoloff are Russian, Slezak is half Czech, Lucille Watson is a Canadian, Ray Milland was born in Wales, John Wengraf is a Viennese as is Tala Birell, and Marguerite D'Alvarez is a Peruvian. . . . Two-weeks-old Javanese Rice Birds were only two inches long from tail to beak. Survived their movie debut only because between takes they were wrapped in a soft towel and kept on an electric heating pad. . . . More than 200 doves and pigeons were used in convent garden scenes. They were loosed on a sound stage and had the run of the place for a week. The Democratic way of life was so dear to many of them, they defied all attempts to recapture them and set up housekeeping on the back lot. . . . The convent garden background scenes were made in the garden of the San Juan Capistrano mission—the same historical garden where the swallows return year after year on the same day. . . . Shouldn't spoil your enjoyment of the picture to know the bombing raid on the German held air field was done in miniature. Required eighteen days to construct the set, and it occupied the entire area of a big stage. Exactly how this is done must remain a mystery since the studios lock the stage doors and admit no one while miniature work is being done. Will admit, however, that the scale for this particular special effect was one inch to the yard.

IRISH EYES ARE SMILING

Monty Woolley seems to be softening up. In "The Man Who Came To Dinner" he exhibited the most virulent disposition ever seen on celluloid. In "The Pied Piper" he started out as a very crotchety old gentleman indeed, but soon mellowed into one who loved the patter of tiny footsteps. Now, in "Irish Eyes Are Smiling" he is only mildly sarcastic and plays Cupid all over the place. It seems rather a pity! However, he remains one of the most fascinating characters on the screen. And this is a good picture, with pretty June Haver and that alleged-threat-to-Sinatra, Dick Haymes, furnishing the love interest. Maxie Rosenbloom, Beverly Whitney, Veda Ann Borg and Anthony Quinn are included in the cast.

The story is written by Damon Runyon and is based on the life of Ernest Ball, who wrote "Mother Machree" and various other sentimental Irish ballads. Ernest (Dick Haymes) is fired from his job of teaching a course in piano because he "wastes" too much time composing songs. The same day he is fired he meets "Irish" O'Brien (June Haver) who is in the chorus of a local burlesque show. Quite unintentionally, he manages to get "Irish" fired from her job. He falls in love with her, too, but "Irish" goes off to New York to be an actress—she hopes. Ernest is so broke that he accepts the challenge of a prizefighter, Stanley Ketchel, who offers twenty-five dollars to any man who can stay in the ring with him one whole round. Ernest stays three, but only because Stanley and his manager, Edgar Brawley (Monty Woolley), are sorry for him.

Later they all meet in New York. Ernest by then is a successful song writer. "Irish" is a hatcheck girl, and Edgar is in the money as a result of some lucky gambling. Edgar bets with a show producer that he can make the next girl who comes into the room a musical comedy star in a month. Ernest, still in love with "Irish" although he's seen around all the while with beautiful Lucille Lacey, gets an idea. He manages to have "Irish" enter the room at the right moment, so Edgar is determined to make her a star to win his bet. But Lucille doesn't want any competition, and the first thing Ernest knows, "Irish" is on her way to Cuba. That's when Edgar starts to play Cupid—and with more success than he'd bargained for!—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Tiny June Haver (who weighs one hundred pounds if she tilts the scales just a little) went through her fight scenes swinging her left like a hefty Amazon. Got too enthusiastic in one scene and went to bed for two days with a sprained shoulder. Had her tonsils removed while the picture was in production. Cast sent huge bouquets to her bedside to help her "Get well fast." June was bouncing around the sound stage the very day after the operation. . . . Dick Haymes received his only vocal training from his mother, a former light opera star. Neither thought much of his voice. He was prouder of the songs he wrote. When he attempted to sell them to Harry James, Harry told him they were awful but bought Dick's voice. . . . During production Dick became a father for the second time when his daughter, Helen, was born. Dick, Jr., the first-born, is now two years old. . . . Dick signed a new contract for "IEAS" which gives him star billing in this and future pictures. In honor of this occasion, he presented his manager, Bill Burton, with a Lincoln Zephyr coupe because he felt Burton was responsible for his present position. . . . Cast and crew always have fun on a Monty Woolley set. Remarks one catches are repeated over and over to the co-workers. One such pearl was made when the wardrobe man pulled a night shirt over Woolley's head, and Monty got a look at his naked chest in the mirror. Monty remarked, "Revolting. I look exactly like a Technicolor caricature of a Mennen's Baby Powder ad.". . . The number "Bessie and Her Bustle" took almost a week to shoot. Dance Director Hermes Pan (former director for Fred Astaire Routines) has brought some of the fastest chorus numbers to this picture ever to be screened. When June and the girls went through "Strut Miss Lizzie", cameramen remarked that the dance was liable to burn the film before it reached its audience.

(See page 52)

Jeannie's not talking. But everybody else is. About her glorious red hair—or is it blonde? About the way she was discovered in a little theater production—or was it while bowling? About having been a cover girl—or was it a typist? Y'see, Jeanne's something new in flicker fashions — a beauteous babe who won't talk! Some reports have it that she was bowling in a local Hollywood 15c-a-stringer, all glamoured up in slacks, plaid boy's shirt and two skinny pigtails, when a talent scout spotted her quietly reposing on the slick, shiny surface of the alley—flat on her face! He's supposed to have yelped "Eureka!" scurried over, dusted her off and presented her the next A.M. to the 20th Century-Fox powers that be with that broad grin that comes from having cornered a particularly photogenic mouse. But then there's this version. That after having just missed polling in as "Miss America" in the 1942 national Beauty Contest, she was dubbed "Miss Long Beach," handed a coupla dozen modeling assignments and left to stagnate in a pool of panchromatic make-up at 15 dollars an hour. Which didn't suit Miss Crain at all. Because seeing as how her cherished future as an artist had crashed, she was intent on being an actress. With no place to act. Which was discouraging enough to make her want to go back home to her 25-dollar-a-week typing job in Texas and bury herself in her beloved Raphael and Shakespeare and Liszt. And then she bethought herself to join a little theater. Which she did. Whereupon, after months of sloshing whitewash all over sets and doctoring scripts, the director handed the plum role of the season to another girl who'd never even seen a typewriter or a paint brush outside of a store window! But plucky Jeanne hied herself to the opening performance and sat there, grimly intent on learning exactly why she'd failed and how not to let it happen again. Then all the Cinderella stuff happened. A scout saw her, shoved his card in her face, told her to report to Darryl Zanuck's office. The next day she tested for a part, outdid the other 6 aspirants, and bingo—"Home In Indiana!" So you has yer choice, and you takes your pick as to how Jeanne Crain was discovered—not that it really matters. Just as long as she got here.

STRANGE AFFAIR

Did you ever discover a murder? Or catch a spy? Probably not. Most of our lives run in quieter channels. That's why we get such a kick out of seeing a nice young couple like Bill Harrison (Allyn Joslyn) and his wife Jacqueline (Evelyn Keyes) do those things on the screen.

Bill gets into more jams than Dick Tracy. He loves to play detective, but the results are often unexpected. Jacqueline, his adoring and jealous wife, wouldn't mind his being a Junior G-Man if there wasn't always a beautiful girl somewhere in the case. Jac thinks Bill carries that old saying about "Cherchez la femme" too far. This time the femme is Marie Korsakoff (Marguerite Chapman), who sits beside Bill at a refugee benefit where a man is murdered. The victim, a Doctor Baumler, has had heart disease for some time, and the police at first attribute his death to natural causes. Bill is sure it's murder, and finally gets Lt. Washburn (Edgar Buchanan) to admit he's right. This success goes to his head, and he decides to must be one of half a dozen people who were sitting at the table with the doctor. It can't be Jac, and it doesn't seem to Bill that a girl as beautiful as Marie Karsakoff would go around murdering people. But when he finds that Marie was secretly married to Dr. Baumler and inherits his fortune, Bill begins to wonder.

Of course there are other suspects. Look at the odd way that refugee, Czerny, acts. How about Leslie Christopher? (Tonio Selwart). He's in love with Marie; maybe he's guilty. Or Domino (Hugo Haas), the doorman with the queer accent. There are lots of clues, but unfortunately for Bill, they all point in entirely different directions. He does get on the right track eventually, and comes too close to the truth for the murderer's liking. Only the fact that Bill has an extremely jealous wife saves him from ending up in the morgue.

This is a fast, funny mystery, with Allyn Joslyn making an attractive amateur detective. I think you'll like it.—Col.

P. S.

Ed Dearing, veteran of more than fifty "cop" roles, has been beat up by some of the screen's toughest characters. Swears he'd take 'em all on at once rather than have Evelyn Keyes again as an opponent. . . . Allyn Joslyn got a taste of the strength of the "weaker sex," too, when Ruth Warren knocked him cold with an umbrella. Director had told Ruth that Allyn's hat was padded in order to get her to hit him hard enough to make it look good. It looks good. Allyn is actually knocked out. . . . Evelyn got her coaching for her part as a telephone operator from Marguerite Chapman. Marguerite was once an operator in Mount Vernon, New York. . . . Marguerite came on the set one morning, idly picked up a newspaper and saw the headlines of Georgia Carroll's marriage to Kay Kyser. Her scream could be heard on the back lot. Georgia was Marguerite's room-mate, and she knew nothing about the wedding until she saw the paper. . . . Evelyn can vouch for the effectiveness of exercises. She lost two pounds at every rehearsal of the scene where she "rides the bicycle" on the floor. . . . Allyn begged a few days off from picture to go Marlin fishing in Guaymas, Mexico. Came back with stories about the one that got away but no fish. Two days later he received a wire from the captain of the boat he had used saying they had caught six Marlin that morning. . . . Wardrobe department fastened tiny ball bearings into the soles of Allyn's shoes for his scene with the Great Dane. Dog wasn't strong enough to pull him without them. . . . Director Al Green has only one superstition—he wears the same suit to work every day until a scene has to be reshot, then he changes to another outfit and so on. During production of "Strange Affair" he spent long hours in the cleaners waiting for his suit—wore the same one throughout the entire shooting.

SAN FERNANDO VALLEY

You've whistled the tune for months. Now you can hear Roy Rogers and the Sons of the Pioneers sing it, in a picture named after it. Trigger, of course, keeps time to the music and also helps Roy out in both a fight and a romance. What a horse!

The action in "San Fernando Valley" doesn't take place there at all, but Roy plays a rancher from there who is looking for an ex-employee. The employee is also a friend, Keno (Edward Gargan), who has left his job with Roy to run a traveling shooting gallery. Roy finds him in a little town called Pendleford, and puts the shooting gallery out of business by winning all Keno's money. They are set to go back to the San Fernando Valley when two things happen. A—Roy is held up by two men who steal his, and Keno's, money. B—He meets Dale Keyon (Dale Evans). So, instead of heading West, he and Keno take jobs as cooks on a ranch that belongs to Dale's grandfather.

Their cooking is terrible, but old "Cyclone" (Andrew Tombes) likes them anyway and tells Dale to keep them around. Dale is quite willing—she and Roy fight a lot, but they both know the fighting is only on the surface. Dale's kid sister, Betty Lou (Jean Porter), thinks Roy is the handsomest cowboy she's ever seen. (Who doesn't?)

Dale has been having trouble with Betty Lou and l'amour lately. Betty Lou has grown up in a hurry, and she falls for every man she sees. As a result Dale has to fire all the ranch hands and hire cowgirls in their place. Now here is Betty Lou going overboard for the new cook. "Maybe," Dale suggests to Roy, "we should make her think you and I are in love. That would fix things." It certainly would, Roy agrees, with a cat-looking-at-dish-of-cream expression. It does fix some things, but it makes others more complicated, for it sends Betty Lou off on a new tangent. One that leads to stolen horses, a wild ride across the prairie and—finally—the recovery of Roy's money. Credit Trigger with an assist.—Rep.

P. S.

Although Republic Studio is located front and center in the "Valley" itself, huge replicas of it had to be built on sound stages for the musical numbers. This was done to avoid the noise of traffic, airplanes and juke boxes in the kaowkontry. . . . Half of the cast are residents, mostly ranchers, of the San Fernando Valley. Even city-gal Dale Evans moved out during production. . . . Eight new songs in the picture including Tim Spencer's burlesque on the western, "They Went Thata Way". . . . Edward Gargan, who started his career in opera in New York, sings the song—his first warbling on the screen. Gargan entertained visitors to the

"Misty . . . spiritual . . . naive," they've all been used to describe the 23-year-old who copped an Oscar with her very first picture, "Song of Bernadette." Which she is. Also "canny . . . quick-thinking . . . level-headed." When a reporter, at one of the many meet-the-press parties given to introduce her to the public back in 1942, asked about her pert, ups-a-daisy name, she replied with an entre nous grin, "My mother must have been reading an old English novel." But her guardian angel, David O. Selznick, not having heard of that version, told this one. About how, having phoned her to come sign contracts after he'd o.k.'ed her test, she taxi'd from Garden City with her just-shampooed hair streaming out the window; and getting there, Phyllis Isley (of the Tulsa, Oklahoma theater-owning Isley's) became Jennifer Jones. But after all, what's in a name? Regardless of whether Jennifer enrolled at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts after graduation from Convent school, or after a ten-year stint of one-night-standing barn theaters, she's definitely hit the big time. She and Bob are still good friends, really friends, and not for publicity purposes only; and though Watson Webb, 20th Century producer, took her to meet his folks recently, she's still much too engrossed with her career and her two babies to seriously consider another marriage. Jennie's still studying theater technique, thinks she should've had more experience before being hurled into the limelight with "Bernadette." She's just discovered great literature and music. She'd love to work with Boyer or Spencer Tracy. She feels cokes, tea and hard likker are all in the same class of stimulants. She's the one-minute-beautiful, next-minute plain "flash in the pan" who's proving, via "Since You Went Away" and "Keys to the Kingdom," that actresses are born, not made. And that grease-paint goes swell with sweetness and light.

set with the story of his first appearance at the "Met." His family came en masse, paid seven bucks apiece for seats and couldn't see Ed as he stood in the crowd on the stage behind a six-foot-two character who wouldn't move over even when pinched. . . . Roy, who pretends to be a cook in the picture, surprised the gang on the set by whipping up some luscious "paprika creamed snitzels" (pop-overs to you dudes) which were mighty good eatin'. . . . Trigger gets a little horsey competition in this from one "Thunder," Bill Elliot's horse.

GUEST IN THE HOUSE

Anne Baxter has the top role of her career in this story of a beautiful young girl who wrecks the happiness of an entire family. In less skillful hands, the character of Evelyn would be unbelievable. Anne makes her real and understandable but so hateful that you will breathe a sigh of relief at the fate that eventually overtakes her.

Evelyn has heart trouble, but she has something else far worse—a mind so evil that it poisons everyone with whom it comes in contact. Young Doctor Dan Proctor (Scott McKay) falls in love with her pretty face and doesn't realize how deep the neuroticism of his patient has gone. Hopefully he sends her to spend the summer with his brother and his wife. Surely in those charming surroundings, she will get well enough so they can be married.

Within a week after she arrives, Evelyn has lost all desire ever to marry Dan. Instead, she becomes wildly infatuated with his brother, Douglas (Ralph Bellamy). Douglas is a successful painter, happily in love with his wife (Ruth Warrick). But there are always ways to start trouble in a marriage, and Evelyn wastes no time in beginning. Her first step is to charm the entire household into trusting her. Then she gradually begins her insidious remarks. Before long she has persuaded Douglas that he is doing the wrong kind of painting, because he isn't properly "understood." Then she convinces his wife that he has been having an affair with his model (Miriam Blake). This serves the double purpose of getting rid of the model and causing the wife to change her attitude of love to one of suspicion. Everything is going fine, and Evelyn is sure that she soon will be able to cause a divorce and get Douglas for herself.

As time passes, however, it becomes apparent to everyone that their troubles stem from the guest in the house. In spite of her sweet, sympathetic manner, Evelyn is obviously a wickedly selfish and cruel young woman. But it is Aunt Martha (Aline McMahon), who has the courage to provide a nerve-shattering climax to this tense, emotional drama.—U.A.

P. S.

Art director, Nikolai Romisoff, was dispatched to Maine to gather material and sketches on Maine homes so the house (the only set used for the picture) would be authentic in every detail. Rooms were built on rollers so that the house could be "dissected" for easy lighting and camera manipulation. Put together the house is a liveable unit. So liveable, as a matter of fact, that screen-writer Ketti Frings plans to build a post-war home based on the plans. . . . Romisoff came back from his trip to Maine loaded with bric-a-brac and odds and ends to give the house color and warmth. The wallpaper was discovered in the cellar of a small town country store; Romisoff considers it the real "find" of the trip. . . . The authenticity of the house was just a headache to cameraman Lee Garmes for the Romisoff ceilings are seven feet high and beamed. Garmes claimed it was the most difficult set he's ever worked with. . . . Before actual shooting began on the picture, director Lewis Milestone, Romisoff and Garmes, using "live dummies," walked through the entire script. Accompanying them was a sketch artist, Les Thomas, who drew sketches of scenes and camera positions as Milestone envisioned them. When the sketches were completed, Milestone had a handy reference of the picture with full exposition of camera angles, set-ups and character movement. This is called "pre-production designing," and cuts down shooting time of the picture by solving in advance many lighting and camera problems. . . . Since the picture's musical theme (Liszt's "Liebestraum") contributes much to the psychological "feeling" of the picture, a good deal of the credit should go to musical director, Werner Janssen.

not?), and you're each to drag a guy. Invite him by phone if you know him pretty well. Just, "Hi, Johnny. We're party-ing at Jen's Saturday night. Want to come?" No apologetic fol-de-rol about, "I know you're probably busy," or "It may not be terribly exciting." If he can make it, say, "O, beautiful! Pick me up at eight," and ring off without further messing. If he can't, don't feel embarrassed or immediately suspect that he's fibbing. Just say airily, "I'm sticking my tongue out at you, mister. Next time I'll get my bid in first." Then without skipping a heart beat, call your second string angel-puss.

If you absolutely do not know one boy to ask, don't get yourself all frenzied about it. How about that boy your mother is always trying to stuff down your throat? Every mother in the world has some male she plugs every chance she gets, usually the son of her dearest friend. Okay, call her bluff. Invite him. Or maybe one of the gals in the club has a girl-shy brother. He's never had a date in his life. Invite him and acquire him for your own particular beau. Perhaps there's a flicker of a crush smouldering between you and a boy in school. It's never been put into so many words. He's never even asked you out. But you kind of know it's there. Do you dare ask him? Sure, you do.

We think a short note is best for these boys. It's a bit easier to be smooth in writing when you're dealing with an unknown quantity. Just say, "Dear Bob, Our club is party-ing on Saturday night the tenth, and I've been thinking what fun it would be if you'd come. Can do? If so, could you call for me about eight? Oh, and please let me know as soon as you can, won't you? Sincerely, Janet."

Never, never sound apologetic. Never, never beg him to come. After all, he's a pretty lucky guy getting a Saturday night date for free.

More of this next month, and meanwhile, let us know your particular smoothness problems. We'd like to help.

a gal whom I'll call Betty. Everything starts off nicely, but by the end of the evening the two joes are practically slugging it out over Betty, and I'm left out in the cold. It's not that she's prettier than I am, but she's terribly cute. I'm getting discouraged. Jane McA., Inglewood, Calif.

Don't blame me, chum, but there are two things you can do about it. One is to speak to Betty. Swallow your pride and ask her to lay off. She doesn't have to be that cute. Ask her to confine her eyes to her boy. To lower her voice a little so that some of your cracks can be heard. If you know her very well, you might ask her to 'cue you for some of your funny stories for a change. Another suggestion is this. Try to overcome that prickly little worried feeling you undoubtedly have acquired about all your double dates with Betty. That beats you down before you even start. Be sure that you are looking your best and that you have something amusing to contribute to the conversation. Try to carry on a private chat with your date instead of making it one big open forum. Captivate him by laughing at his jokes, by being interested in what he has to say, by using his name frequently while you're talking to him. If, in spite of all your efforts, his attention wanders to Betty, let it wander. Sit back, relax and try to figure out what she's got. Next time maybe you can finesse her at her own game.

I've gone with a boy for a year now, and we think we are very much in love with each other. We talk about getting married some day, but we are still too young. He'll be leaving for the Navy soon, and I am very scared he will find many other girls and will not love me any more. Do you think we should get engaged? How can we be sure that we love each other? L. Senkow, Calgary, Alberta, Canada.

It's sort of hard to tell you how to be sure that your love for each other is lasting and not just a teen-age crush. However, the fact that you've loved each other for a whole year shows that the feeling must be pretty deep. Question is, is it deep enough? Well, are you miserable when he's out of your sight? Do his wishes seem more important than your own? Do you know his faults and love him all the more because of them? Are you proud of him? Do you have faith in his ability to make a success of his life? If all the answers are "Yes," we'd say that this was it.

About the engagement. Why not wait a little while? Our idea would be to give each other some freedom for the next year or so. If this is the 14-carat stuff, it will bear comparison with minor flutters, so don't worry about losing your sailor to some other gal. If it isn't, don't you think it's wiser to discover it now? If, however, you both feel you've had sufficient friendships with other boys and girls to be very sure, and if it would make you both happier to be engaged, by all means go ahead.

I have red hair and freckles, but am not unattractive to the boys. At least not to one named Pete whom I've gone around with a long while. I like him, but he is very dull. Take John now—there's a boy I could really go for. How to let Pete down easy? Grace McConna, Pelham, New York.

Look, chum, don't go burning your bridges. Has John made a move? Does he know you're alive? S'posing you axe Pete—what are you doing Saturday night? Sitting around kicking yourself most likely. Be a bit bright and ease yourself back into the stream of things gradually. Noise it around that you are no longer Pete's monopoly. Be seen in the halls with somebody else by hook or crook. Turn down a date with Pete and go to the movies with the girls by way of declaring your independence. If his feelings are hurt, explain to him as gently as you can that twosomeing is all very well for the married, but that until you meet your pipe and slippers boy, you think you'll kind of look around.

I am fifteen years old and have been madly in love with a boy of twenty. I told everyone I had a crush on him, and of course he heard about it. I let school work go for two months just thinking about him. However, he never paid any attention to me, and now I dislike him and hate other boys because I was so badly hurt by this one. Ginger Lambert, Newark, N. J.

You, my fine friend, should be spanked. You can't go around hating all men just because one old dope ignores you. Don't you know you can't bowl over every boy you meet? Even Betty Grable's not that good. You were unlucky enough to fall for one of the ones who wasn't for you. Pick yourself up and profit by that experience. Next time, tell no one that you have a crush. If you do, he'll eventually find out, and then you'll be so self-conscious with him, you'll never get anywhere. Study the actions of the girls you know who are big stuff with boys. Get on to the small tricks that cut so much ice with the guys. When you have a bit of self-confidence, go to work on some of the lesser lights at school. As you gain in experience, toss your wiles at some of the big wigs. Don't reach for the moon in the very beginning, but later on, don't settle for anything else.

My brother has entered the Navy this past week and has promised to give my address to the boys who don't get much mail. Whatever shall I say? I'd like to know about their home towns, their likes and dislikes, but I don't want to sound like a quiz kid. How can I phrase these questions? Dorothy, Newark, N. J.

If your brother is a real angel—and apparently he is—he might send you along a little thumbnail sketch of the boys. Make your first letter extremely warm and friendly, but don't emphasize any one facet of your personality too much until you know more about him. Your first letter might go something like this: "Dear Bill, Gosh it was nice to get your letter. You're a busy man, aren't you? I was ever so interested to hear about your life while you're in training, and there are a million questions I'd like to ask you. No doubt all the answers would be military secrets—they always are.

"To make this all a bit more proper, let me introduce me. I'm sixteen years old and a junior in high school." (Here put in a description of yourself.) "I love to dance, play tennis, listen to Frankie . . ." Tell him about your favorite books, movies, songs. Don't bore him with too much detail. Finish with "Now it's your turn to talk, Bill. I'll be waiting for a fat letter. Sincerely—" Happy V-mail, Dorothy!

SOAP CONSERVATION IS IMPORTANT . . . because soap is a necessity and it's made of vital war materials. Don't waste your Ivory. Make it last—use it up.

TO OUR READERS...

The gang is glaring dangerously over my shoulder as I write. There are NINE PAGES OF FULL COLOR in this fascinating issue of MODERN SCREEN. And they insist that I shift into verse and give you the choruses to the tune of ta-ra-ra-ra-boom-dee-ay. All right, all right. But that takes time, and we're celebrating.

Before you can say "nine pages," I'm taking my watch off and plunging into a tub of Pepsi. NINE PAGES OF COLOR! Out of this world, isn't it? But then, of course, trust M.S. to always do things by bigs, not by littles. It's meant more work for all of us. It's cost oodles of money.

But what the heck, kids, you love it, don't you? A spread of color on the Gene Kellys. A spread of color to brighten Judy Garland's life story. Terrible Turhan Bey. Gossamer Gloria De Haven. Debonair Dantine. Not to mention the special glamour spread with Bob Walker, Dick Crane, "Jake" Jaeckel, Bernadette Jones, Jeanne Crain and Dream Dish Baxter.

I see where I've got to stop right here. Henry Malmgreen is doing a dead-man's float in the Pepsi—with his watch on. And the staff has already tortured five Hershey bars to death. Got to watch those kids!

See you next month. And have a swell time!

■ LIFE Magazine had been wandering around all morning, and the Kellys were dead. Betsy, keeper of the cash, was moaning over the non-balancing checkbook with one breath and now-now'ing Kerry with the other. Gene was gnawing at a chocolate bar and mumbling ". . . so the lawn isn't photogenic . . . bet I had more fun wearing it down playing kickball than I would've gardening. . . ." Everyone was feeling gay as a goon when presto!—Gus Gale was stowing his Speed Graphic, Betsy had gooky mounds of vanilla ice cream with caramel sauce (there's always gobs of it ready for Gene's Dagwood snacks) on the kitchen table, and everybody was dangling from the high red leather stools discussing Adolf and Gene's anti-vegetablitis and pic posings and life while Betsy tried to put the snatch on Gene's candy bar. We left with a last slap-happy glimpse of Kerry, her tummy supported by Gene's brawny southpaw, floating in mid-air, drooling down at Daddy's third tutti-frutti special.

Sundays are for snoozing till 12, then kickball with the local kids. Gene whips up the eggs 'n' wienies, then dashes off with Terry and the Pirates.

Evenings, the gals wait for Gene with Kerry flying into his arms at the first horn toot. Her new strip tease routine has Dad hoarding pins so she won't be caught with her pants down!

Strictly a slack 'n' stubble guy, Gene treasures his lucky "Pal Joey" shirt, abhors men's jewelry. He likes Betsy in sports clothes and can discuss femme togs by their right names!

Save for Gene's rare brogue'ing, the Kellys will crown anyone who baby-talks Kerry, whose sudden shift from silence to speech upped her prestige to 5 parties a week!

Kerry's past the slop 'n' spill stage, so Gene often tries his ladling technique. He and "Sweeney" nixed a nurse, but they may get one for Daniel, if and when he comes along.

Phones used to give Kerry the jitters till Betsy, gradually breaking her in, hit on dialing the time signal to let her hear the voice and bell. K. now giggles and jabbers back.

Gene begs rides from pals to save gas, but whips out the convertible for those Thurs. eve baseball sprees with the Garfield, Barry Sullivan gang.

Members of the "Writer's Set," the Kellys hold open house, breaking up the weighty gab fests with sprints around the block, sweet Adoline-ings—and fast rounds of Anagrams!

"Sweeney" and "Genee" can jabber in 6 tongues, picked from school and tutors. Betsy's angling for a 3 months' overseas jaunt with an ex-B'way dram group, while Gene's just beginning work in M-G-M's "Ziegfeld Follies."

young man with a torso

Nine mastoids, two broken eardrums, three fractured ribs—Dick Crane's battered but beautiful!

■ While Dick Crane was reading his fan mail recently (it now runs into many hundreds of letters a month) he opened a fold of pink paper to disclose the following communication:

"Dear Mr. Crane:

You are the healthiest looking zombie I have ever seen. However, you MUST be a zombie because I have seen you die four times in four different pictures. First I saw you in a Hopalong Cassidy picture, and you got perforated in a most fatal manner. Then I saw you in 'Happy Land,' a picture from which you didn't escape vertically. After that you gave your all in 'None Shall Escape,' and last night I saw you get liquidated again in 'Wing And A Prayer.' This is too much.

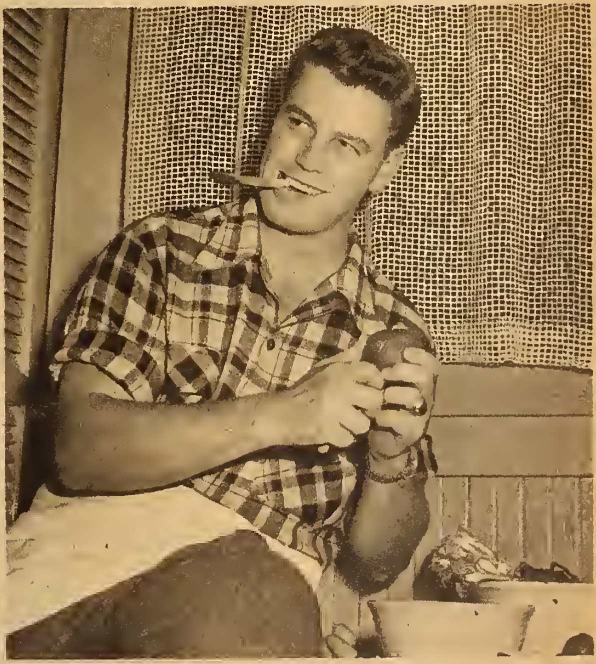
I am going to start a LET RICHARD CRANE LIVE club.

Yours devotedly,
Jean T. . . ."

To hear from a fan who had seen all FOUR of his decent-part pictures represented a milestone in Dick's life . . . frequent and violent death aside.

As a matter of fact there are few men as much alive as Dick Crane is. He consists of five feet ten and one-half inches of brawn that weighs about 170 pounds. He would like to trim that down (Continued on page 89)

First few years in films were tough sledding. Between pics took jobs as dishwasher, hasher, truckdriver. Ambitious to cop Oscar, he sees every new film to study technique of stars. His latest, "Wing and a Prayer."



Dick's superstitious about just one item—ring his mom gave him one birthday. Wears it as good luck charm on his left hand in every picture. Goes for Harry James and all shades of blue.

Way last Dec. her sidekick proclaimed she wouldn't be surprised if Shirley and Andy Hotchkiss took it to a preacher. They've got it that bad! Next movie's "I'll Be Seeing You."

tune of English folk song, she penned lyrics for "Mother ouldn't Buy Me a Bow-Wow," hit of "Since You Went voy." She's added verses for its broadcast by name bands.

At Canteen she modestly claims boys would rather talk to her than dance. "Most of them have sisters at home, and I seem to take their place." On one of her rare radio stints, she guested on War Dept.'s "Visiting Hour," aired from service hospitals.

sixteen's okay

It means powder 'n' lipstick, buying your own clothes—having a MAN! To Shirley it's strictly "er ker"!

■ Sixteen's a nice age, but not very different from fifteen. Shirley guesses no age is very different from the one right in front or behind. You have to go pretty far back to tell the difference—

Like the night of the preview of "Since You Went Away." It was one of those gala previews that they hardly ever have any more on account of the war—with grandstands and flashbulbs and everybody dressed up. The girls, that is. Most of the men were in uniform—

Anyway, walking along under that marquee-thing, she couldn't help feeling pretty grown-up. Because last time she was wearing bobby socks and a white wool coat. That was for "The Little Princess" when she was eleven. And here she was now with a long white crepe dress and an ermine jacket and a gentleman. Of course Mom and Dad were there, too, but they were strictly a party by themselves, and so were she and Andy—Private Andrew Hotchkiss of the U.S. Army Air Force, that's his official title. But he's the same Andy she used to play hopscotch with.

No, she didn't feel important—just excited. If heroes can come back from shooting millions of enemies without feeling important, wouldn't it be silly for people who just shoot pictures to get that way? Yes, of course she was glad the fans remembered her. And she thinks it was pretty swell of them, seeing as how she hadn't done anything in such ages. (Continued on page 94)

Shirley's a plain meat-and-vegetable girl without too much seasoning. Some of the kids really like coffee, but frankly, she doesn't give two hoots about the stuff.

With Selznick as tutor, she's learning ins and outs of picture business so that when her starring days are over, she can step in as director-producer. Practised on Red Cross playlet, directing, rewriting lines, playing each part to show actor how.

Graduated from high school with highest average in class—97.3%. "I wasn't a bright kid. I had to work for every grade I got. I was so afraid I'd fail I guess I overstudied."

During production of "Music For Millions," fragile 99-pound, five-foot-one June crashed thru platform and had to be sawed out! Everybody, including Errol Flynn, kidded her to death.

By Jeanne Karr

June Bug

She was little and scrawny and had no oomph. The guys in high school never asked June Allyson to go out.

■ Her real name's Jan Allyson. George Abbott changed it to June, because Jan sounds like a boy's name. Her mother wasn't too happy about her going on the stage. Now she says, "That's my daughter"—with a spark in her eye—when she sees people looking at June's picture in theater lobbies.

Recently she sent June a classic letter: "Just saw 'Two Girls and A Sailor.' Please take care of yourself and get lots of rest. Love. Mother." June doesn't know exactly what it means, and she's sort of afraid to ask. As long as she doesn't ask, she can go right on hoping that mother just wrote in a terrible hurry.

She's amazed by what's happened to her. Being asked for an autograph makes her feel silly, but wonderful. When people say, "I liked you in the picture," she gets embarrassed. It's hard to be casual and just say thank you very much. Her impulse is to hug them, ask them to dinner and inquire about the health of their families.

The biggest thrill was going to the Mocambo after "Two Girls and A Sailor." Darling Emil Coleman, the orchestra leader, caught sight of her and stopped what they were playing and started "Young Man with a Horn." Roman candles exploded in her head, and her knees went weak, and she (Continued on page 111)

Boys at Ft. Lewis voted her their favorite "Pin Up Ether Girl," which means that June's the first vision they'd like to see if they're wounded or coming out of ether.

Gloria DeHaven claims June's most conscientious person in town. "When I stayed overnight with her, we studied our roles until 3 a.m. Even after we went to bed, she made me rehearse until her housekeeper stopped us."

Turhan Bey

turks are no jerks

By Kirtley Baskette

"Bey" means Mister and vodka at the Scheherazade and a rider without a horse and flivvers and orchids and laughs.

■ One afternoon, a few weeks ago, Katharine Hepburn and Turhan Bey sat on a prop log in a Hollywood version of a Chinese rice field and waited tensely for the camera to roll.

They were about to tackle a terrific love scene in "Dragon Seed," and the ordinarily cool and cocky Katie was nervous as a witch—with good reason. Being the star of the picture, she knew this key scene had to sizzle with the right high voltage or the picture might flunk dismally.

It was up to her to make it sizzle and practically melt away with love at the end, and, frankly, Hepburn was not so sure this Turhan Bey fellow, whom she'd never met before, had the stuff on the ball to handle (Continued on page 99)

Mrs. Bey, often taken for her son's sister, shares his taste for vodka, but not for yank slang.

Turhan's been twosome-ing with Turner ever since the "Dragon Seed" premiere, when she spied him and whispered, "That's for me!"

Night he was to squire Susanna F. to the opening of "Voice In The Wind," he blew 3 tires, had to haul her in a rented, vintage flivver!

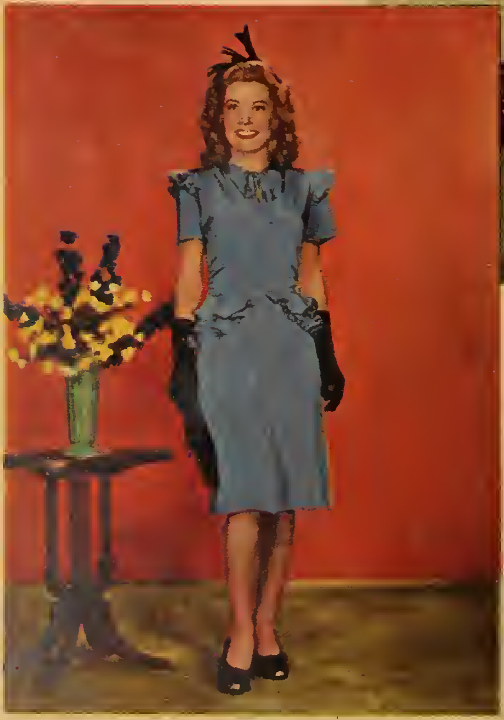
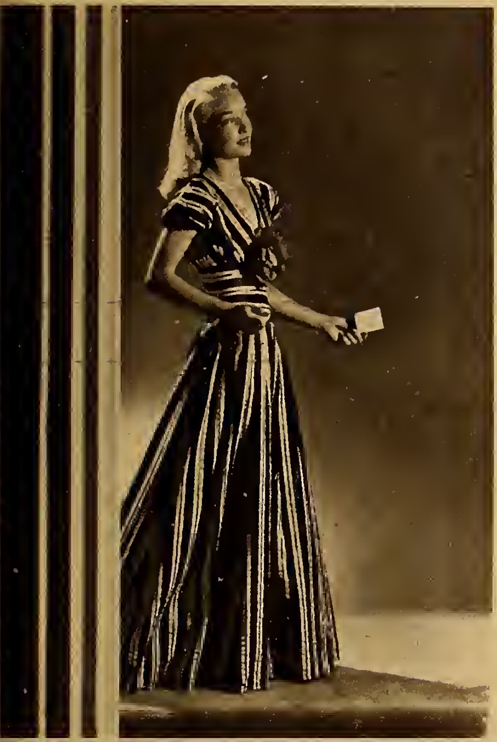
Gloria DeHaven shows how he'd like to have his dream girl look. Dress from Miss America in Cohoma's supple new fabric, "5 P.M."

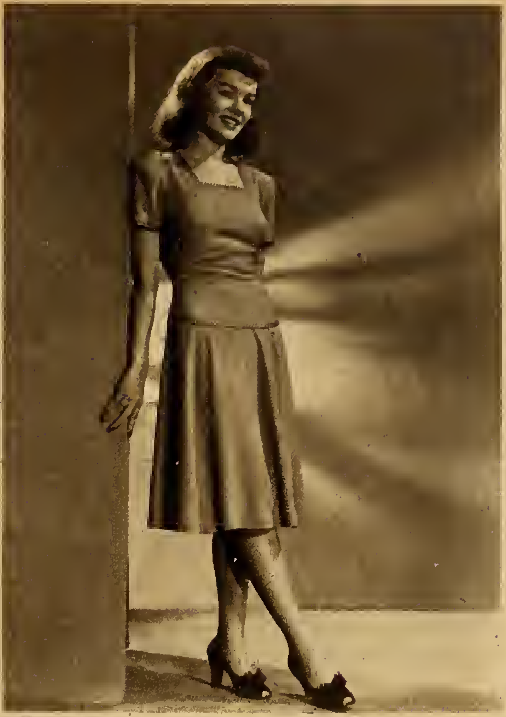


Same wonderful girl, same wonderful fabric. New mood in a J. L. F. original with fluted peplum and epaulette lines.

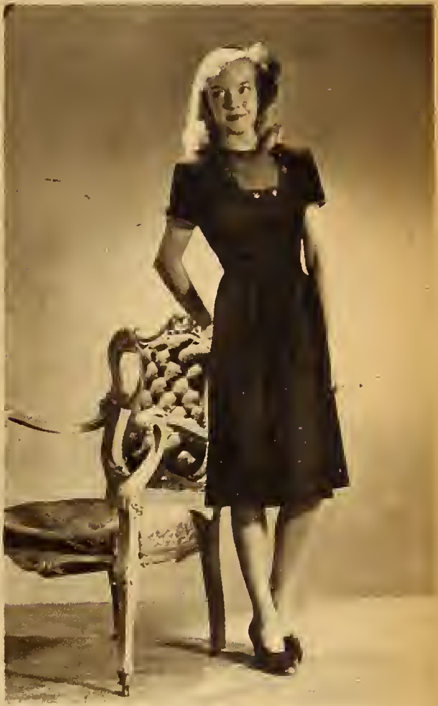
Does the sight of Gloria DeHaven send your fella into ecstasies? Here's how you can step right into her clothes!



SWISH . . . dancing dress of rustly striped taffeta. A Junior Formal. Around $25.



GLAMOUR . . . in longer torso silhouettes. An Arkay Junior. Under $20.



AND GLITTER . . . of jet and pastel. Judy 'n' Jill. About $25. "Debucap" around $3.

Modern Screen's Fashion Guide

■ Of course you're not Gloria De Haven. But, with one very tiny exception, who on earth is? There's only one, and you'll soon be seeing her in "The Thin Man Goes Home." I still say it could be you, wearing the date dresses that are so agleam here with color. Because—while our Gloria did happen to be way up front when they were handing out looks—nobody can call her "grabby." None of this nonsense about "I couldn't dream of letting anybody know where this little number came from." What's hers is yours. At least in this particular case it is.

If you're headed for something formal and want to be very much "this year" about it, the fashion of cap sleeves is definitely yours. By the way, I'm not saying your shoulders are kinda scrawny. But if you think they are, this new line supplies wonderful cover-uppage. And nobody's been hinting that your waistline needs slimming, either. But, just in case it should, the shoulder breadth will help balance it. Do I have to explain again? All that width up top simply makes the mid-area seem smaller in comparison.

Rumor has it around fashion circles that hips today are more than something to be concealed by a two-way stretch. While I still say yours would appear more haven-ly if you controlled them a bit with a panty girdle, this is your year to talk (Continued on page 80)

George sat right down to answer the note. He told how sorry he was to hear the news but how proud he was of Bill. He hoped the buddy who'd written him would visit him in Hollywood on his way back from Tokyo.

Then George blew his nose, dabbed his eyes and made a mental note about an item to bring up in his next confession at church. "I guess though," he sighed to himself, "that's one lie for which the Good Lord will forgive me!"

Because George Murphy never had any cousin Bill who was a U.S. Marine. But he figured he couldn't let a fellow down who had liked him well enough to claim kinship.

Top psychiatrist cued Anne for her "Guest in the House" paranoiac role. Preview guest card commented, "I hate A.B. more than my mother-in-law."

Dream Dish

By Fredda Dudley

"I'll never marry an actor!" vows Anne Baxter. Does that mean John Hodiak?

Anne's grandpap, architect Frank Lloyd Wright, gifted her with blueprints for a postwar home. Sketches include a nursery. Baxter-Hodiak rumors are flying thick and fast.

■ As Anne Baxter tripped into the 20th Century Commissary one noon, having come from the set where she was working opposite John Hodiak in "Sunday Dinner For A Soldier," a bemused onlooker confided to his luncheon guest, "If they ever send Anne Baxter overseas on an entertainment tour, the war will be over immediately."

The straight man wanted to know how the commentator doped it. "The enemy would be entirely destroyed by concussion caused by the prolonged whistling of American troops," was the answer. "That Baxter is a dream dish."

Ask any six people at Fox, and they will tell you that Anne Baxter is a terrific tomato; that she has the ideal face, the ideal figure and the ideal background to be successful in pictures. To date, they will add, she has lived an ideal life. Practically everything that has happened to her has had a definite bearing upon her cinematic career.

Take, for instance, her childhood. She didn't think so very much of it as a guide for the rearing of future generations. She seldom remained in one school over a year. Because of her father's work (he was sales manager for a national corporation) the family moved a great deal.

Dig back in memory and recall your own first day at school when you were six. The teacher was a tall, strange creature who explained the local rules. The kids conned one another suspiciously. The room was filled with the typically school-days odor of chalk dust, floor oil and the odd aroma of glazed paper and printer's ink on new text books. You felt as conspicuous as a Ubangi in the Clover Club. And as perplexed as that same Ubangi, confronted by corn on the cob.

Your second year was different, of course. You knew practically everyone in your class. Those you didn't know, you gave the old double-barreled ogle and ignored.

Anne was always one of the newies. Each year, and sometimes each semester, she became the recruit in some new school. The first time this happened, she tried to orient herself; she tried to make friends by a frontal attack of cordiality. "What's your name?" she would ask some little girl.

"Nonayourbusiness. What's yours?"

annie granny goat . . .

"Annie, Annie, she's a granny. Annie, granny nanny; goat, goat, Annie."

The kids laughed at the nonsensical chant. Sometimes they took it up and repeated it at recess. It was a very painful initiation process.

But Anne got hep. To protect herself, she developed Rule 1 in the Baxter code of self-protection: She learned to let the other person make the overtures. She found that there was great strength in silence. When she went to a new school, she paid no attention to anyone. She arrived on the school grounds barely in time to answer the bell, and she left the vicinity without loitering the instant school was dismissed. This self-sufficiency intrigued the natives. Instead of regarding her as foreign, hence funny (a common human weakness), she seemed mysterious and exciting. When the established leaders in school became suppliants for her attention, Anne could select as friends those who seemed to be compatible.

It is a system she uses to this day. She lets people approach her first. And, from those hectic days of adapting herself to a series of different school customs and local traditions, she has brought a pliability of mind that makes it possible for her to understand almost any type of human being. A very handy trait to be developed by an actress.

During this strenuous period of carving out a succession of comfortable environments for herself, Anne developed a talent. She had to excell in some respect. She wasn't so Euclid with figures, nor very Marco Polo in geography. Natural history seemed as complicated as a Burbank experimental garden, and literature (although a favorite subject) sometimes got awfully Gertrude Stein. But she could SPELL. She won matches faster than a pyromaniac could strike them.

At one time she triumphed in a Spell Down with the word "Occasion." At another time her winning word, spelled with assurance, was "harass." (She was perfect in pronunciation, too, as she called it "harris" as in Phil, which is proper.)

Only twice did she ground loop her vocabulary. Once she crash-landed the word "restaurant"—left out the "u." At another time she jumbled the vowels in "lieutenant." To this day, when she addresses a letter to such an officer, she gives him the abbreviated treatment. They are all

Proud of his Indian Princess grand-maw, Ray will soon be seen in "San Fernando Valley," his 40th pic. (Piggy-back with "Lil Brown Jug.")

A whiz at the harmonica, trumpet, piano—and gui-tar, Ray's a chow mein, ravioli fiend. Paid $82,000 in prizes at N. Y. Rodeo. (With Bing.)

Ray caught "Oklahoma!" while in N. Y., came out raging, "Phonies, they can't lasso and their accents ain't right!" (With C. Landis and Frankie at "Com. Performance.")

Under his hotel window in Dakota, outside the Astor in Times Square . . . wherever he goes, you'll hear the familiar chant!

We Want Rogers

■ Last Fall, Roy Rogers strolled into the Yankee Stadium to see the opening game of the World's Series between the St. Louis Cards and the New York Yankees. As usual, Roy looked like a Western sunset going East. He sported a ten-gallon dove-colored sombrero, pink and white butterfly boots, skin tight breeches with barberpole stitches, darts, pipings, filigrees and fancy frills here and there against the blues, greens and assorted color clashes of his movie cowboy rig. On exposed places, like fingers; silver, turquoise and gold sparkled in the sun.

There were sixty-nine thousand people at the Stadium that day, and about all of them except a few near-sighted old folk rubber-necked, awestruck, as he pushed, grinning amiably, through the mob. Roy shook hands with Jim Farley, Jack Dempsey, Babe Ruth, Connie Mack and assorted celebrities, picking up fans like a rolling snowball picks up snow.

Finally, Roy climbed into his box, and the crowd of Rogers rooters swarmed after him like bees, knocking over chairs and sending pop bottles skittering along the aisles. They spilled over into the adjoining boxes, yipping for autographs, and in the one right behind Roy, a chubby, dignified gentleman with graying hair got considerably mussed up. The cigar was knocked from his mouth, his hat sent flying, his chair almost tipped over. Nobody paid any attention to him. Maybe Roy wouldn't have noticed, either, except that the crush of fans spun him around, and what he saw almost made him topple over.

The dignified gentleman behind him, getting bumped around by the fervent fans of Roy Rogers, movie cowboy, was the Honorable Herbert Hoover, ex-President of the United States!

Of course, Roy Rogers would never stack himself up against Herbert Hoover in the Hall of Fame, or against a few hundred other great men for that matter. Besides, Roy knows by now that mob scenes are no measure of greatness, and he's not impressed. He gets them wherever he goes, whether it's breaking records with his Rodeo at Madison Square Garden or zooming the population of a tiny hamlet from 300 to 17,000 (as he once did in Virginia) just by paying it a visit. He's been kept awake all night in small towns by crowds yelling under his hotel window, "We want Rogers!" and in the really large cities when he ventures out on the streets almost anything is likely to happen—and frequently does.

Like the time in Pittsburgh when he sneaked into a famous cafe and walked out to face 500 kids blocking the doorway. The only way the cops could rescue him, after Roy had almost worn off his trigger finger writing his name, was to back up the Black Maria and haul him off to jail! Or like New York last year, when Roy got restless in his room at the Astor Hotel and clomped his high heels up Broadway for a drink of his favorite brew, pinacolada, at one of those sidewalk stands. Roy didn't realize that while he sipped his fruit juice, the bright lights were spotlighting him. The minute he stepped outside, they had him, and the cops had to blow their whistles again. When he got back to the Astor about everything was ripped off except Roy's smile.

king by acclaim . . .

That smile would be hard to erase under any condition right now, because what Roy Rogers does know, and for sure, is that his King of the Cowboys tag is a case of no kidding.

There's not a Hollywood cow-waddy who can come within lasso-length of Roy in the popularity poll. One recent month no less than 136,000 letters, more than any Hollywood star has ever piled up, practically pushed Roy right out of his office. The "Corrals," into which Rogers' fan armies divide themselves, cover the United States and the United Nations, too, and if Roy wanted to make a foreign stamp collection from all the mail he gets from service guys and gals, he could set up a booming philatelist's shop as a sideline.

Not only are Roy's rootin', tootin' Republic pictures standing them in the aisles all around the globe, but they're playing right in the same movie palaces where million-dollar epics play. "Song of Nevada," the latest Roy Rogers movie, has just been booked for the Carthay Circle and Grauman's Chinese, Holly-

■ Van Johnson has certainly had his wings clipped—but it takes Van to tell this one on himself:

A couple of weeks ago Van went with his pals, the Keenan Wynns, down to Casino Gardens—a big dance hall on the pier. They watched the jitterbugs for awhile when suddenly an enterprising Junior Miss came up and asked Van if he would dance.

Very much flattered (because he's a nice guy), Van skidded out on the floor with the girl and enjoyed himself immensely. She was a darn good dancer, and Van politely said, "If you would like to dance again—"

"No" said the girl, surprisingly, "I'm going to be sorta busy."

Van took that one standing up, and when the music started again, he was approached by an entirely new jitterbug. "This is my dance" she said, practically leading him onto the floor. The same thing happened

Ann Sheridan writes about a funny thing that happened to her in India—or should I say when she was trying to get out of India, on her recent camp tour abroad.

"A plane was expected to pick us up at (censored) and fly us to (censored). All day long we had waited at the airfield at this spot in India—and still no plane came.

"Finally, one of the officers who had been escorting us went to send a wire to headquarters to find out why we had not been picked up.

"The answer came back that such a plane had not been ordered.

"Our friend immediately asked: What shall I do with Ann Sheridan?

"The reply was: If you don't know what to do with Ann Sheridan we can't help you. BUT DON'T GIVE HER BACK TO THE INDIANS!"

It's been a month of parties, parties, PARTIES!

The little Queen of the Ice, Sonja Henie, certainly looked the part at the big affair she gave at her home. She wore a beautiful new dress made of bugle beads, and she's lost so much weight that her figure is out of this world.

Sonja planned everything on an elaborate scale because she knew her husband, Captain Dan Topping, was due to go overseas—and the party was in his honor. But Marine regulations wait for no man, and Dan left the night before!

The bright stars overhead had to vie with the stars on hand for brilliance. Mary Benny, Jack's wife, got a lot of ribbing over a dress she was wearing completely embroidered in brilliants. Several months ago, a columnist had said that Mary had a million dollars worth of jewels. "Are those your jewels?" she was asked.

It was a warm balmy night and flower bedecked tables were set around the swimming pool. A striped blue and white tent had been set up for supper and dancing.

Roz Russell said she was so tired after finishing "Roughly Speaking" that she was going to take the baby and go into retirement. (Don't believe it. Roz is one of the most energetic women in Hollywood.)

An "entrance" that was an entrance was staged by Joan Crawford accompanied by her bridegroom, Phil Terry. She was the Joan of the lush days, done up in all-white with a garland of gardenias in her hair.

Sonja's mother, who is a culinary expert, was beaming over all the compliments she was getting on her Norwegian pudding—a matchless dish I can heartily recommend.

As for Yours Truly, I had the time of my life doing rumba after rumba with Clark Gable!

Between numbers—Clark and I sat at one of the bright little tables and had a long talk. Gable has been going to all the parties—perhaps because he wants to forget all that he saw overseas. It is certainly something new for him because he isn't a party man and enjoys far more being with a crowd of his pals and hunting and fishing.

Kay Williams, his favorite girl, and I also let down our hair. "These big parties are grand, Louella," Kay told me, "but the birthday celebration that touched me most was the dinner party for just the two of us that Clark had for me last night.

"It was at his home in the Valley, and at my place he had a cake with eighteen candles—which were sheer flattery," she laughed, "and my presents. He gave me a beautiful watch and an Alligator bag, and he had wrapped them himself!"

* * *

Another social event that brought out the town was the Jack Warner birthday party and the unveiling of Mrs. Warner's portrait by Salvador Dali. Not only was it Jack's birthday but also Lt. Robert Taylor's, Mrs. Otto Preminger's, Kay Williams' and LOP's (me). We all had birthday cakes—so everybody sang "Happy Birthday" to everybody else.

Barbara Stanwyck was so happy she was radiant because Bob was able to get home for his birthday celebration. Of course, the Navy didn't arrange it that way. It just happened.

Jane Wyman was also celebrating. She had just had her contract torn up and had been given a new one, and Janie was a vision in white with her Captain husband, Ronald Reagan.

Errol Flynn came alone, as usual. But I overheard him making a date to take Joan Blondell out to dinner. Joan is so witty and amusing she always has a crowd around her.

The Warner home is the loveliest in California. I say that without fear of contradiction, for treasures have been collected from all over the world, and the grounds are landscaped with beautiful fountains and Old World statues.

Everyone viewed Ann Warner's portrait by Dali, and comment was divided. To those of us who know her well, the artist seemed to make Ann too sad and missed her sparkling vivacity. Yet art critics say it is a masterpiece—so who am I to think differently?

Private Mickey Rooney blew back into town on a furlough and lost no time dating Gloria DeHaven. However, he showed up at the premiere of "Dragon Seed" with his Ma.

Mickey is writing a book about his Army experiences which he is calling "Wise Up." I suppose it is along the general lines of a "See Here, Private Rooney."

Amazing new ink actually prevents pen troubles!

Parker Quink . . . the only ink containing solv-x . . . prolongs life of all types of pens!

For your pen to continue giving good performance, switch today to Parker Quink with solv-x. This remarkable new ink stops pen troubles before they start . . . gives 4-way protection to your pen:

1. Prevents metal corrosion and rubber rot caused by high-acid inks.

2. Ends gumming and clogging. Gives quick starting, even flow.

3. Dissolves and flushes away sediment left by ordinary inks.

4. Actually cleans your pen as it writes—keeps it out of the repair shop.

Brilliant, fast-drying Quink is ideal for every type of fountain pen—for steel pens, too. This ink alone contains pen-protecting solv-x—yet it costs no more than ordinary inks!

Quink is America's largest-selling ink! Try it in your pen. Seven permanent colors: "Micro-film Black", the all-purpose black ink; Blue-Black; Royal Blue; Green; Violet; Brown; Red. Two washable colors: Black, Blue. Regular size, 25¢. School size, 15¢. Also in pints and quarts. The Parker Pen Company, Janesville, Wisconsin, and Toronto, Canada.

Don't think for a minute that Betty Grable took lightly those brickbats from several small town papers in the East. The editors and some of the fans roasted Betty to a brown because she had failed to appear and "take a bow" on a recent band tour of Harry James'.

"I certainly never intended to be rude, Louella," Betty told me after I had shown her several of the clippings. "The point was that it was Harry's show, and I was just traveling along as his wife.

"It was dreadfully hot. I wasn't feeling any too well, and half the time I didn't even bother to wear make-up or to have my hair dressed.

"I have been in the business long enough to know that people expect movie stars to be dressed to the hilt at all times. If I had appeared not looking my best—for I had just taken plain suits and simple little dresses along—I would have been roundly criticized for my appearance.

"They would have said, 'That Grable! She looks terrible unless she's all fixed up by Hollywood camera magic.' It has taught me a lesson, though. I've learned that I can't travel in the future just as Mrs. Harry James. If I ever go out with Harry again, I'll be prepared to appear any hour of the day or night because I'm terribly hurt over these stories."

* * *

In my long career as a columnist I've found that you can say or print almost anything about a star, and they very seldom say anything. But it's another story where stars' relatives are concerned.

Not long ago I wrote that the reason Mrs. Gene Kelly did not wear make-up or even face powder was because she was allergic to cosmetics.

About a week later I received a long and indignant letter from her mother in the East. "My daughter's skin is wonderful," wrote Gene's mother-in-law. "She could use make-up if she wanted to without any harmful effects. Her skin is so good she used to be a model. I am terribly upset about your statement."

* * *

Never let it be said that Betty Hutton isn't an effective gal. She knows her type and dresses it. Right now Betty is definitely the "champagne girl." Her hair is champagne colored, and she is going in for champagne colored suits, dresses and formal gowns.

The other night she dropped by my house wearing a champagne satin dress that exactly matched her hair. Even her bag and shoes were of that color. It's very striking. Not since Jean Harlow's all-white fad has there been a mode of dress more effective.

For her personal appearance tour (she'll get $10,000 a week for six weeks in the East), Betty is taking along a champagne sequin gown with which she will wear sequin shoes and champagne colored brilliants sprinkled in her hair. That should be something! In the spotlight she should sparkle and sizzle just like a bottle of the rare old vintage she's imitating.

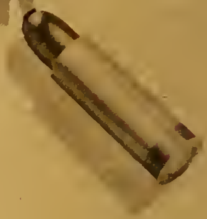
HURRAY FOR LIPSTICK



Read on to gather all the latest Hollywood facts about choosing colors and applying lip glamour.

■ Joyce Reynolds is a gal just chock full of enthusiasms. She's mad for Texas, the nation of her birth, for California (well, Hollywood's there), for New York, just because . . . and for lipstick! Fact is, she's quite an authority on the stuff. Believes that the tiny red baton is the most important make-up item. In the course of her twenty eventful years, she's learned how to apply it smoothly; how to pick the best colors to do right by her creamy skin and red-gold hair. Now what could I do, but corner Joyce for an interview so that all you MODERN SCREEN beauties could share her lip glamour? And here's the information.

LIPSTICK MAESTRO Speaking of ways and means to achieve lovely lips, Joyce tells me, "It's plain to see that beauty-sellers

Joyce wields her lipstick with practiced skill.

Cleansing-tissue makes a neat lipstick blotter.

A smart lip-painting job! You'll be seeing Joyce in "Hollywood Canteen."

By Carol Carter, Beauty Editor

are the maestros of the lipstick!" They have as many lip-wands spread out on the cosmetic counter as Harry James has tunes. Your own mouth should be colored bewitchingly. "And it's easy!" adds Joyce. For today, manufacturers whip up a delectable rainbow collection of lipstick reds, everything from a dainty, young Shirley Temple-ish natural pink, to a deep, intense, throbbing Dot Lamour purple . . . take your pick.

COLOR CUE Check on the simple ABC's of color-blending and lipstick application. Result? The phone ringing in a steady buzz, you'll be that popular. "But don't be a one-lipstick woman," warns Joyce. Hollywood stars who, you must admit, are beauty experts, collect whole wardrobes of lipsticks, a shade to match every mood and costume change. And, with only a few coins necessary for a really wonderful lipstick, it's possible for you to begin your own collection.

Have fun experimenting with color. Annie Sheridan (one of Joyce's screen favorites) looks luscious in Technicolor, doesn't she? But some of you seem to forget that your public is always getting a Technicolor view of you! Match finger-tip polish to lipstick shade, and see that your rouge belongs to the same color family. Pick a red that blends with your skin coloring. Remember that team-work makes for perfect color harmony; a bright gal won't wear orange-red nail enamel that screams at her red-violet lipstick.

Here are a few color pointers: Dark, autumny greens, rusts, browns and smoky grays team happily with a russet, orange-toned red. Ruddy wine colors, purples, violets, blue-greens and navy are at their best with a muted, blue-red lipsick. Black, white, multi-color prints and stripes, all respond to the stimulating note of a true red-red. A crimson dress calls for special care in choosing a lipstick . . . dark shades of red with blue predominating need a bluish-red lipstick, orange-red dresses need bright, tawny lip rouge to look their best.

On the whole, brunettes, brownettes and ash blondes with creamy or medium complexions are flattered by blue-red. Golden blondes, (Continued on page 109)

Coming up: one cold, bitter, skin-chapping winter. But read "Lotion Lore" and learn to combat Jack Frost's worst blows!

LOTION LORE

Carol Carter, Beauty Editor

■ Must be the nip of frost in the autumn air and the threat of stinging blasts to come that make me lotion-conscious. Time was when a lady did one of two things if she wanted to keep her pretty cheeks unchapped, come winter. She ventured outdoors swathed in mufflers to the eyelashes. Or she buttered her face with protective creams and looked like an animated grease spot. But you don't catch women doing that today! Not with all the wonderful lotions available on the market . . . creamy lotions that dry on the skin in a wink and lend maximum protection at the same time. Listed below are a few ailments that are liable to turn up and plague your poor unsuspecting epidermis. Some are cold weather bugaboos, some may appear any old time of the year. But lotions are balm to all.

WINDBURN—Seems that winter blasts have an unmerciful habit of drying out your tender skin. So the thing to do is dabble a lotion over your face before you dash out on a windy day. A bit of timely lubrication will save your dainty complexion from painful chafing. Incidentally, if you'd do your hero a favor, slip a bottle into his next overseas package. Be he in the stormy Aleutians or sunny Oahu, he'll sniff it and slap it on his stubby chin with pleasure. (Continued on page 108)

Laraine Day keeps cozy in a lamb coat . . . but before venturing outdoors, she applied a soothing lotion to face and hands. Her new pix: "The WACs."

TAKE YOUR Vitamins THIS DELICIOUS, NATURAL WAY for more effective "Teamwork"!

OVALTINE
More VITAMIN A than 2 servings of Peas
More CALCIUM & PHOSPHORUS than 2½ servings of American Cheese
More IRON than 3 servings of Spinach
More VITAMIN D than 10 ounces of Butter
More PROTEIN than 3 Eggs

Authorities agree—vitamins do you more good in combination with certain other food elements!

If taking vitamins doesn't seem to be doing you as much good as you hoped—this may be the reason! Authorities now know Vitamins do not work alone! They work as a team with certain other food elements. Therefore scientists, doctors, nutritionists are urging "Take your vitamins in food—for best results!"

For this reason, thousands are switching to Ovaltine. Unlike mere "vitamin carriers"—Ovaltine contains not only extra vitamins, but nearly all the precious food elements necessary for peak vitality. Especially those food elements needed for vitamin teamwork.

For example, Vitamin D, Calcium and Phosphorus must work together—and you get them all in a glass of Ovaltine made with milk. Vitamin A and Protein act together in cell-building—and they're both in Ovaltine. Vitamin B_1 and fuel-food are both necessary for sparkling vitality—and they're combined in Ovaltine.

Another advantage—the elements in Ovaltine do not vary. They are accurately measured in every ounce. That is why it is an ideal supplement to ordinary foods which lose vitamin-values, sometimes sharply, in cooking.

So turn to Ovaltine, as thousands are doing, for an easy way to get the extra amounts of vitamins and minerals you need.

3 out of every 4 people need extra vitamins or minerals—according to Government reports. Reasons for this include vitamin deficiencies of many modern foods—also loss of vitamin-mineral values due to shipping, storing and cooking.

LON McCALLISTER'S PRAYER

hand was on his shoulder. "It's 6 o'clock, Bud—"

He ate a big breakfast, which was unusual with him—scrambled eggs and cinnamon toast and hot chocolate. Mother, Granny and Mac took him down to the station. They didn't cry—which was wonderful. Just acted as if he were going off to school. That's what it felt like, too. When he used to go to Whittier, they'd drive him down to the same little red car that was waiting now to take him to Fort MacArthur.

Bill Johnstone was there, and that helped. In civilian life Bill was The Shadow on the radio. They'd met the day they took their physicals, been accepted together and sent to the office of a WAC recruiting sergeant. "No sense sitting around," the sergeant said. "Here—sweep out the office—" like father, like son . . .

That was their first detail, and until Lon was transferred to "Winged Victory," he and Bill were together all the time. Father-and-son team, the guys used to call them. "Here come the old man and his baby," they'd yell. Bill's 37 and distinguished looking, with prematurely white hair, while Lon's GI haircut made him look more kiddish than ever. That first day the fellows stared uncertainly—his face was familiar, but not quite familiar enough. "Don't I know you from somewhere?—Didn't you go to school with me—?"

Fort MacArthur reminded Lon of "The Human Comedy"—all the guys talking about home, showing each other snapshots. Lon had some pictures that were taken by MODERN SCREEN—the one with Mac went over big with the boys. There's no getting away from it, an induction camp's a sad place. The breaking of ties is so fresh, the change so sharp—you've still got one foot and most of your heart in the other world. It's hardest on the older men like Bill Johnstone, whose life is wrapped up in his wife and little boy. Lon felt the sadness, but he also felt an undercurrent of strangeness and excitement. That came from the sense of being part of something too big to grasp—the kind of thing you read about in history but never expected to happen to you—sort of like coming face to face with yourself in a textbook—

By the time they were shipped to Camp Crowder, he'd begun to swing into the tempo of Army life—though he still can't get used to calling chow, chow. And either the movies have it all wrong, or Company C, 31st Training Battalion, was lucky. At MacArthur, they'd built up mental images of whipcracking sergeants and noncoms all roaring, "See here, Private Nincompoop!" Well, they couldn't have had a sweller topkick than Sergeant Jimmy Hudgins. He maintained discipline all right, but he was nice about it. As for Lt. Edward Allen, their c. o., they'd have jumped through hoops for him. Nothing brass hat about him—gave you the feeling he knew just what you were going through.

The only thing wrong with Camp Crowder was its location in the middle of nowhere. When a GI has a pass, he wants to get as far away from GI as possible. All you could do there was go sit in the park at Neosho with a lot of other soldiers and watch the fountains and listen to the birds. So if you weren't in a bird-and-fountain mood, you stayed at camp and waited for the mail.

Lon lived from mail to mail. He'd like to tell anyone reading this that one thing can't be repeated too often—write to your soldier at least once a day. What you write doesn't matter—tell him there was a knot in your shoelace that morning, tell him the baby said awk!—he'll eat it up. Nobody but the man who's felt it knows the desolation of going for mail and not finding any. Three days went by once, without any letters for Lon. He knew perfectly well that he hadn't been forgotten, that something must have held the mail up, but boy! did he go round feeling sorry for himself!

On the fourth day, there were ten letters—including three from Mom and one from Granny. Granny told him about weeding and planting the garden. Mom wrote about Mac—how she'd shown him her favorite picture of Lon, and said, "Where's Bud, Mac?"—and how Mac looked up at her, then went and lay down in front of the fire where they always romp when Bud's at home.

"And it was almost as though I'd been with them all for a little while."

The company threw a party to celebrate the end of basic training. Lon's no song-and-dance man, but—purely for soldier audiences—he does a deadpan imitation of a burlesque queen, complete with bumps and grinds. He did it that night, a few appropriate accessories dangling from his uniform, and a guy at the piano banging out a spirited rendition of "Take It Off."

A short time later, he made his public debut as a singer. The Army needed WACS—especially girls with trained skills to qualify for camouflage and laboratory work. So certain members of Company C were transferred to Headquarters Company to prepare a WAC recruiting show. Russell Gleason and Ted Key wrote it, Bill Johnstone produced it, Lon was one of the cast. Starting at St. Louis, they toured the Seventh Service Command, playing mostly at colleges and universities.

At St. Louis the house was so jammed, they had to give a second performance for the overflow.

Bill called Lon over. "We'll only have time to repeat the second act, and all you do in that is sit around. I think you ought to sing a song or something."

"You've got hold of the wrong guy. Not only am I no Sinatra—I just can't sing."

"Anyone can sing. You're not tone-deaf, are you?"

"No, but I might as well be—"

"You sing," said Bill.

Orders are orders. Lon sang "I'll Be Seeing You." There were seven curtain calls, and they certainly weren't for his voice. Bill finally had to go out and tell the gals that Private McCallister couldn't take any more bows, by order of the Army.

shades of sinatra . . .

And talking of Sinatra, he had Frankie hurled at his head in Kansas City. Ordinarily, time was allowed for autographs after the show. But in Kansas City, they were whisked straight off to the train, and Lon received his first unkind fan letter. The writer was very upset. No time for autographs, huh? That was just too bad. "Frankie never treated us girls that way," she scolded—forgetting that Frankie's time is still his own, and that Lon's belongs to Uncle Sam.

One grand thing about Army life is the comradeship. Lon drew very close to the boys he traveled with—Corporal Nat Lund and Bill Lawless, Ted Key and Hal Hedrick, Kathryn Grayson's brother. There was a silly running gag he and Nat used to pull on each other, known as the movie-star or delusions-of-grandeur routine.

"Private McCallister, Miss Garbo's waiting outside. Will you see her now?"

"No, I'm not in the mood—let her wait for a couple of hours."

Or, "Corporal Lund, may I remind you that you have a luncheon engagement with Cary Grant?"

"Oh, tell him to go soak his head, I'm busy reading."

Nat caught his buddy off guard once. "Lon McCallister wishes a word with you—"

"Tell him to go to the devil," said Lon absently.

'ittie bittie fishies . . .

Then there was the night in Northfield, Minnesota, when they had a whole apartment to themselves, and flipped a coin to see who'd get the bedroom. Lon and Bill Lawless won. But the room overlooked a beautiful little river, and sleep seemed a waste of time, so they sat up talking and watching the river till Johnstone and Gleason, who'd been out fishing, broke in on their lyric mood with two half-dead catfish. This, Lon and Bill decided, was no night for death. They filled the bathtub, revived the fish, left them swimming peacefully and went to bed. Their own peace was shattered next morning by a howl from Nat, who came tearing in with a tale of fish in the bathtub—

"Poor little fish," murmured Lon, half asleep. "We put 'em there—"

Nat hauled them both out by an ear and made them clean the tub.

One morning—they were about to leave Omaha for Denver—Lon came in, to be greeted by a chorus of wisecracks—

"Well, nice to have known you, Bud."

"Hope we can get together after the war."

He, of course, didn't know what they were talking about. And didn't believe it when they told him that a phone call had come in, saying that Private McCallister had been requested for "Winged Victory." At first he shrugged the whole thing off as a rib. When the boys persuaded him that they weren't kidding, he still shrugged it off. In the Army, you learn not to believe anything till the orders come through.

So they went to Denver and Colorado Springs and Laramie, and back to Omaha again. And in Omaha, on the afternoon of June 2nd, his orders reached him. He was to leave by plane that night.

If anyone had told him in February that he'd be going back to California four months later with a certain sadness of heart, he'd have said simply and feelingly, "You're crazy." But that's what happened. That's another thing you learn in the Army—to make friends and lose them suddenly—to live with men like brothers, then swiftly and sharply to be cut off from that life of shared experience and emotion, and find yourself a thousand miles away.

"I read about a guy in Italy," said Lon. "He was leaning against a rock after a fight, looking awfully tired. A doctor spoke to him. 'Yeah, I'm tired,' he said. 'I don't want any more buddies, I'm tired of losing 'em.' Well, you can't compare the two experiences, his was so much more poignant, but in a lesser degree I know how he felt."

He'd phoned home to tell them he was coming. Mother said, "We'll be waiting at the airport." Granny said: "Whether you arrive for breakfast, lunch or dinner, we'll have lemon meringue pie." The fellows went out to the Omaha airport with him. They dropped in at the Canteen and signed their names on the curtain—where Lon found Vic Mature's name among others. They exchanged addresses, then stood around in that last-minute tension of parting, trying to bridge the approaching gulf with smartcracks.

That was the worst moment. Boarding the plane was a kind of relief. Having flown only once before, he stayed up all night, thinking his thoughts and taking everything in.

Lon's done a lot of traveling in the past year or two, and a little tradition's grown up around his homecoming. He likes to meet Mac alone. So the folks take the dog to the little apartment they've kept in Hollywood. Iya, as Lon calls his grandfather, uses it most—works at RKO and doesn't always feel like taking the long trip to Malibu.

Mother and Granny were at the airport. They drove to the apartment, and Lon went up alone to where Mac was waiting. It was fifteen or twenty minutes before they came down. "First we make love and then we roughhouse," grins Lon. "I know lots of people can't stand dogs kissing them. I'm sorry if they disapprove, but I love it."

those foolish things . . .

He reported to the "Winged Victory" camp at Santa Monica and got a pass to go home for the week-end. Everything was just as he'd left it. Lon's folks are sentimental, which is fine with him, because he's sentimental, too. Instead of dismantling his bed, they'd made it up fresh the morning he went away, to be ready for him whenever he got back. He'd been reading "Goodnight, Sweet Prince," and had left it open, face down, on the bookstand beside his bed. That's how he found it. On the dresser lay some change he'd removed from his trousers pocket. Lon smiled, seeing the picture of Mom or Granny, carefully replacing the coins after they'd dusted—

He called some of his friends—Bill Eythe, Marjorie Riordan, Gene and Betsy Kelly. "You've got to come over tonight," Betsy said. "We're having a party."

"I'd love to. I want to see all the kids."

Instead, he went to bed at 7:30 and slept for 12 hours. Mom stole in about 9 and stole out again to phone Betsy. "He didn't get any sleep on the plane last night. I haven't the heart to wake him."

Betsy agreed it would be a crime. "Tell him we'll give him a raincheck for next Saturday."

He spent all of Sunday on the beach. California decided to smile—it was the first time in a month—for her namesake. He got a swell burn. They had lemon meringue pie for breakfast, lunch and dinner.

home in indiana . . .

Next morning he reported back to the Post, to resume GI life under the military discipline of a regular AAF organization. His first orders sent him to the studio, where his heart warmed to the welcome of old friends, and he got permission to lunch with the "Home In Indiana" gang. He met George Cukor, who's directing "Winged Victory."

"You directed the first picture I was ever in, Mr. Cukor."

"Are you kidding? Or did I direct 'Stage Door Canteen' in my sleep?"

Lon grinned. "I was a page boy in 'Romeo and Juliet.'"

On evenings off and an occasional week-end pass, he picks up the threads of his personal life. With his folks and Bill Eythe and Bill's mother, he went to see "Home In Indiana." He sits through his own pictures with mixed feelings—naturally curious, yet deeply embarrassed to watch himself on the screen. His grandfather's reaction tickled him. Iya doesn't commit himself in words. He has the reserve of his British forebears and a dry sense of fun.

"How did you like it?" asked Granny.

"Wonderful horses. Liked those colored boys, too—reminded me of the boys that used to work for me down in Arkansas—"

"Did you happen to notice that your grandson was in it too? What did you think of him?"

He patted her hand. "Exactly what you thought."

girls of his dreams . . .

Jeanne Crain plays one of the girls in "Winged Victory." Since their first picture together, rumors of an off-screen romance between the two have been floating round. As a rule, you don't put too much stock in Hollywood rumors—nor in any denial of them. Lon's the exception. What Lon tells you, you believe. He says he's been out with Jeanne only once. And once she came down to Malibu with another girl, and they all ran around the beach together in blue jeans. For the rest—well, he feels about her the way Sparke felt about Char in "Home In Indiana." All through the picture he thinks of her as just a pal—till the end, when it begins to dawn on him that she's a very charming girl. That's how Lon feels about Jeanne—including the last reel.

It can't be too serious, since there are two other girls he'd like very much to go out with. One's Gloria De Haven, who was a sophomore at high school when he was a senior. He hasn't seen her in a couple of years, and they've probably both changed, but he's never forgotten her. The other girl's Shirley Temple, whom he hasn't even met. Just thought she was wonderful ever since he started seeing her in pictures when she was five, and he was a ripe ten.

KEEP THE HOME FIRES BURNING

Her voice floated over the phone. "Could I visit my boy friend who's a prisoner of war?" "You mean in Germany?" asked the Home Service volunteer, astonished. "Oh, no, he's in this country!" "Then he's a captured Italian or German?" inquired the worker. "My boy friend is an American," answered the gal. "But he's a prisoner of war—he's in the guardhouse."

But the work of the trained volunteers of the Home Service Corps isn't usually that simple. Or so much fun. The Red Cross Charter reads, "they are to act as a medium of communication between the people of the United States and their Army and Navy." Which is the nutshell way of telling about the kid who was saved from nearlv worrying himself plunk into a nest of Nazis when Field Service found out that his mother hadn't died just because he hadn't gotten mail for two months. Or the bride who followed her about-to-be commissioned husband cross-country and found herself with no money, no job, a husband shipped overseas and a baby on the way. The Red Cross fixed that one up. The way they fixed up the father with a son dying in a prison camp in Japan or the youngsters worried about their parents in Greece or the G.I. and his motherless baby.

Call your local chapter today. Ask if they can use you in this vital service. And if they can, what a lucky, lucky gal you'll be!

He's 21 now—a thoughtful 21, living in an age that calls for sober thought. He returned to find home the same, but himself different. He no longer takes anything for granted, however small, however routine. Everyday commonplaces are touched with magic—like walking down Hollywood Boulevard at lunchtime, having a malt at Melody Lane, watching plain people go about their business, lying in bed at the Post and hearing the surf pound the Santa Monica Beach—all with a quickened perception of the minor delights of living that in normal times he never thought about twice—

Where his next mission may take him, nobody knows—overseas perhaps. In the Army, you live each day as it comes. You don't plan, though sometimes you dream, as he and his friends dreamed round the fire one night. It happened unexpectedly that his three college roommates, two of them in service, were all in town at the same time—which called for one of their traditional get-togethers—a Sunday at Malibu. After dinner they gathered round the fire and talked of the war. Three were in uniform. One had brought his wife along. Before breaking up, they pledged themselves to a reunion at Malibu six months, six weeks and six days from the day of victory. Then, with Bill's wife at the piano, the four young voices rose in their fraternity song—

"Comrade, this prayer I pray with thee,
That thou and I may ever be,
As now, though time and duty part,
Possessors of a common heart."

Lon thinks it's a good song not only for fraternity brothers, but for men to sing to each other the world over.

Lts. as far as Anne is concerned.

In addition to her schooling the next ideal condition in Anne's life was the fact that she came from a liberal-minded family. Her grandfather, as you undoubtedly know, is Frank Lloyd Wright, our era's most ingenious and pioneering architect. He believed, more daringly than most other men of his profession, in trying new things. His daughter (Anne's mother) inherited his able and open mind.

When, at age 13, Anne made the statement that she didn't want to go to high school or college, but wanted to be educated for the stage instead, her parents didn't laugh at her. They discussed the matter and reached a conclusion: She could go to dramatic school. If she made a success of it, if the teachers really thought she had talent, then she could continue. But if she were guilty of a sliperoo from excellence—and at that time they viewed with alarm the Awful State of her music lessons—she had to go to high school, then to college.

If Anne ever has children of her own, she thinks the same method will be applied. They will be allowed to try anything; if they succeed, they may continue. If their efforts are not so good, something new must be added.

So she was enrolled in the Theodora Irvine School of Drama in New York, and from there she went into the training classes of Madame Maria Ouspenskaya.

role of steel wire . . .

Madame's methods are as unorthodox as they are successful. In order to stimulate imagination (a trouper's most valuable asset) she asked her students to pretend to BE some inanimate object. Sounds complicated. Works like this: For instance, how would you reflect the mannerisms and basic character of a blue bowl filled with mashed potatoes? Or could you pretend to be a grey chiffon shawl so pliant that at the first gust of wind you would slide in flowing lines from a chair to a floor? Or could you be a pale lavender envelope, left unopened on a mantel?

One of Anne's best characterizations was that of a roll of steel wire. She was always strung as tight as fiddle strings in torrid weather, anyhow.

Work of this kind is inclined to call for such concentration that the amateur Thespian is likely to develop preoccupied habits having nothing to do with the desired characterization.

After Anne had finished a scene one day, Madame Ouspenskaya complimented Anne's partner in the play, saying that she had never once fallen out of character. Then she turned to Miss Baxter and asked in her deep, rich, slightly accented English, "Anne, tell me vy did you kip leefting oop und down on your toes? Vy?"

Anne couldn't think of a good reason at the time, but afterward the trick came in handy when she had to represent a rocking chair.

Another benefit to be reaped from these exercises was the habit of looking at, and playing to, the other person in a given scene. Beginners are likely to be so concerned with themselves and the audience that they forget the essential ingredient of drama: interplay of stage personality. One of the first things the talent scout, who eventually recommended a test for Anne, noticed about the budding actress was her complete absorption in the other persons on the stage to the exclusion of, apparently, everyone else in the world.

During her training period Anne appeared in two Broadway productions, "Seen But Not Heard" and "There's Always a Breeze." She was so young that her chief reaction to this success was a great weariness. In the first play, she, Frankie Thomas and two other children had very few responsibilities. All they had to do was sit on the stage and react. But from the second act on, it required every drop of their dramatic stamina and sense of theater to stay awake. They were bored to death.

In the summer of 1938 and again in 1939 Anne worked in a stock company at Dennis, Massachusetts, where she lost her last vestige of awe for the stage as such. Summer stock is always a rugged enterprise in which the members of the company have to be everything from set dressers to script doctors; in which an audience at a melancholy drama is likely to be thrown into hysterics by the appearance of a vagrant cat on stage; in which a high wind is likely to blow down the back drop. Great stuff.

In 1940 Anne came to Hollywood to start her 20th Century-Fox contract by playing opposite, of all impressive leading men on earth, John Barrymore. She was scared to death. If Madame Ouspenskaya thought Anne's best characterization in school had been the bale of wire, she would have thought Anne's first days on the set were a barbed wire entanglement.

Anne was doing the role of an eager young playwright whose play Barrymore had, according to the script, promised at first to produce, then had changed his mind. At which point Miss Baxter was supposed to entreat him not to give up her play. They went through a rehearsal.

"no swimming" allowed . . .

Mr. Barrymore was slumped deeply into a canvas set chair. His chin rested upon his chest, his hands dangled limply over the chair arms, his eyelids were at half-mast, and his barely visible eyes contemplated a distant mirage of some nature, not—to judge by his expression—entirely pleasant.

Anne, diffident and dry of throat, rehearsed her lines. "Oh please," she said with great feeling, bringing her arms forward in a twin sweeping gesture and clasping them before her. "Oh please don't fail me now." Her arms swept backward. Then, with the beginning of the next sentence, "You promised me. Don't break your promise," her arms swept forward again, clasped and swept backward again.

Seventy-seven seconds later Anne delivered her last phrase and turned to the director. "It sounds fine to me," he said. He became aware of the pained Barrymore profile slowly turning a full-face even more pained.

"Please," intoned the magnificent voice, "does the young woman have to SWIM?"

Anne dispensed with the gestures.

Her next brush with genius and her own inhibitions occurred when she was working in "Swamp Water." In this little epic she was supposed to be a wild creature, entirely at home with beasts of the field and the vegetation they munched.

Handicap one: Anne had always been violently afraid of cows. To her, a bovine was Lugosi with four legs. It was a belligerent animal with a voice like a ghost groaning down a well, a slimy snout and a husband entirely lacking in social sense.

Handicap two: She was supposed to run barefooted across a field covered with clods and wheat stubble, a gruesome task for feet hardened to nothing rougher than satin bedroom slippers.

The picture was being directed by Jean Renoir, son of the celebrated painter and himself a stickler for artistic realism. When he saw the rushes at the end of the first day's pastoral shooting, he froze with dismay. In all scenes in which Anne appeared with the barnyard brethren, she slunk! Instead of giving the impression that she was a bucolic belle entirely at home with beef, she was as out of place as a curate at a crap game.

It required days and days of getting acquainted with Holsteins and getting the soles of her feet hardened before the perfect take of a wild creature, fraternizing with stock and leaping nimbly over furrows and roots, was secured. Anne regards "Swamp Water" as her toughest assignment to date.

Having worked with Barrymore and Renoir, Anne then had the ideal experience of working with two of the most colorful characters in the motion picture or any other industry: Orson Welles and his dependable friend, Joe Cotten. Anne was cast as the ingenue in "The Magnificent Ambersons."

One of the first things she learned about Mr. Welles was that he might be arbitrary with the special effects men, with the cameramen and with other technicians from whom he expected miracles of inventive departure from the ordinary, but with actors and actresses he was always courteous, helpful and understanding. If he didn't get the reaction he wanted, he figured out means of appealing to the imagination and eliciting the mood desired.

Much of "Ambersons" was shot in a huge ice house in downtown Los Angeles. You probably recall the convincingness of the snow scenes complete with frosted breath and a certain ruddy aspect of the players' faces, even in black and white.

In the sequence that Anne dreaded, the sleigh in which she was riding around a hill was supposed to be flung out of the narrow, snow-clogged ruts of the road, and to overturn. Anne was to roll over and over down the drifted embankment.

They started to work on the scene early one morning, but by dinner time that evening they hadn't achieved a take that Mr. Welles considered satisfactory. "It doesn't look natural," he said. "We'll have dinner, then shoot it again."

They went to Mike Lyman's (on Hill Street) to eat and to discuss the problem. "You're too stiff, Anne. Can't you relax?" he asked.

"I guess I'm scared," Anne admitted. "You know I don't care much for animals even if I do ride horseback. That's the first trouble. Then I don't like that breakaway sleigh."

One of the girls in the group suggested that Anne take a sedative to soothe her nerves. Anne had never touched nembutol before in her life, although dentists frequently use it to calm nervous patients. "It's harmless," everyone said. "Go ahead."

jill with a jag . . .

It had a terrific effect. Anne's smile grew distant and misty, and her gestures were gently lackadaisical. Her eyelids hung softly over sleep-laden eyes, and she didn't worry about anything. No one in the group had ever seen such contended-baby calm descend upon a high-strung, dynamic bit of nerve tissue like Anne.

On the first take the sled flipped over, Anne out-tumbled Jill and looped merrily down the hill. When she reached the bottom she sat up, brushed the snow out of her face, and laughed. "Fun!" she said. The take was perfect the first try.

And so to romance. There, too, Anne's life has been perfect. She had her first heavy crush at age 11, when she was spending the summer in a mountain camp. Nearby was a boys' camp; arrangements were usually made for a Saturday night party to be attended on a co-educational basis. Anne knew from her mother's letters that the son of Mrs. Baxter's dearest friend was attending the other camp, but she didn't think he'd recognize her even if he saw her.

Probably the pictures that Anne's family had supplied of her were better than those the Baxters had of the boy. At any rate, he came striding in one night, looked over the giggle aggregation, then made straight for Anne. "I know you," he said, beaming down from the enormous height found only in adolescent boys and giraffes.

"You're Kirk—I know you, too," said Anne, wondering how on earth it happened that a family friend could turn out to be so super.

"Well . . . let's dance," suggested Kirk.

Anne hesitated. "I can't . . . that is, I don't know how to dance," she admitted.

"Neither do I," said Kirk happily. "Let's try it anyhow."

So they did. They found that they weren't bad. Each had a natural sense of rhythm, and—after casing the steps tossed off by other dancers—they ad libbed Murrays in a hurry. After that they had a standing date for any occasion on which the two camps merged.

That fall he went off to prep school, and Anne went back to Broadway. They exchanged letters enthusiastically until An Older Man spoiled the idyll. This Older Man was an actor, handsome, suave and about 45. Anne was 14. When she was not required to be onstage, she haunted the wings, watching her dream boat sailing through his lines. She agonized over every kiss he bestowed upon the leading lady, and her imagination devised scenes in which she was the object of his dramatic emotion. One day he tossed a casual arm about her shoulder (or was it really so casual, her hopes suggested) and said, "You certainly look pretty tonight, darling."

She lived for weeks upon that sentence. As days wore on, and he failed to enlarge on this observation, Anne came to the conclusion that all men were blind. She had compensatory day dreams in which she saw herself, a celebrated actress, being interviewed. When she was asked why she had never married, she imagined how delicately she would allow a fleeting, world-weary smile of utter disillusion to cross her face. "I do not wish to discuss it," she would say, half-revealing her Great Wound.

A brief year later Miss Baxter was healing her aches in a summer stock company and had developed a crush on a boy in the same company. This romance was like summer itself—beautiful while it lasted and ended by a nostalgia on the one hand and a lively anticipation of fall football games on the other.

Since that time there have been a dozen gay, inconsequential romances in the Baxter life, which is the inalienable right of a smoothie.

Currently, the rumor boys and girls have been blowing full blast on her interest in rugged "Hi" Hodiak, the sensational over-six footer who, after being discovered in "Lifeboat," went on his own romantic exploratory field trips guided by, among others, Turner and Judy Garland. Fact is, just the other day, when our "Good News" penner, Louella Parsons, asked Anne about "Hi's" statement that he was very much in love with her, Annie's quiet reply was, "I hope what John says is true." Which called for rejoicing till she blew cold on everyone's warm hopes by re-

You, too, will see the difference when you use Super-Foamy Mar-o-Oil says VERA ZORINA

"No other shampoo has ever left my hair so pleasingly soft, sparkling, and easy to arrange," says Vera Zorina, lovely motion picture and musical comedy star.

THE very first time you use Super-Foamy Mar-o-Oil, you'll see, too, that it is truly the only perfect three-purpose shampoo. It has (1) the unique benefits of an oil shampoo; (2) but at the same time it cleanses easily and quickly with oceans of light, rich, bubbly foam; (3) yet it leaves no dull, soapy film—in fact it leaves your hair exquisitely clean, gleaming, soft and easy to manage.

Easy to understand then, isn't it, why Super-Foamy Mar-o-Oil is preferred by so many stage and screen beauties? They know that it brings out the true, shimmering, romantic high-lights and leaves the hair gloriously clean and easy to arrange. Super-Foamy Mar-o-Oil is a gentle, mild shampoo with a fast cleansing action, but contains no harsh chemicals, alcohol, or caustics. It removes loose dandruff and requires no lemon or vinegar rinse. Get a bottle today at your favorite beauty counter, or ask your hairdresser for a professional Super-Foamy Mar-o-Oil shampoo. You, too, will be more than delighted to find that it really brings out the true, radiant beauty in your hair.

peating her now-famous motto, "I'll never marry an actor." Mebbe she's trying to keep 'em guessing, but the consensus of opinion is, that if those two aren't very much in love, they should win an Academy Award for the good job of acting they're putting on.

The final ideal condition in Anne's life is the fact that she lives in a dream of a Southern California house with her parents whom she particularly adores. Only once has this housing arrangement seemed less than perfect. Last New Year's Eve when Mr. and Mrs. Baxter were away briefly she came home from a watch party at 2 A.M. She was to leave with a group of friends for Palm Springs at 4 A.M.

Anne decided that a nap of two hours duration was not sufficient justification for getting undressed and into bed, so she spread a blanket before the fireplace, touched a match to the wood already laid in the grate and prepared to nap. First, she wanted a drink of water. She hopped into the kitchen and had just finished the final swallow when she heard a sound that tightened her scalp, scraped her throat and moistened her hands. It was a stealthy, furtive sound. She tried to identify it . . . what on earth? Then she knew. It was the sound made by two sections of corduroy rubbing together . . . the sound made by a man moving with great caution.

Weeks, months, eons went by while Anne grew roots, and her ears stretched toward the sound like ivy toward the sun. The sound was intermittent; there was another odd thing about it—it seemed to remain where it was when Anne first heard it. It hadn't moved about the room, hadn't grown louder nor softer.

It was then that Anne thought of the huge brass fire tongs; if she could get them, she could protect herself. Cautiously she slipped into the living room. There was no one there except that one terrible noise.

She had set up her Christmas tree in front of the air vent so that the pine fragrance would permeate the room. The forced air came up in gusts; each time it billowed into the room, it rubbed the bristling branches of the tree against the resounding stucco walls.

Anne almost had hysterics of relief.

If she is ever cast in a horror picture, she will be able to give a superb performance, so—once again—it is apparent that Anne Baxter's is an ideal life. A list of those who would like to share it with her would be added at this time, but there's a paper shortage—remember?

MODERN SCREEN'S FASHION GUIDE

me down and play them up. The street-length dress Gloria wears does it with a peplum. Even so, you'll notice that the curves veer downward, not outward. This dress, too, gives you plenty of shoulder width. Makes your waistline seem plenty slim by contrast.

If you want to be sure your deadliest rival won't outshine you, pick colors like these. Aquamarine and parma violet. Or fuchsia, chartreuse, royal blue or almond green. If your bankroll says "no" about expensive gloves in a contrast color, settle for a long pair in fabric. I dare your date to tell from two feet away (that's where you keep him, of course) that you aren't wearing costly, precious suedes. And, of course, when he gets closer, he won't know the difference, anyway!

To twinkle is the newest wrinkle. (I heard somebody say it at the New York dress show.) If you want to accomplish this via sequins, I've no argument. I've seen enough of them to launch a thousand fake mermaids. But, if I were you, I think I'd be a bit more subtle and advanced.

The black dress photographed, for example, uses jet and pastel embroidery. Your family should approve of that very respectable high round neckline—even if it is the filmiest chiffon way down to a deep, deep oval. If you want to be specially bedecked, wear a feather cap like the one shown here. Or track down a quaint black jet comb or barrette for your hair. But please—as you trust me—don't litter up this nice throat line with a bead choker or anything.

Now about longer waistlines. Remember, I promised to take a stand on the subject several months back? The answer today is "yes." But only provided the dress you buy doesn't have to be shortened to fit you. The one I've shown here is a junior size, which means that it's cut for short figures. But you can see what would happen if you had to slice any more off the skirt section. While your eyes are in focus where they are, it's a good time to mention that square necks are mighty good for you. Nail studs, too. They'll match the gleam of your engraved silver barrette.

This particular wool dress has more points than the normal ration book. The color, for example, is gray. I know I said to go in for brilliance, because everybody can't wear gray. And, besides, it isn't the most effective attention-getter in the world. But if you have vivid coloring and feel sure of yourself, it's a pretty snooty color.

Are you one of the gals who wrote me asking "how to catch a boy's eye?" Even if you weren't, better sit down and listen. Wear stripes! If you think I just make things up out of my own head—why do you think they paint stripes on the highways to get the attention of traffic-eers?

I've shown you just one example of the many ways that fashion has used stripes this year. A cap sleeve formal—and if you don't know by now what this shoulder line does, I'm just wasting my time. The tones of green and red shine almost like neon lights. You can carry this creation if you wear a junior size—no matter how many sodas and sundaes you've been downing lately. That midriff section does an extra bit about slimming down the frame. But, a dress like this, makes the frothy stuff look like something left over from last year's Christmas tree.

* * *

No secrets, as I said. If you want to know where to get these dresses, including the ones Gloria de Haven wore for us, just write me. Or if you want to tell me all about you and ask what to do about clothes in general, I'll be listening. Write: Marjorie Bailey, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

WE WANT ROGERS

wood's two holiest premiere temples where no mere horse opera has ever gotten a hoof inside before. On top of all this, five or six big businesses are bidding for Roy to yodel on a radio show this fall, and if Boss Caesar Petrillo wasn't such a meanie about letting people make records these days, you'd find Roy right there in the juke-box royal family, too. The day his Roy Rogers Comic Book came out, the million copies went like hot cakes—in 24 hours.

So you can see that Mrs. Rogers' boy is doing all right for himself. And while all of this means exactly $12.50 a week personally for spending money (that's absolutely all his manager lets him tote around in his jeans), he's as rich as Croesus in a commodity that Roy sets big store by—friendly fans. Many's the month he's shelled out $500 or more just for stamps to paste on letters to his pen pals, boys and girls he has never seen. Many's the stranger who asked for Roy's autograph and struck up a solid palship. Because Roy, who at heart is just a grass roots guy from off an Ohio farm, has a knack of liking everybody. And usually it's a case of vice-versa, too—although sometimes there are exceptions.

price of fame . . .

A few months ago, for instance, Roy was rattling along toward New York on the Twentieth Century Limited when he noticed a beefy passenger glaring at him with a perplexed frown. Roy had on his sky-blue cowboy suit that day with all the terrific trimmings, and he looked like the painted desert. Every time he grinned, the glaring man scowled deeper. Well, they went into the diner before the train neared New York, and Roy, who has ears sharp as an Indian's, heard the gruff gent talking to his wife, like this—

"I can't figure that guy out. What do you suppose he does—sell Indian snake-root medicine?"

"S-h-h-h," said his wife. "He'll hear you."

"Or is he out of a circus?"

"Stop staring," hissed his wife.

"I can't help it," growled the man. "He gets me."

Well, the scowler-growler never let off glaring and grunting at Roy until they pulled into Grand Central Station. Then he saw photographers and reporters swarm around Roy, now in his ten gallon hat. The mob hemmed in the beefy gentleman like a Nazi in deepest Russia. That made him boil all the more, but at last he realized who Roy was.

"Well, I'll be damned," he bellowed to his embarrassed wife. "It's that damned wild cowboy guy in the movies. What do you know about that? Lemme out of here!"

Roy loves to tell stories about himself like that because he has a funny bone built for an Elk, and also because he realizes, like anyone else, that he's no Kit Carson, but a strictly theatrical rough rider. In fact, Roy's favorite story on the subject of his riotous rig is the time he was highballing along on the Santa Fe's Super Chief through the ranch country of Arizona, and a bronzed old man with white whiskers came over and tapped him on the shoulder.

"Son," said the oldster, "what's that uniform you got on? What branch of the service are you in?"

Roy said he wasn't in the service at all. He explained amiably to the old man that he was a cowboy in the movies in Hollywood and that he always dressed like that.

"W-a-al, now," marveled the man. "Ain't that interesting? I never in all my born days saw a get-up exactly like the one you got."

Roy chinned a while more, then he asked his inquisitor what he did.

"Why, I guess you'd call me a cowhand," grinned the old man. "I've got me a cattle ranch back in the hills here!"

Sometimes, after episodes like that or a Manhattan mob mauling, Roy seriously considers lugging along one suit of civvies to wear as a disguise. He's got "a store suit and a new pair of shoes I used to get married in," explains Roy, but each time he gets them out and tries them on, he feels downright conspicuous!

There's only one time on record, though, that his rainbow rig ever got him into any trouble. Oddly enough, that time the difficulty was that he got taken for what he was dressed up to be! That was in Manhattan, where they don't know much about cowboys anyway, in fact, it was at the famous Stork Club. Roy's prone to skip the bright lights when he hits the big cities, because, for one thing, he doesn't drink, like to dance or hanker to stay up and greet the dawn, not when he has to put on a rip-roaring show the next day, as he usually does on tour. But on one trip to New York, Sherman Billingsley, the owner-host of the Stork, called up Roy and personally invited him to pay a visit to the Stork. Roy thought that was right hospitable and friendly so he said sure enough, he'd amble over right after the Rodeo was over at the Garden that night.

Now, the real buckaroos from West of the Pecos who swarm into New York for prizes at the annual Rodeo are sometimes pretty rugged customers, a hard-drinking, wild-acting, rip-snorting bunch. Most of them stop at the Belvedere and other hotels around the Garden, and every year when they swarm in, the management discreetly hauls out the good furniture in the cowboy rooms and drags in some sturdy stuff that can stand the kicking around. There's generally a rough-and-tumble fight going on somewhere, and a couple of times the hell-raising cowpokes have even gotten themselves killed. You wouldn't say their reputations for being little gentlemen in café society were exactly Grade-A.

So when Roy Rogers ambled up to the Stork Club, the doorman took one look at his Stetson and spurs and other marks of what he considered the real McCoy ranch clothes.

"Beat it, cowboy!" he said.

"Say, look here—" began Roy.

dropped by the stork . . .

The doorman had visions of the Stork's famous mirrors being shot up, the chairs splintered, and all the swank guests running screaming out into the night without paying their checks. So he called all the help in the place and gave Roy the bum's rush right out to the pavement!

Sherman Billingsley called up the next day to apologize and to beg Roy to give the Stork another chance, but Roy said he reckoned he just wasn't interested.

But all of this I've been telling you is very definitely an exception to the rule. Most times, Roy collects pals wherever he goes—and that's a lot of places. Last year, for instance, he traveled around 50,000 miles on his rodeo circuit, his movie personal appearances and his Bond Rally tours. He played the Army hospitals and camps wherever he happened to be in-between stands.

As a result, Roy has plenty of pals in all corners of the fighting fronts today, but there are a couple of kids he keeps in touch with particularly, because in a way they're almost like his own boys. Both are in the Air Corps now, but only a few years back they were a couple of neighbor kids to Roy, just Gary and Dick, who used to wander over to Roy's house looking kind of lonesome and sometimes hungry, especially when Roy's wife, Arlene, was putting some of her famous pies out to cool. Gary and Dick didn't feel very comfortable at home—there was some stepmother trouble—and before he knew it, Roy was getting them to help him out around the place. Seemed like after that they were usually eating a meal or two every day at Roy's house, and he began to look on them as kinfolks.

Then came the war and Roy was surprised to find both Gary and Dick had grown up enough to enlist as Air Cadets. Gary's still in school, but first thing Roy knew, Dick was all graduated and wearing his gold bar and wings, and then he was over in India, writing to his favorite good neighbor and movie star. But at first what Dick had to write wasn't so good. In fact, he was pretty disgusted. He hadn't gotten himself a Zero yet, and some of his pilot buddies had.

"Wonder if you'd care," Dick wrote, "if I name my plane 'Trigger' after your horse. I've got a hunch I might get going then."

dead-eye Trigger . . .

Roy wrote back, "Dee-lighted!" and the next note he got from Dick, things were looking up. "Trigger and I got two Zeros," Dick exulted. The next letter raised the ante, "Now we've got five!" Last time Roy heard from Dick he wrote, "Trigger and me are just sittin' here with our guns cocked, waitin' for more Japs!" You can imagine how good that made Roy feel and why he spends so much time writing all the Hollywood news to that particular scrapper for Uncle Sam.

Most of Roy Rogers' real chums are people like that—boys he has taken an interest in, people he has met on his travels, friends of people who work for him, just plain folks that Roy has taken a fancy to here and there. He's not a speck Social in the Hollywood Capital S way; in fact, at playing Society he's a total flop. Roy meets Big Shots galore everywhere he goes, and on his Army tours he has rubbed up against bestarred generals as well as lowly GI's—but rank or moneybags or Blue Book standings don't click with Roy at all. He's always running across someone he just happens to cotton to, and from then on they're usually a Rogers pal.

Like the time in St. Louis when Roy was on a personal appearance tour and theater tycoons there staged an elaborate press party for him. That afternoon at a baseball game he'd sat next to a fellow ball-fan. They got along fine, and the fellow asked Roy out to a roadhouse he ran over in Illinois, for a spaghetti dinner. Roy said he'd come right after the press party. But like a lot of those whoop-te-doos, it went on and on, and as the newspapermen got more and more oiled up, the later they stayed. Came seven, eight and then nine o'clock. Roy hated to leave his own party, but he'd also promised a pal to show up. So he left the reporters to their highballs and drove clear over to Belleville, Illinois, and made it, true to his word, better late than never. His new friend fed Roy and his guests royally, and that night introduced Roy to Mort Cooper, the big St. Louis Cardinal pitching ace. Roy and Mort got along fine, too. He took Roy duck hunting up on the Missouri River, and they've been pals ever since. That's the way Roy Rogers is always making new friends.

Hunting and baseball both are top items in Roy Rogers' fun book. He used to pitch a little as a youngster, and he's got a gold baseball at home in his den to show he hurled a winning game when the Hollywood Leading Men walloped the Comedians one season. One of the biggest thrills Roy ever had was in Cincinnati, where he was born, when the Cincy Reds invited him to come and work out with them, gave him a suit and let him bat and field with the big fellers. He has baseballs at home signed by every player on the Cincinnati squad and one from the Pittsburgh Pirates, too, and if anybody hooked those, he'd sure be in bad trouble with Rogers.

Roy has always hunted a lot, from his farm boy days up until war came. He used to specialize in wildcats around Hollywood. You can see the results of some all-night mountain stalks with his dogs right in that same den with a stuffed fox that he once ran over with his car! But when Uncle Sam started shooting, shotgun shells vanished like nylons at a bargain sale, so Roy had to lay off.

Then a friend of his horse trainer, Glenn, back in Nebraska, heard about Roy's sad plight. He shipped him out a case of shotgun shells he had and with it an invitation to stop there on his next trip East for some pheasant shooting. Roy has marked that a "must" stop on his schedule this fall, because he has more of a thank-you call to make than for just the shells. The man also sent Roy's baby girl, Cheryl, a pony. That cinched him with Roy Rogers as a friend for keeps. Because if there's one thing the Cowboy King is nutty about, besides beans and baseball, it's horses.

In fact, one reason he can plan a Midwest bird-shooting visit this year is because Roy aims to travel the highways from now on with his horse, Trigger. A while back, Roy had Trigger shipped across the country by train. He met him at the station, and poor Trigger stumbled off the boxcar like he was on his last legs. Roy was hopping mad when he sleuthed around and found out that Trigger had been kept on his feet, swaying and jolting for four days without any attention at all, except a bucket of water now and then. Right away he vowed he'd never ship him anywhere again. Roy's really touchy about Trigger. In San Antonio, Texas, they built a stall for his horse right in the hotel lobby so Roy could be near him, and sentimental Roy has even tossed a birthday party for Trigger with an oats and barley cake and guests and everything. He's that foolish about him.

in trigger's trail . . .

In fact, Roy knows as well as anyone, that his biggest rival isn't another screen cowpoke, but his own horse. A story Roy chuckles about is the time he got a wire from a big department store in Pittsburgh. He was set to play the rodeo there, and the store wanted to stage a Roy Rogers stunt. But in their wire they weren't a bit bashful about whom they considered the top attraction. "Please advise if we can have horse, Trigger," it read. "We don't want Rogers!"

Roy has scurried around and found himself a big, luxurious horse van, with hot and cold running oats and all equine conveniences, to carry Trigger around the country from now on. He aims to ride right with him, even if it does take longer. And when Trigger gets old and rickety, he'll take it easy in clover while Trigger II carries Roy along on his movie career. Trigger Number Two is already picked out, by the way, and that again is because Roy Rogers is handy at making friends. It was while he had his rodeo up at the Maple Leaf Garden in Toronto, Canada, that he met Charlie McVeedy who runs a dude ranch near there and raises Palominos and other ranch horses. Visiting Charlie one day between shows, Roy spotted a colt just four days old. "Doggone!" exclaimed Roy, "he's marked just like my Trigger! Say—how about my buying this colt to take over Trigger's job later on?"

Charlie said that was okay, only to make it an option to buy, and then if the grown horse turned out right, Roy could have him. Roy was so thrilled about that and so grateful, that before he left Toronto he took off the hand-made silver spurs and handed them over to his new friend, "I can get me another pair when we get back to Hollywood," Roy explained.

But when he did get back to Hollywood, darned if Roy could find himself a pair of fancy spurs anywhere, not for love or money. He'd forgotten about the war and the metal and craftsman shortage. So now he hasn't a pair to his name, but he's not worried. He figures his spurs are a fair swap for a new and good friend like Charlie any day in the week.

strange fruit . . .

Roy's champion fan is Leo Khoury, a middle-aged Arab, of all people. Leo saw Roy in one of his movies and swore by the Prophet's beard or something that he was going to know the cowboy king, or else. He was living down at the beach at that point and doing all right in the restaurant business. But he promptly pulled up his stakes and moved out to the San Fernando Valley, only a whoop and a holler from Roy's Encino country place. Not only that, but Leo notified Roy that he, Roy Rogers, was now half owner of the restaurant, a thriving, busy Valley highway spot. Roy said he couldn't accept a free partnership—he has enough interests now—but Leo calls him "Boss" just the same, and Roy always manages to take the people he likes over to Leo's place to feed them when he's pitching a party. Some day after the war Leo swears, he's going back to Arabia and bring home a string of Arabian nags for Roy to gallop around on in Hollywood.

Roy Rogers, being the palsy sort of guy he is, reacts to his sensational fan worship with an honest friendship that other stars sometimes try to fake, but seldom feel. He usually tosses a party of some sort for his regional fan "corral" wherever he is. Last year he held a big banquet at the Astor Hotel for the New York get-together of Rogers' rooters. He's made a trip or two to Hammond, Indiana, just to meet Gene Ernst, who's national "Ranch Boss" of all his clubs, and more than once Roy has met a fan, liked him and had him come out and stay at the house for days at a time. One kid who hitch-hiked clear out from Rhode Island just to see Roy, stayed with the Rogers family until his mother wired Roy to send him home.

Of course, like all Hollywood stars, Roy gets his share of nutty notes, and a few fantastic things have happened to make even Roy scratch his head and wonder at the strange fruit fame hatches.

There's the usual quota of absurd mash letters from girls who can't seem to savvy that Roy is happily married and has a family. One star-struck sweet thing wrote him a while back, "I want you to fly here and get me in an airplane, just like Clark Gable did Myrna Loy in 'Test Pilot.' I want to be your secretary and be everything to you—I mean everything!" Roy hates to have to let them down with the fact that he has enough secretaries and also a wife who is everything to him.

Then, too, he feels embarrassed about some of the stunts fervent fans pull on him. One boy in Chicago, for instance, called Roy long distance three times in one day, got him every time and hung on chattering for long minutes. Finally Roy asked him, "Say, son—who's going to pay for this call? You're using up valuable time there—you know that?"

"Oh, sure," breezed the kid. "But my folks are out of the house. They won't know till the bill comes in. I'll worry about that later." Roy made him hang up pronto then. But that's the kind of thing he's always running into because he's so good-natured.

Maybe the oddest thing that ever happened to Roy because of his movie fame was a fracas out in Colorado that almost duplicated one of the wild and woolly plots of his own pictures. A man with a big hunk of land in the cattle country took a shine to Roy on the screen, and being along in years, decided he'd like to turn over his vast holdings to the King of the Cowboys—at a price, of course. So he wrote an offer to Roy wanting to sell him the stretch of Colorado cattle land and a whole town to boot, complete with post-office, general store, town hall and jailhouse.

Well, to Roy Rogers it was just another freak offer. But somehow the news got around the town, and it got around as a fact that Roy was going to buy up all this property. That upset a lot of applecarts. Cattlemen's interests clashed, there was pistol-packin', skullduggery, lawsuits and about everything else that makes up a picture plot. The darned thing finally ended in a good old-fashioned Western range war! And all the time Roy hadn't the faintest idea of gobbling up all that land.

Matter of fact, land is something Roy doesn't want any part of until his picture-making days are over. He just sold his rambling Encino hilltop home and moved in closer to the studios in a house on a city street, with neighbors all around him. One reason was the gas shortage, another the servant shortage, but the main reason was the safety of Roy Rogers' number one fan—his four-year-old daughter, Cheryl.

The old place had a swimming pool that was seldom used, and both Roy and Arlene were scared to death Cheryl would tumble in some day. First Roy built a fence around it, but when he found that Cheryl could unlatch the gate and get in anyway, he decided the risk was too great. It got so Arlene, without even a cook to help her, didn't dare let Cheryl out of the house alone.

fruit salad al fresco . . .

The servant problem hasn't been notably improved since the Roy Rogers moved closer to town. In fact, Arlene is still doing all the household chores, aided by Roy on his time off—because that's one thing he doesn't mind a bit. His favorite exercise is hammering and sawing and digging in the dirt. In no time flat after he moved in his new house, Roy had built a whole new set of lofts for his 200 racing pigeons and transformed the badminton court (Roy considers all games like tennis, golf and badminton a waste of time) into a pigeon city. And even though his new home is no farm, it has a hillside grove of lemons, limes, oranges, grapefruit, figs, avocados and five or six other kinds of California specialties which Roy's green thumb has made spread all over the place like an outdoor fruit salad. But he could still use some hired help, and if things don't improve, he may even take up one fan's offer.

That was the one made right after Roy and Arlene had lost their lone wartime cook (she lasted a week) and had interviewed a colored couple who said they were looking for a job. Roy asked them how much they wanted, and they said $500 a month. He almost fainted, thinking of the $12.50 a week he jingles in his jeans and the income tax he pays. "You take my movie contract," Roy grinned to the high priced pair, "and I'll take the job—at those prices!"

So he was about at his wit's end to find somebody to help out Arlene when he got a phone call from a fan in North Carolina.

"Say, Roy," spoke up this kid, "I want to work for you in Hollywood."

Roy had an idea. "Why, I sure could use somebody to help around the house."

"I'm fine at housework," came back the kid. And darned if Roy wouldn't have hired him, right there over the phone, sight unseen, if Arlene, who had been listening to the conversation, shook her head firmly. She wasn't going to have some mother's son come clear across the country and maybe turn out to be another one to cook and care for!

"I'll keep singing a song" . . .

Of course, half the time these days, Roy Rogers is away from home—another reason he moved Arlene and the babies in closer to civilization. Because Roy doesn't come right back home from his show business tours these days—most times he sets right out on a junket to Army camps or hospitals. He rode Trigger right in the wards at Walter Reed Hospital in Washington last year and danced him in and around the beds. Roy made himself a marathon record, too, last winter down in Texas, staging 136 Army camp shows inside 20 days and a lot of them in the cold and rain. When he finally couldn't sing and couldn't talk either, he allowed as how something might be wrong with him. Something was—a strep throat which landed him in the hospital. The last thing Roy did about his private war effort was to stage his Rodeo in the Los Angeles Coliseum one Sunday and turn over the whole chunk of profits, $13,000, to Joe E. Brown's Army recreational fund to buy athletic equipment for GI's overseas.

Roy Rogers hasn't had himself a vacation for three years. He thinks he might get in a few days before the Fall Rodeo tour starts up at Big Bear or some near-Hollywood mountain resort, if Arlene can hold on behind him on his motorcycle, and if his folks will take care of the kids. But Roy has thought that a thousand times before in the last few years, and generally something comes along to bust it up. Some of his hundreds of pals want him to do something, or an overseas soldier requests a radio recording or an Army hospital needs a show.

A while back, after a strenuous day and night Army camp and Rodeo tour, Roy found himself in a hospital, a plenty sick hombre with pneumonia in both lungs. He almost died—and maybe he would have—not from the pneumonia, but from boredom. But, with a raging fever of 104 degrees, Roy got busy and dashed off a whole set of lyrics and melody for a new song, which you'll be hearing one of these days soon. He figures that job is what let him walk out of the hospital instead of being lugged out feet first.

By the way, the name of the tune Roy wrote was "I'll Keep Singing A Song." As any one of his thousands of pals will tell you, that's Roy Rogers, all over.

YOUNG MAN WITH A TORSO

to around 160 by hard training, but his unbridled hunger for fancy steaks and French fries crosses him up. Incidentally, despite the fact that most guys and gals consider 70½ inches of height to be satisfactorily tall, Dick's studio has him wear shoes with built-in lifts which make him an even six feet tall on the screen. This burns the boy considerably.

retreat in glory . . .

He doesn't burn fast, but he burns thoroughly. For instance, he decided in the fall of 1941—several months before Pearl Harbor—that the U. S. was going to be in the war before another year had passed, so he smouldered to get into uniform. He had a tradition to embrace, a fighting family name to decorate. Dick's father was killed in action in March, 1918.

The recruiting sergeant looked Dick over and assumed an expression of cautious approval. "S'pose you got an eye on the Air Corps, huh?" he suggested.

"I had sort of thought Infantry," demurred Dick. "I've done some boxing. —I can handle myself fairly well. Thought it might come in handy in the ground forces."

The sergeant glowed. "Right in there," he said heartily.

The doctors failed to glow. "You have two punctured ear drums," they said. And because they were professional men, hence curious about human mishaps, they quizzed him. Dick told them his story frankly. When he was three, he had developed a mastoid abscess and had undergone surgery.

His mother had told him about this, but she had never dwelled on it. It was still too painful an ordeal to remember. She had sat beside him hour after hour, anguished to see him in such misery. And there was nothing, absolutely nothing, she could do to help. There had been one frightful morning when the doctor warned her that the small, sturdy heart could not carry on; it skipped a beat. Another. A third. And then, with the unbeatable constitution of a lusty child, he had rallied.

Between that siege, and the time he was fully grown, Dick underwent five major mastoid and nine minor operations. No one, to look at this rugged fella, would suspect such a past.

He always refused to admit to anyone that there was any reason for him to be careful, of course. One afternoon he was sparring, open-handed, with a pal and accidentally caught a fast one on his bad ear. That finished that ear drum. A few months later he dived off a high platform into a pool whose depths he had miscalculated and tried to leave his headprint in cement in the best Grauman manner. End of second ear drum.

As a result of these accidents, years later Dick trudged out of the recruiting office, thoroughly crestfallen. It was the first major setback in a life singularly filled with accomplishment.

Dick was born in Newcastle, Indiana, which makes him about as typically Usaman (new word meaning Man From the U. S. A.) as one can get without being chiseled out of the base of the Goddess of Liberty.

About the time he became Marbles Champion of Newcastle, his mother decided to move to Los Angeles, so Dick grew up in the shadow of a forest of motion picture cameras and klieg lights, a fact of which he was blissfully unaware. He had too much on his mind always to think of the future. That bicycle, for instance.

He was manager, critic and .37 batter on his sandlot team when he decided that it would be much easier on his aching dogs after a hard afternoon on the diamond if he could ride home instead of walking. Being the resourceful type he went down to a local newspaper and made a deal to deliver nightly gazettes. Each week he put aside 90% of his take. He used that other 10% for current expenses.

His mother accompanied him to the local bank and assisted him in establishing a savings account that he still has, although it has been through a fluctuating history. When he had amassed $19.00, he withdrew $18.75 and bought a bicycle.

The ownership of a bicycle opened a wide new world to Dick. It enabled him to journey often to the Hollywood YMCA where he enviously watched the big boys diving off the 75-foot tower. In bathing trunks (which hadn't yet been baptized because he was afraid to go in) Dick was stalling around the pool one day when the life guard asked him why he wasn't swimming. "Because I don't know how," Dick said logically.

"Sure you do," laughed the guard, lifting Mr. Crane and tossing him in. Dick learned to swim in ten easy strokes. Somehow he got back to the rail that borders the pool and clung there, dripping and gasping.

"See how easy it is?" the life guard asked. "Your form isn't much, of course. Now watch . . . " and Dick learned three methods of swimming that afternoon.

At the end of summer vacation, the YMCA staged a swimming meet. Dick told his mother about it. "Some of those guys can really porpoise around, Mom," he said eagerly. "I want you to see the meet."

So his mother, smiling indulgently, went to the event without knowing that Dick was to compete in each of the free-style races. When she saw Dick line up with the other contestants, she arose in her place and started to call out because she had no idea he could swim. He rapidly splashed away her doubts by winning three races. Dripping, he brought the trophy ribbons to her. "Keep them for me, huh?"

She tucked them into her purse and drew out her handkerchief. "You'd think I'd been peeling onions," she laughed, half-annoyed at her tears of pride. Somehow, she always managed—in the years that ensued—to be in the stands when Dick went into action. She saw practically all of his high school football games and suffered with him when the team lost. Celebrated, too, when they won, which was often. Luckily she was nowhere around when Dick fractured three ribs; it happened during practice.

something to remember . . .

His senior year, Dick was captain. It was a great year; they went through their opponents like fire through dried meadow grass. The whole team was getting more and more keyed up, tightening to the final effort of the big game. On Friday night there was the usual rally. Everyone made speeches. Everyone cheered until he was hoarse. The Booster Club had gathered firewood for days, so the fight fete was finished by a monster snake dance around the bonfire. Then, in cracked voices, the entire student body sang school songs. It was achingly exciting and wonderful . . . something to remember forever. Something to send a team into action with the power of a flight of B-29s and the cunning of a cover of P-38s.

The following morning the principal called Dick into his office. "I'm sorry to say that I have VERY bad news for you,"

he announced, patting Dick's shoulder. "It has been called to our attention that you're a mid-year student, so you're ineligible to play. You've already played your quota of high school football games."

Dick wanted to bawl like a baby. "Isn't there anyway we can fix it?"

No. He was ineligible. That was final. He thought of all the studying he had done, the boning for quizzes and the agonizing over notebooks—just to stay scholastically eligible for this game. And now he was ruled out on a technicality. Heartsick, he lagged out to the gym to tell the team. They couldn't believe it. They said there must be some mistake . . . and, throwing their helmets down hard, they said it was a lousy, rotten break.

"You'll get along swell without me," he said, trying to be casual. "This guy is a better back than I'll ever be." He patted his sub, who looked determined but doubtful.

gory grief . . .

When the whistle blew, Dick took up his place on the bench and played four hundred tough games without moving more than two square yards. His team, their morale shot, couldn't make anything click. Their passes were intercepted, their punts blocked, and their line plays fumbled. Oh, brother, but they got trounced. Mighty blue. Mighty blue. And Dick sat there during the endless moments, thinking that this was his last game.

He was wrong about that. At the end of the season the first team played the second; this was usually a wild scramble, bitterly fought by both sides. And that afternoon Dick was suited up and in there with both hands. He couldn't miss. He caught passes that started out like lightning and flitted off like butterflies. It made no difference. He ran all over the field, making touchdowns, intercepting his opponents' passes, messing up their carefully rehearsed secret plays. He spent the afternoon having an intensely pleasant time.

After school was out, Dick got a job with an automobile agency. His job was to ride a motorbike out to the home of a car owner whose bus needed service, fasten the motorbike to the back of the car and drive back to the agency. This all happened before the war, you dig. This gave him a taste for handsome automobiles; an appetite that he intends to gratify when a person can once again purchase a long, low, super-souped-up mechanical job.

After working all day, he liked to go down to the gym at night and work out. Gradually he got into the habit of putting on the gloves and going a few rollicking rounds with one of his friends. Bystanders began to comment upon how well he handled himself. "Hot right hook," they said. And, "That left is strictly from slumber."

Dick got the idea that an occasional go in the preliminaries at one of the Hollywood arenas might be a satisfactory way of adding to his bank account . . . in addition to keeping him out of the "Sinew Went Away" class. He inquired here and there and was given reluctant answers. The prelim boys who had seen him work out didn't care much to waltz a few with him on canvas.

One day the manager of a boy who had done pretty well in his first few fights approached Dick and asked how about it? "They tell me that you've never had a pro fight, but that you're spoiling for one and you look good."

So Dick, feeling elated over his forthcoming prowess (he hoped) as a leather-pusher, went home, told his mother and ate a hearty dinner complete with a steak as heavy as his boxing gloves.

His mother looked at him unhappily. "Oh Dick, please be careful—for my sake." And she added, "This time I won't be in the stands to watch you."

"Don't worry about me, Mom," he grinned. "One—two, the fight's through. Three, four, he'll want no more."

The first thing that bothered him when he climbed into the ring, was the smoke. Walking down the chute, crawling under the ropes and making one's way to the corner was like trying to break through a series of giant spider webs. The stuff hung in clusters, making Dick's eyes smart and his eyes burn. Excitement was thick in his throat. He blinked against the hot, blinding lights; he had never dreamed they would be so brilliant.

courage and confusion . . .

All around him were crowd noises. The roar of voices, the shouts of vendors, the scraping and shuffling of thousands of feet. The loud speaker blared Dick's name so he went to the center of the ring where he shook hands with the big-muscled, hard-jawed man who was his opponent. The referee recalled the rules. The bell rang.

Dick felt swell. He came out alertly and on his toes. He sparred, conscious of the nimbleness of his foot work. Just then a ramrod shot out and opened Dick's cheek. It made him mad all the way to the canvas. He swung hard. It landed with a snap of leather upon flesh. The other guy's head snapped back. He went down with a grunt. And Dick, too surprised to move, stood there wasting precious seconds staring down at the sweat-covered head slowly shaking itself.

After that nothing was very clear to Dick. He remembered being against the ropes, upright and angry because the ropes were burning his back. It didn't occur to him to resent the punishment his face and body were taking. He was having trouble seeing out of that left eye, and his mouth kept bleeding. The bell rang. He sat down. The bell rang. He stood up.

Time went on. The smoke grew thicker. It was a fog now—impenetrable. Faces beyond the ropes were a surf upon a dark sea. The sea spoke in a rumbling voice, it said, "Stop da fight. Ya wanna kill that kid. He's game. He'll fight 'till he drops. Stop da fight."

Dick was astonished. He felt fine. He floated. He knew no pain. The referee separated Dick and the bleeding pug. Dick tried to say something, but his puffed lips trembled away from words. He was astonished that, when he tried uncertainly to leave the ring, there was applause. How come? He had lost. He knew because he had heard that over the loudspeaker; yet the surf and the dark sea boomed with approval. Funny.

Somehow he got to the dressing room where he was rather thoroughly sick. The medico patched him up and said he'd get over the sense of confusion and chaos after some sleep.

So Dick went home. His mother was waiting for him. She looked at him and started to cry. "Oh, your poor eye!" she said, but she didn't scold. She didn't tell him that he could never do that again. "You're a man, Dick, so you have to make your own decisions about things like this," she said, turning her head away because she couldn't bear the pain of seeing him so battered.

Dick never went into a pro arena again. After that his sparring was done strictly in fun with men he knew.

He had always been crazy about movies, so it occurred to him one day that the motion picture business might not be a bad racket for an ambitious young man. He went up to the Bliss-Hayden Theater and enrolled. Luck kissed him on the forehead and arranged for a Metro talent scout to see the first play in which Dick had the lead. The next thing he knew, he was working in "Susan And God" with Joan Crawford and Fredric March. Dick had the part of their daughter's boy friend. Miss Crawford was charming; she was generous with camera angles and gave him several tips on timing.

From a drawing room comedy of manners, he leaped lightly into a Hopalong Cassidy picture. He had done some "military" riding in an Army training short, so he thought he could make friends with the local horses. What he didn't calculate upon was the difference between a military and a Western saddle. He was told that in one scene he was to take his horse over a jump.

The horse had other ideas. The next scene revealed Mr. Richard Crane lying flat on his back on the grassy sward while the horse loped calmly away, uttering derisive sounds.

This caused Mr. Crane to return to the automotive industry for a time. Through a friend who was a mechanic, Dick was sent to the office of Bert Morris, one of the town's most perspicacious agents. That did it. The next thing Dick knew, he had a thriving career sprouting faster than devil grass in a victory garden.

Comes now romance. Not too serious a romance, you understand, but a nice pleasant companionship that makes the moon rest her head on the hill's dark shoulder. While in Bert Morris' office one day, Dick observed a beautiful girl who was also a Morris client. Name: Kay Morley.

That was eleven months ago, and they are still going steady.

When Dick moved into lodgings that used to be a guest house on an estate in Laurel Canyon, Kay added the deft womanly touches to the furnishings. She pointed out lonely spots on the walls that cried for pictures. She went shopping with him and helped to select scatter rugs and draperies. Then she moved into the kitchen department.

cooks Kay and Crane . . .

Seems that Dick planned to prepare his own breakfast each morning. Only catch was that he didn't want to live on toast, and that was the only recipe he had memorized. So Kay taught him how to prepare a fresh tomato omelet the like of which would make Henry VIII drool even after a duck dinner. She also taught him how to make GOOD coffee.

When Dick entertains guests for dinner, which is often, he broils the steaks (Crane Specialty when he has the points), but he leaves the planning and preparation for all other items of the dinner, strictly up to Kay.

For Dick's birthday, Kay gave him a white Maltese Terrier named Muffins. Muffins wasn't secured from a swanky kennel nor from the litter of a hoity-toity registered private family. She came from the city pound. Kay had noticed an article in a Los Angeles newspaper, describing the available dogs and stressing their need for homes — otherwise they were faced with destruction. So she drove down and selected the most ingratiating animal available.

Not for several weeks did Dick suspect that his gift was not on solo flight. He looked at Muffins fixedly and decided that she was carrying quite a crew. Clearly the small dog house with which his back yard was equipped would not be adequate housing for the future. "As soon as my back gets better," he told Muffins, "I'll build you a barracks." He had sprained his back while bowling. A masseur, an osteopath and a chiropractor had been unable to return one particular vertebra to its proper groove.

Muffins became more uncomfortable by the hour, and so did Dick. Finally he decided that Muffins' problem was greater than his own, so he started to build a canine apartment house. And just to prove that kindness to animals pays: As Dick leaned down to pick up the hammer, his cranky cog snapped back into place.

Muffins promptly presented him with five puppies. Scandalous fact: two of white Muffins' puppies are coal black.

So serious are Dick and Kay (who is a Goldwyn Girl) about their careers that they frequently spend evenings reading plays aloud. They like the highly dramatic one-acters frequently used in little theaters, and they register emotions enough to burst the canvas off hermetically sealed wings.

This attention to business has stood Dick in good stead because he has made tremendous strides in a short time. While "Wing And A Prayer" was being filmed, Dick was scheduled to do a difficult scene early one morning. He knew that he was letter perfect in his lines, and he thought he had accomplished a good characterization. Under the brilliant lights he went through rehearsal. Then the director called, "This will be a take." The cameras ground. Dick gave. As a precaution the director had two long shots made, then closed in for the close-ups.

When it was over, Dick emerged from the scene in time to see the production head of the studio walking away. "Was he here all the time?" he gasped.

"Sure was. And he seemed pleased."

You will be, too, when you get acquainted with the work of a great actor and a nice guy named Crane.

SIXTEEN'S OKAY

Shirley likes to work. Not that she'd pine away otherwise, she's not the piney type. Besides, she's crazy about Westlake, and when you're working, you have to go to school on the set. If you gave her the choice, she'd make it half-and-half, the way it was this year.

She and Mary Lou had loads of fun on "Since You Went Away." Mary Lou Isleib's been her stand-in for ages, and one of her very best friends. At first Mary Lou kept pretty busy writing letters to a certain sailor, and Shirley was supposed to help. Only she did more kibetzing (the Temple version of kibitz) than helping. Anyway, it didn't matter, because Mary Lou kind of lost interest in the sailor, poor dear.

They did quite a lot of giggling, which was rather hard on the others who'd sometimes look pained. But it must be a disease at sixteen that you can't do very much about. For instance, Jennifer had to kiss Joseph Cotten, and he came off with lipstick all over him. Well, who wouldn't laugh? Of course she'll admit they didn't have to yell, "Yah! Yah! Joseph got kissed!" That was more like ten maybe, but you get a relapse now and then.

Monty Woolley was the one who really broke Shirley up. Once she was supposed to be feeding a turtle in the bathtub and looking up at him wide-eyed. Mr. Woolley, not the turtle. He was standing out of the scene, and when she looked up, he was making this horrible face at her, and she burst out laughing. Naturally the director got peeved. Probably rued the day he ever got Monty Woolley and Shirley Temple together—

And another thing. Mr. Woolley had this accomplishment. He could talk without moving his beard, so nobody knew he was talking but the person right next to him. They'd be in a scene together, and out of this perfectly quiet beard would come some quaint remark, and no matter how hard she tried not to, she'd simply explode. The director thought she was just being silly, for which she can't blame him—

She'd try to get back at Mr. Woolley by singing "Mairzy Doats" just before he went into a scene. That worked at first, because he couldn't fathom it, and he couldn't stand it, but it grew on him the way it does on most people, and by the end of the picture he was singing it himself. He's an awfully nice man—hooky pays off . . .

Then the picture was finished, and they went to Palm Springs for a vacation, and all of a sudden "I'll Be Seeing You" popped up. The studio called them Saturday morning and said to come right back, not even to go home first. They thought it must be retakes, but when they got to Mr. O'Shea's office, he said it was a part in "I'll Be Seeing You," and they called wardrobe and make-up, and she did a test with Ginger Rogers, and they gave her a script, and she started working the next Tuesday. That was really a surprise. In "I'll Be Seeing You" she's seventeen—quite a difference from fourteen in "Since You Went Away." She plays Miss Rogers' cousin, and Miss Rogers plays a girl who has to go to jail because a man got fresh, and she pushed him away and he fell out of a window. It wasn't her fault that the window happened to be low—

Then, when "I'll Be Seeing You" was finished, Shirley went back to Westlake. From what happened a week or so later, you might think she wasn't glad to go back. But she was, she's always glad to go back. Only it happened to be a very beautiful day, and Shirley and this other girl got to school a little late—after chapel had started. They stood in plain sight at the door for a minute, and then they just couldn't bear it—the day was so beautiful, and besides, they had a sick friend in Westwood and felt sorry for her. So they turned around and headed for Westwood. On the street, Shirley wears dark glasses. It's a kind of disguise.

They found their sick friend able to sit up, so they went out again and bought her some nourishment—chocolate cake and cookies and a bottle of milk—which made her feel even better. Then they ambled back to school, conversing about things in general and ditching in particular—

"We missed a big English test."

"Yes, that was pretty foolish."

"Think they'll know we ditched?"

"Maybe not—" Shirley stopped short. "My goodness, of course they'll know. We just stood right there in the chapel door, that's all—with just about two hundred and fifty girls staring right at us!"

"That means we'll be reported!"

"Then we'd better go report ourselves first."

So they wrote a letter to the principal, and got called up in front of the student council—my, that was embarrassing. They had to stay in school three extra hours, and they got points off all over the place, and Shirley drew a conclusion. Ditching's not worthwhile—not when they catch you.

puppy dog tales . . .

At home things are pretty much the same, except she has a new Peke—Ching Two. When the first Chingie died, she thought she'd never want another, but after a while she did. The kennels sent out a white one and a blonde one, and the blonde came running up and jumped into Shirley's lap, so naturally that's the one she took. The white one was a little bit too sophisticated for her, anyway—he sort of sat and looked down at everybody.

The nice thing about Two is, she's so sociable. Ching One never looked at Shirley very much, but Two never stops looking at her—even sits on a chair in the dressing room and watches her comb her hair. She's glamorous, too—especially round the ears, which have a glamorous flop. And she's a natural blonde, never touches peroxide. Of course all her blondness is at the wrong end—when they want to photograph her, they have to powder her face to make it show up, it's so black. On top of everything else, she's smart. When Shirley's writing a letter, Ching grabs her arm and shakes it to make her pay attention. If that doesn't work, she climbs into Shirley's lap, and let anyone try to get her out. The way she growls, you'd think she was a Great Dane. . . .

Right now, the parrot's their only other animal, but Shirley more or less ignores him. All he wants to do is fight and talk back, which would be all right if he talked any sense, but it's just idle chatter. Though sometimes she wonders. Sometimes she and her friends'll be talking, and Polly'll sit there, looking kind of wise and sneery, and she wonders if their talk sounds the same way to him. Could be—

RICHARD JAECKEL—

(See page 53)

Mom wouldn't come right out with it and ask where he'd been. So she prepared the apple pie and the fried chicken quiet like, just the way ordinary Ma's do, the ones without their names in the Blue Book and the Jaeckel fur fortune and the swanky Beverly Hills address. So finally, he told her. He'd been to Mexico. As a trucker. At 6 pesos a day. Which was exactly the sort of thing she'd gotten used to. After he'd finished "Guadalcanal Diary," he hired out to an orange juice bottling concern as a packer, and after "Wing and a Prayer", he became a Maritimer! That was some swap! If Mom would sign the consent papers, he'd do just this last film. Of course, it had taken two months of a steady diet of Mom's pie and a heck of a lot of roughhousing from the JUGS (Just Us Guys) to make him even consider doing it. As one of the fellas said, "If he got paid about 5 bucks a day, betcha he wouldn't be so scared of acting. That guy just doesn't like money!" Which is true. He hates being Hanley Jaeckel the 3rd and having a Chinese houseboy to screw on the caps of those umpteen bottles of lotion. And he doesn't like acting! Doesn't see how come they picked him to do the "Baby Marine," doesn't see how he avoids smelling up the place when he emotes. Unless it's on account of The System. The one he developed whereby he studied every little quirk of every big ham—and then did the exact opposite! Chicken Jake's a Maritimer now down Alaska way, 3 inches taller, a whole year older—and mebbe a little bit flicker hungry, too.

THE LARGEST SELLING DEODORANT

Sundays, they have the same old gatherings, down at the playhouse—with the soda fountain and the phonograph and the fireplace and the duckpin alley. It might start with about six people, and usually goes up to about twelve or fourteen. Then around six they have a buffet supper—salad and cake and milk.

After supper, they dance. Shirley thinks the boys are beginning to wake up. For a while, they just used to rock back and forth, but lately they're turning into very good dancers. She never did care for jitterbugging. Rumbas and sambas are nice, but her true love's a slow foxtrot—with Tommy Dorsey or Freddie Slack or Claude Thornhill playing. And for singers, she'll take Dick Haymes or Johnny Johnston—she thinks he's awfully cute. His "Black Magic" will always be one of her favorites. She can't understand why pieces as pretty as that have to go out so soon. Frankie? Yes. His voice is awfully nice, but she doesn't swoon.

Weeknights she stays home and does her homework—or learns her lines, if she's working. It's funny—she does her homework with the radio on, but the minute she has lines to learn, it gets turned off. Guess that proves she takes work more seriously than school—which she wouldn't care to have broadcast at Westlake. Then she might listen to the radio—especially thrillers like "Suspense" and "Lights Out." Not "Gangbusters" any more—she's outgrown that—though she caught Dad listening one night—

"That's all right," she told him. "You're younger than I am."

Oh yes, and she finally got him interested in gin rummy. He's really a golf man, but he plays with her now and gets rather mad because he doesn't win very often. It's fun to hear him get mad—he growls in his throat just about the way Ching does.

Saturdays she helps Katie in the kitchen. For a while she lost interest in cooking, but now she's all enthused again. Did pretty well on an angel-food cake the other day. How she knows it was good is, the family ate it. Ner, they didn't make a fuss. They don't make a fuss about anything she does—when it's good. When it's bad, they tell her right away, if not sooner. She has more trouble with her family—

Ner, that ner up above is no typographical error. It's Shirley's Er-language, in which okay becomes er-ker and stuff like that. You use it when you want to say something about somebody. At first it drove her family frantic. Mom said it was just about the silliest thing she ever heard, and why didn't Shirley grow up? Then suddenly they all started talking it, only you have to do it very fast to get the right effect, and Shirley's the champ. She can terk abert the fermily erl the terme and they hardly ever know what she's terking about.

To get back to Saturdays though—Johnny always comes over. Johnny's her nephew, and he's getting so cute. You can really do things with him now. For instance, Shirley holds his hands from behind and he walks, kind of wobbling from side to side, then he'll turn and smile at her and golly! you could eat him up. He likes her lipstick, too—puts his hand out and touches it. Or—it just occurred to her—maybe he doesn't like it. Maybe he's trying to get it off—the way Mr. Selznick did—in the "brig" . . .

When she played Brig, Mr. Selznick wouldn't let her wear any make-up, not even powder. She tried to talk him out of it, because fourteens are all different, some of them grow up quite fast. But he said, not in this type of family. He said Brig would be naturally good and not think about powder, no matter how gruesome she looked—

Personally, Shirley uses powder and lipstick. For a while she used pretty dark lipstick—now she can't stand it. No, the family didn't stop her. Their attitude is, if she wants to look awful, that's her own hard luck. She just happened to catch sight of it suddenly in the mirror one day and decided she must have been out of her mind.

She wears her nails natural—doesn't like colored nails on a girl her age. And all she does about her hair is wash it once a week and brush it about three times a day—no special times and no special number of strokes—just when the mood seizes her and until she thinks it's shiny enough. She does love nice shiny hair—

Her usual hairdo is a long bob, with something you could call either a high wave or a low pompadour, depending on whether you like waves or pompadours best. And she simply adores pigtails with ribbons braided in at the end. Hers generally come out cockeyed, but they sure feel cool. Only it was so cold in Los Angeles this summer that mostly she wore it round her neck like a furpiece.

She buys her own clothes now. Mom thinks she's old enough to have the responsibility. But you can't tell the difference; her taste is plain, like Mom's. She can't stand a lot of ruffles. Usually she goes with a couple of the girls and tries something on, and usually they don't like it and usually she does, so she buys it and then they like it—being polite. Lately, Mom did go along once, and they bought a dress she'd never have had the nerve to buy alone—white silk with a cowl neckline and a midriff. Now she hasn't the nerve to wear it—especially after hearing that Gene Tierney had one like it. What if she ran into Gene Tierney, looking so wonderful! My, she'd feel silly—lady in the dark . . .

Jewelry's er-ker, as long as it's pretty inconspicuous. She likes earrings on girls who wear their hair back sleek, but not on herself. She just wears these two thin gold bracelets—one i. d. and one link—and a little forgetmenot ring on her left pinky. No, she'd rather not say whom they came from if it's all the same to you, but if you'd like to know who gave her the anklet, it was Mary Lou.

During vacation, she sees lots of movies. Doesn't care much for historical pictures. Once in a while they're interesting, but on the whole, she avoids them. Still loves horror shows, though they don't scare her any more. Except "The Uninvited." That really gave her goose pimples. There was one part where she and the boy she was with jumped so hard they hit their heads together and both had headaches all the way home. And the minute she got into the garden, she smelt mimosa.

It was funny that night. Two little girls were sitting beside her, and while the news

I SAW IT HAPPEN

We were in the street after Allan Jones' broadcast, when we noticed a taxicab and a motorcycle parked in front of the studio. We waited, thinking that we might see the handsome singing star enter the cab and whirl away with his police escort. In about five minutes Mr. Jones emerged from the building, sat himself down on the motorcycle—and nonchalantly scooted down Seventh Avenue!

was on, they were looking all over the audience. Finally, one of them leaned over and said, "Hey, you know Shirley Temple's in the audience?"

"She is?!" said Shirley. "Well, gosh, I'd like to get her autograph. Why don't you try to find her?"

"I did, but it's so dark you can't see a thing!"

"Look down there. Doesn't that look like Shirley?"

So she walked down the aisle and came back and said, "You must be crazy. That's a lady with gray hair—"

Shirley was having a wonderful time, but after the picture started, it slipped her mind. Then when the lights went on, the girls almost killed her, they were so mad. But she told them she dearly loved a joke and gave them her autograph, so they were nice enough to forgive and forget.

In her spare time, she knits scarfs and afghans squares for soldiers. And writes letters. For her birthday she got quite a lot of stationery, because she has so many friends in the service to write to. She sticks to it pretty faithfully, because they say mail's so important to soldiers.

A few weeks ago she went to San Francisco for a Bond rally. At the Stage Door Canteen they wanted her to make a speech, but she can't give speeches. So she got up and said, "This is certainly a pretty canteen." Later she cut a serviceman's birthday cake on the stage and had a dance with him.

Afterwards, she visited the hospitals. No, there's nothing hard about it. Except when a photographer walks in with you—she thinks that's awful. Sometimes you can't do anything about it, except apologize to the boys and hope they know it's not your fault. But if you go in alone with cigarettes or something and just talk to them—just say anything silly that comes in your head, it's all right. Most of the fellows are cheerful.

One boy did get her down though. The doctor told her beforehand he couldn't live very long, and did she mind going in? He had cute blonde hair and looked terribly young and came from New York, so she said she thought she'd be going to New York soon. "I'll be going back myself pretty soon, they tell me," he said. "Can I show you the town?" And he told her all the places he'd take her to, and if she ever acted in her life, she did that day, because she had to pretend she was all enthused, when really what she wanted was to crawl off in a hole and cry—

After seeing those boys, everything else seemed not important for a while. But life goes on—

For instance, Shirley'll be a senior at Westlake this fall. She'll get to initiate the freshmen. Has it all figured out exactly what she'll do to them—make them bring her flowers and something to eat and carry her books. Goodness, it seems hardly any time since she was a freshman herself. Never will she forget what they did to her. Got her up on the platform and told her to sing "Baby, Take A Bow" the way Shirley Temple used to sing it—

"I never heard Shirley Temple," said Shirley. "How did she sing it?"

So the senior had to show her, and she imitated the senior—which was slightly less foolish than imitating herself.

It's funny—looking back, the time goes so fast—looking forward, it doesn't. Not that Shirley wants to push it—that's the last thing she wants to do. It bothers her to see girls try to act older than they are—pulling out their cigarettes and stuff. There are lots of ages where you can be old and sophisticated, but sixteen only comes once, and what's the sense of trying to get over it quick, as if it were measles As long as she's sixteen, she'd rather be sixteen. Sixteen's the job. After all, he'd been a mere villain-around-Hollywood and a sinister Oriental in a flock of B's, and that's about all, unless you counted the slightly elevated assignments with Maria Montez in "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" and "Arabian Nights." Hepburn knew he'd landed the "Dragon Seed" lead mainly because he looked the part to a T with his slightly slanted eyes, his swell build and the voice that registered like a young Charles Boyer's without the toupee touch.

TURKS ARE NO JERKS

Katie Hepburn's jitters were shared by Director Jack Conway and everyone else on the set that day except Turhan Bey. The only thing that bothered Turhan was whether Hepburn would like him or not. Because, long before he'd ever set his almond eyes on Hollywood, he had tagged her as his dream actress. Once he'd sat through eight straight performances of "Woman of the Year"—just to worship silently at her image. It didn't make sense that he was here in Hollywood, of all places, and about to caress his very best idol for all the world to see in one of her greatest triumphs. But Turhan at twenty-five knows life has many surprises, and his poise was not seriously disturbed. Still he was thrilled.

It was a long scene and a torrid one—about as torrid as Chinese lovers ever get—involving a cross-country kiss starting on Katie's arm and traveling over her shoulder and cheek right up to a shell pink ear. Hepburn had to react all the way, and, like I say, she had built up beaucoup sales resistance.

Well—during the next few minutes after Director Conway whispered "Action!" and the Turk went to work, they say the log turned into a charred cinder, the rice fields withered, and the scorched earth policy brought the M-G-M fire department to Sound Stage 10 with hoses, axes and clanging bells. That's just gossip, of course. But what I know for a fact is that when the scene was over, and Katharine Hepburn had got back her breath, she turned to Turhan Bey and spake thus:

"There isn't any other man in the world who could have played that scene better!"

Which thrilled Turhan Bey from his handsome head right down to his well-traveled toes and sent him scurrying right out—after a discreet hand kiss—to load Hepburn's dressing room with roses from that day on, as Turhan Bey would—but naturally, Madame.

Of course, nobody needs Katharine Hepburn to tell the world that Turhan Bey is something new and special in the Hollywood male lover line. You and you and you discovered that the hard way quite a spell back through a fog of pretty sticky parts wherein he usually got his neck sliced or his hide fried. And those leerings through reels and reels of dirty work obviously has very little to do with love.

Playing Jap rats, Hindu heavies, menaces for Montez and such, is no royal road to Hollywood romance, but just the same Turhan (you pronounce it Toor-hahn, giving both syllables the same break) couldn't ward off the mash notes no matter how much black business he wallowed in. The minute Turhan opened his Turkish trap and let that low velvet voice out, the deed was done; when he gave just a lazy glance into the camera with his sloe eyes, the hypnotics got going, even if Turhan was about to chop the heroine into filet

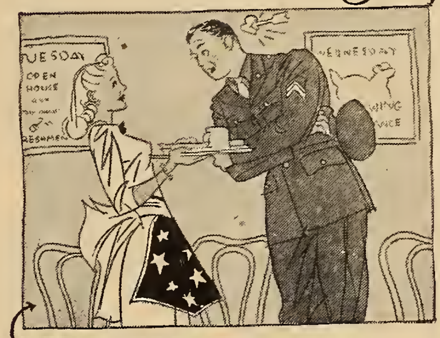
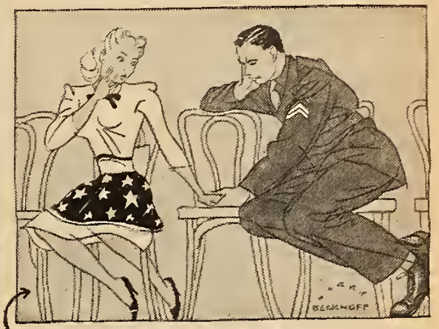
(and get your man)



BOY MEETS GIRL:
"Ever old—ever new... Ah me, love in bloom. Her eyes?—stars! Her hair?—spun gold! Her hands?—tsk, tsk... now we've got a problem, gentle reader. Trouble for our heroine."



GIRL'S GONNA LOSE BOY:
"Soft lights...sweet music...hands meet ...and good-bye romance. No flower-petal softness—her hands suggest a cactus plant. Scratchy, rough, chapped, red."

GIRL GETS WISE:
"Chaps don't like chap. Nor sandpaper roughness, dishpan redness. Emotion needs lotion. Hinds! Because in Hinds there's a special ingredient—the closest thing to the natural oils of your skin!"

GIRL GETS BOY:
"Thrilling hands now. Soft. White. Smooth. Hinds hands! Hands with magic in their touch. Try Hinds, sister, and don't lose any time or you might lose your man!"

with solid backing from the bobby sock brigade to the corset circle, he's "Sailing along on Turhan Bey," as Jack Oakie cracks, panicking the post office with 10,000 or more sweet sentiments a month, set to start next in his own Valentino-esque super-dooper, "The Return of the Sheik" and, as Universal's Oriental Love Dream, proving that Turks are no jerks—definitely.

Of course, Mister Bey is not all Turk. Just on his nobleman father's side. He was born in Vienna, and his mother, who keeps house for Turhan in Hollywood, is a Czech. Tagging Turhan "Mister Bey," by the way, is double talk, just like saying Mister Mister. Because that's what Bey means, roughly, "Mister"—only a very high class mister, which is right and proper because Turhan is very definitely a high class guy. In fact, it's not very often that Hollywood sees a sentimental gentleman quite like him. That's why, startling as his success story is, I'm prepared to skip it. It's Turhan Selahettin Schultavy Bey himself who's out of this Hollywood world.

It's not his looks that dood it; there are plenty prettier boys around Hollywood than Turhan Bey, although he isn't exactly rough on the eyes, either. His head is large and nicely modeled, and his face full with a generous nose and a swell smile that's usually always working unless he's wrapped up in a bad Bey mood. His long hair is blue-black and shiny like silk, and his skin just faintly olive. The eyes are what get you—they're smoky dark, of course, and just tilted enough to suggest the East, but according to Turhan's deadpan explanation, that's more because he got snow-blinded once on an expedition in Siberia, than due to his Oriental blood. Which reasoning makes for to laugh.

His tall body is as ripply-muscled as a swimmer's and graceful as a cat's. But outside his velvet voice and mesmerizing accent, Turhan's championship charms are his personality, his Continental wit, his suave, gracious manner, his unruffled poise and his polish that shines like a cavalry colonel's boots.

Turhan wears all these sophisticated virtues as easily and naturally as a duck wears feathers. Few things are a mystery to him. He understands and knows what's what in fine food, horses, guns, clothes, music, art, languages—and women, too. He likes nothing but the best. He's accustomed to service and luxury, and he admits he's lazy. He's calm and collected in any situation, and the touch of the East in his make-up gives him a fatalistic, sometimes superstitious outlook. He doesn't exactly croak "Kismet" every now and then, but what's to be is to be in his book. And he doesn't tempt Fate.

pieces of luck . . .

For instance, Turhan's nutty about the symphonies at the Hollywood Bowl. When the season ticket sale went on a few weeks ago, he sent his secretary and shadow, Paul Richards, over to get some.

"But don't reserve them in my name," he ordered. Paul wanted to know why not.

"If I counted on being there that far in advance, something would probably happen to me to prevent it." So Paul bought them under a phony name.

Turhan doesn't go in for hocus-pocus charms or anything mystically Oriental, but when he does have a good luck piece he trusts, he clings to it like a bulldog. He doesn't wear exotic jewelry like Rudy Valentino (the star to whom they're always comparing him) did. The only cherished gimmick he sports is a solid gold ring with his family crest. The reason he owns that is because he was warned he couldn't take gold out of Europe. So in Switzerland he had some gold pieces hammered into the ring. But he did acquire a St. Christopher medal, supposed to protect all travelers, here in America, which he promptly fastened to the dashboard of his automobile. He had a few narrow escapes driving across the country to Hollywood, but the St. Christopher carried him through safely every time. So Turhan was sure it was strong medicine.

Then, about a year ago, Turhan saw a car he liked better than the one he had. That's his big weakness, automobiles. He drives a sporty, light gray Lincoln Continental now, which he calls "my second hand Ford." That's because, as a young blade in Europe, he indulged his motor urge to the fullest, and today he has deluxe custom-made buggies sitting in storage (he hopes) in half the cities of Europe. There's a Lancia in Turin, for instance, a Mercedes in Paris and a Rolls-Royce in Vienna that Turhan could certainly use in Hollywood. None of those are exactly flivvers, and Turhan used to cut a fancy figure at the wheel on the boulevards of Europe.

Anyway, when he saw this new car, Turhan promptly traded in his old one and drove it off, forgetting all about the St. Christopher fixed on the trade-in's dashboard. Well, believe it or not, he'd hardly had the new car a day when everything began to happen. Three tires went flat a few miles from Hollywood. Then he skidded off the road and banged the fenders into accordion pleats. For a while Turhan couldn't understand it, then suddenly he knew. The St. Christopher medal wasn't around.

sherlock holmes bey . . .

He rushed down to the used car place. His old car, they said, was gone. Somebody had snapped it up like a pair of nylons on a bargain counter. That didn't daunt the Bey. He pulled a Sherlock Holmes, and even if it did take him a week, he traced the old car and got his good luck medal back. He hasn't had any car trouble since.

Of course, it's just one of the many contradictions of Turhan Bey's existence that he should tote around a St. Christopher medal in the first place. He isn't a Christian, but a Mohammedan, although he doesn't work much at it. In fact, he has been inside a mosque only once in his life—at St. Sophia's in Istanbul, his dad's home town. That was when he was a moppet. Since then he has traveled around so much that Turhan doesn't know what religion he is at heart. But still certain Moslem hangovers grip him. One even threatened to nip his first picture part right in the bud.

That's when Warner Brothers spied Turhan in a Ben Bard School drama and tagged him as the type to play a Hindu servant in an Errol Flynn picture. But when Turhan heard he had to be a Hindu, he said, "No" very firmly. Mohammedans and Hindus just aren't a bit chummy, that's all, and Turhan regarded such a deal as a disgrace. However, in the end they managed to tag the character as some other kind of Indian servant that wasn't too icky for a Moslem to take.

Turhan's movie break, by the way, has been painted as "just a lark." But it wasn't at all. Turhan took a fling at acting when they invited him, not because he wanted to show his mother and grandma that, like the Americans all around him, it was possible for him, too, to earn an honest dollar. Up until that moment, he had never scratched together a dime by his own efforts in his entire life. And that explains much about Turhan Bey today. Why he likes the best that money can buy, why he likes service and leisure and wit and sophisticated surroundings. Because that's all he's had from the time he was in didies. I'll just skim through this briefly to give you a rough idea—only it's not very rough. On the contrary.

Turhan's dad was a Turkish army officer. When baby Bey chose to arrive, Bey, Sr. was stationed in Vienna at the Turkish Embassy as military attaché. Most of Turhan's childhood was spent traveling here and there to the great capitals of Europe—Vienna, Berlin, Paris, Madrid, Petrograd, Budapest and so on.

Schultavy Bey, Sr., wasn't exactly poor. He came from an old aristocratic Turkish family, and when he was in Istanbul, which was rarely, Turhan lived in his father's immense villa "Naschautash" in a suburb of the Turkish city, a giant place spreading over hundreds of acres and boasting more rooms than a resort hotel. Often all the relatives on his father's side parked there, too—an old Turkish custom—and once Turhan remembers fifty cousins, aunts, uncles and in-laws roaming around the mansion all under his father's absolute rule—another Turkish custom.

But if his father was well in the chips, Turhan's mother's side of the house was even more on Easy Street. Her family owned vast holdings in Czechoslovakia, a big hunk of which was a factory manufacturing fine crystal glass. Luckily, before Hitler and his gang marched in, she managed to sell out her holdings. But the point is, as a kid Turhan never knew what money meant. The stuff was always around, and every whim he had was satisfied—whether it was guns, autos, trips or hi-jinks.

Chasing around like he did, exposed to the glamour and intrigue of the élite, Turhan picked up his polish and poise. He never had any formal education, never went to school in his life. Always a private tutor stuck around to teach Turhan his manners, his readin', writin' and arithmetic. They'd change whenever he went to a new capital. So that today Turhan can rattle off French, Spanish, Italian, German and now English—although he didn't know a word of that until he came to America. Oddly enough, he can just barely stumble along in his native Turkish, because the upper crust of Istanbul stuck to French.

forget to remember . . .

Being lousy with lucre, Turhan had his own horses now and then, when he was in a place long enough to have a stable. He got to be slick in a saddle, as he is today. They taught him the Turkish way of putting up his dukes, knife throwing, and while he's a little rusty today, he can still hurl a frog-sticker uncomfortably close when he wants to. Judo and wrestling probably helped develop that streamlined, silky-muscled build he has. It certainly is not the result of any training program. "I'm much too lazy for that," Turhan will confess charmingly. He found himself getting a little chubby about a year ago in Hollywood and signed up for a few workouts at Terry Hunt's. He went to just one workout. Then he forgot to remember to go any more.

Skipping around Europe's capitals gave Turhan a taste for sophisticated living that shows up today. Before he was 16 he learned, for instance, what the right wines were and how to order in a half dozen languages. Today he's a gourmet supreme. He'll make tracks clear across town just to discover some restaurant where a sauce is right on the beam. Russian Bublichiki's, the Villa Nova Italian restaurant and an obscure Turkish spot in Los Angeles are among his favorite lunch stands. He keeps a Turkish coffee pot, a brass and silver thing, in his studio dressing room to brew the dark strong stuff that can float a fleet of battleships and knock out an uninitiated American with one cup.

Turhan doesn't drink any more—not a drop—but when he was a young boulevardier in Europe he took a turn at the vin rouge. He used to smoke strong Turkish cigarettes, too, but he gave that up and sticks to pipes now. The reason for this and his slowed-down athletic life, too, is an overstrained heart he got somewhere or other, possibly from looking at Parisian bright lights too long in his youth.

Of course, it wasn't all fun and frolic that Turhan Bey grew up on. His mother, separated from his father, was sensible about getting him exposed to good sense, and at twenty-one Turhan knew his history, science and politics, being surrounded by the last all his young life. He and his mother both were able, by the way, to see the war coming in Europe and make tracks for the Land of the Free in time. One of Turhan's serious interests tipped him off early about German plans for world fireworks, too. That was when he trekked off on an expedition to Siberia—financing most of it himself, too—supposedly to uncover archeological secrets. A German professor headed the junket, and it turned out he was more interested in uncovering deposits of iranium for war-making purposes than he was in the bones of extinct mammals! At one time in his life Turhan worked up a big interest in uncovering ancient ruins and relics, going once into Tibet and another time digging all around Egypt and India. He was never any mere addle-headed young playboy, even if he did like his fun where he found it.

no time for money . . .

You might think all that wealth and easy upbringing would have spoiled Turhan like milk in July and made him so money conscious that he'd vibrate every time a dollar bill went by. However, outside of giving him an absolutely charming courtliness of manner and worldly wisdom, the damage from the first is absolutely negligible, and as for money—the guy just doesn't consider the stuff worth setting a match to. It's nice, of course, but he just can't be bothered about it.

For instance, last year Turhan paid his income tax without claiming a single deduction! He has pushed all mere money matters off on his secretary, Paul Richards. He'll even take Paul along when he's going to have an expensive evening, just so Paul can pay the check, a tiresome act which distresses Turhan immeasurably. Paul has talked him into an allowance by now, because with that auto weakness of his, Turhan was quite likely to stroll down Hollywood Boulevard for some pipe cleaners and come back with a couple of motor cars he fancied. But Turhan's disdain of heavy sugar can't really be cured. He vetoed all involved investment plans to get rich the minute his salary went up to respectable figures. He told Paul just to pay all the bills—without bothering him with them, please—and to sock all the rest in War Bonds.

On top of this high scorn of riches, Turhan is generous to a fault. When he first lit on the Universal lot, he caused a mild sensation by practically stripping himself naked every time somebody paid him a compliment. First off, a casual acquaintance admired a lovely gold and ostrich-skin cigarette case he was toting.

"You like it?" beamed Turhan. "Then please accept it." And he slipped it in the astonished guy's coat pocket. Next someone who wasn't hep at all, complimented him on a wrist watch. Off it came. Gloria Jean made the mistake of praising a Paisley scarf Turhan wore. He promptly untied it and put it around her neck. He dished out pipes, ties, coats—everything anyone happened to compliment. By now

Mrs. Alexander Williams Biddle

Two distinguished American families dating back to Colonial times were united when Elizabeth Onderdonck Simms married Alexander W. Biddle. There is aristocracy about Mrs. Biddle's looks, too—her complexion is so delicate, her care of it so fastidious. "I have a 1-Minute Mask with Pond's Vanishing Cream regularly—three or four times a week," she says. "The Mask has a genius for making my skin look clearer, fresher—and even lighter!"

Mrs. Biddle is devoted to the 1-Minute Mask with Pond's Vanishing Cream

How to make your skin look fresher and smoother

First—Cover your face generously—except near the eyes—with cool, silky Pond's Vanishing Cream.

Time this Mask—leaving on one minute for the cream's "keratolytic" action to work. Then tissue off.

Unflattering, powder-catching little roughnesses and stubborn dirt particles are loosened and dissolved!

You can't help being impressed with this quick-time complexion re-styling! The "most perfect" skin looks even clearer, feels softer. And make-up goes on so smoothly!

Of course, you know Mrs. Biddle and other society beauties use Pond's Vanishing Cream as a make-up base, too! Just smooth a very light film over your skin—and leave it on.

IMPORTANT! Conserve glass, manpower—buy one large jar of Pond's instead of several smaller ones.

the studio hired help have learned not to build up anything the Bey wears, or they'll find themselves with it in their hands, embarrassed and protesting while Turhan purrs happily, "But I want you to have it!"

Turhan's the thoughtful type as well as being generous—especially when he's entertaining a girl friend. He never takes a girl out for the first time without sending her a present the next day and always one that's personal, exactly in the right taste, and top quality. First time he took out Susanna Foster, she got an album of symphony records. After Ramsay Ames had dinner with him, a messenger brought her her favorite perfume—how Turhan knew that she never guessed until she realized he'd sniffed it on her and being the old smoothie he is, recognized what it was at once. Turhan has given out with first editions, lovely jewelry and all kinds of nice things to various ladies he has squired. Hepburn's roses, by the way, were nothing sentimental. They were just a tribute—the kind that Turhan Bey invariably makes.

In fact, one thing that baffles and enrages him is Hollywood's habit of suggesting romance when he's seen anywhere with a lady. Turhan rebels at the bad taste it shows and gets sore as a boil. When some gossiper suggested that there was a rivalry over him between Ramsay Ames and Katharine Hepburn, Turhan blew up. "That's not only absurd," he stormed, "it's malicious." He's touchy as all get-out that way. He was raised to consider all affaires de coeur strictly private matters. Even when his secretary makes the arrangements for an evening, ordering theater tickets or night club reservations, he doesn't dare ask who the lady is to be. If he does, Turhan growls, "None of your business."

wall around nothing . . .

This gallant crochet, of course, has pushed Turhan Bey right into the role of a mystery man in Hollywood, which insists on knowing every muscular, mental and moral move of its stars, from breakfast to midnight. Actually, there's nothing at all mysterious about the Bey. Nor is he the stand-offish, snooty gent he's been cracked up to be. That rep came about because once or twice Turhan has refused bids to big Hollywood parties, simply by saying, "I don't feel like going." When he says that he means it. He hates parties and chit chat, gossip and small talk. He doesn't like big crowds, he doesn't like to be chummy with people he doesn't know, and he hates to be stared at. He won't attend premieres or even his own previews. He has a few pals in the picture business—Bob Lewis, dialogue director on "Dragon Seed," for instance, and Arthur Lubin, who really discovered Turhan, but most of his chums are Turkish students and European emigrés settled in Los Angeles or other Continentals he has known abroad driven here by the war. Turhan admits he's not the most sociable guy in the world, and he would rather be flayed alive than talk about himself, but there's nothing mysterious about him. In fact, he'll grin, "People say I have a wall of reserve. But what they don't know is that there's nothing behind the wall!"

One of Turhan's walls of reserve is his home in Los Angeles, where he lives with his 80-year-old grandmother and mother, a handsome and extremely chic woman. They bought it about four years ago, after coming to California to live, without any thought that Turhan would end up in the movies.

How that came about was by purest chance, but like most everything else in Turhan Bey's life, it stems from his Continental capers. He was in Paris living at the Grand Hotel right before the blitz when a young American doctor at the same hotel was looking for someone to show him the sights. The sights of Paris were right down Turhan's alley, so they did the town and the doctor was impressed. He said, "You know, you ought to be in the movies. You look like Rudolph Valentino." That phrase makes Turhan sore as a wet owl these days, because he hates to think he's a carbon copy of anybody—and he isn't at all. But at that time it flattered him a little, and he and his mother were already thinking about coming to America anyway. They could sniff the tough times that were bound to strike sooner or later in France. So the doctor gave Turhan a note to a friend of his who later turned out to be Arthur Lubin, a big shot director at Universal Studios.

However, at that time, Turhan didn't bother to look at the name or address. He was interested in seeing America and that was all. He'd seen about everything else, and there wasn't any future for him back in Turkey because he'd had a spat with his father, and he'd been around so much he didn't feel very Turkish anyway. So he soon found himself in New York, unable to speak a word of English and with plenty of no plans. He just hung around feeding the squirrels in Central Park, sitting in Translux newsreel movies and crooking his neck at the tall buildings until he got hold of a Chrysler convertible. Then the Beys went up to New Hampshire for the summer and planned to go to Florida for the winter season. But some Chamber of Commerce Californian they met got hold of them first. He said Florida was a place something like Devil's Island, whereas California was the garden spot of the world, with beautiful bathing beauties all over the place and hot and cold running orange juice in every room. As for climate—the Californian burst into tears of ecstasy as he warmed up on that subject. Climate was exactly what Turhan's mother was looking for at that point, so they set out right away, driving cross-country, and when they saw Hollywood, they liked it so much they bought their house the first week.

About the only problem Turhan had on his mind when he arrived was to learn to speak English. So, to learn the name of a good teacher, he dug out his doctor friend's letter and called up Arthur Lubin, who steered him on to Ben Bard's drama school as a good place to get glib with American as she is spoke, and have fun, too. Pretty soon Turhan was intelligible enough to act in a Playhouse production—a weird part it was, of course, one of those exotic roles, but that was practically required with the thick accent he had then.

That's when the Warners' scout saw him and offered him $350 a week to play the Hindu. Turhan got such a kick out of actually earning a salary and had such fun with Errol Flynn, Alan Hale, Director Lloyd Bacon and the Warner gang of jokesters that he thought studios must be all right. Of course, Arthur Lubin took a peek at the picture and agreed with his doctor friend that Bey was future box-office. Lubin had a talk on his hands at Universal about signing up a Turk, but fortunately the studio was going in heavy for all sorts of jungle and Oriental epics, so that's how Turhan got his contract. And because Sabu is in the Army and because M-G-M thought enough of Turhan to trade Gene Kelly and several thousand bucks for his work in "Dragon Seed," you're going to see him starred next in "Return of the Sheik."

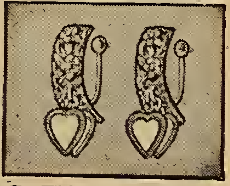
NEW True-Love and Friendship RING and Matching EARRINGS



PENDANT HEART DESIGN

What makes both the ring and the matching earrings so unusual and attractive is the twin, Sterling Silver Pendant hearts that dangle daintily like sentimental and charming settings. Either the ring or earrings can be worn separately but together they are truly captivating. The precious Sterling Silver ring is extra wide. Both the ring and earrings are beautifully embossed with the very newest "Forget-Me-Not" design with two pendant hearts suitable for engraving initials of loved ones.

$1.95 EACH

Send No Money

Your package sent immediately and you pay postman only $1.95 each plus a few cents mailing cost and 20% Federal Tax for either the ring or earrings on arrival. Wear 10 days on money-back guarantee.

GIVEN FOR PROMPTNESS

If you order BOTH the Ring AND Earrings and send your order PROMPTLY. Beautiful, genuine leather photo folder. (Comes with pictures of two popular Movie Stars.)

course, but also a faint yawn. He thinks it amusing that people call him an actor when no one he ever knew before was called that. He guesses it's just Fate and lets it go at that. But he refuses to change his mode of living to accommodate a fame he didn't ask for.

That mode is what galls the press agents and snoopers in Hollywood—because if you believe Turhan, absolutely nothing at all happens. Few picture people indeed get inside his home, and since he won't step out to picture parties, the story is that he's a quiet operator.

"The truth is," Turhan will insist again, "that I'm just lazy." There's no argument there. For instance, he's probably the hardest person in the world to wake up. Alarm clocks do no good whatever. His mother has to come in and shake him. He likes to take it easy around his house where, in good Turkish custom, Turhan is the Lord and Master, if only the son and grandson. For recreation he used to potter around a lot with photography and had all kinds of expensive European cameras, which he got as official photographer for several of the scientific expeditions he was always ambling off on to Persia or somewhere. He also had a crack collection of guns. But when Uncle Sam went to war, Turhan promptly sold every camera and gun he owned. He was an alien, and he knew it, and he didn't think an alien ought to have any such things around his person. Turhan's still a Turkish citizen and subject, of course, to recall for military service if Turkey decides to take an active part in the war. But even then, maybe they wouldn't want to dress the Bey up in khaki because of that ticklish ticker of his, not that he wouldn't look darned beautiful in any sort of uniform.

As it is, Turhan decks himself out in daring costumes of loud checks and striking color combos that would look horrid on anyone else, but somehow drape him smartly and effectively. Maybe it's because clothes have a way of resting easy and carelessly on his swell build. He goes in for tweeds a lot, and often he'll show up around the lot in a pale lemon turtle neck sweater, a loud checked coat, riding breeches and polished boots. But somehow on him—even without the horse—it looks good. Turhan doesn't ride much any more because he doesn't like riding stable horses. Once one of them tossed him right on his ear when he took a turn around Griffith Park, and when he investigated, Turhan found the horse wasn't fit to be ridden; he had a saddle sore.

Turhan is touchy about his horses, so he has just given it up until he can have his own Arabian charger, like—who is that guy?—oh, Valentino.

That doesn't keep Turhan from striding around town in his riding clothes, however. He good-naturedly takes kidding about his clothes and customs now, being pretty well broken in to American humor. Sugie, Hollywood's famous host of the Tropics Eatery, puts the Bey on the pan when he sees him in boots and spurs. "My Gosh!" Sugie cries for all to hear, when Turhan enters done up pour le cheval, "it's the horseless rider again. Now don't tell me you ride nights and days, too!" Turhan thinks it's very funny now. Although a couple of years ago he'd have scowled and challenged Sugie to dirks at twenty paces or something.

sucker for scents . . .

Actually, he's extremely fastidious about his person. Designs his own shirts, has them specially tailored and has never been known to wear a shirt more than a few hours. He likes tubs, but has got used to American showers and likes to bathe three times a day and shave twice whether he needs it or not. He can grow a wispy moustache that makes him look fresh out of a Doctor Fu Manchu. The Oriental touch to his toilette is that Turhan's a sucker for scents. He daubs himself with cologne before he goes out and perfumes up his hankies. He has all his dress ties made with a special little square patch for his pearl stickpin. His favorite color is green, he hates bulges in his clothes, and he's always puffing a pipe.

If you pay heed to Turhan on the subject of his night life, he's strictly a home boy. He had his twenty-fifth birthday a few weeks ago, and although sometimes he looks about eighteen, sometimes he acts about fifty. He'll casually infer, when you bring up the subject, that all that café playboy business is far, far in the past and, in a slightly jaded voice, dismiss the subject.

He is very close to his mother, who like Turhan, is six feet tall and the epitome of Continental charm. Often they step out to dine, leaving Turhan's black cocker pooch, Keddy, to keep his grandmother company. For a long time the Scheherazade, a night club out next to Beverly Hills on the Sunset strip, was their favorite stepping-out place because of its subdued Continental, intime atmosphere. The Beys—I mean Schultaveys—gab to each other in German or French when they're alone. Considering this, it's a small miracle almost that Turhan can stick in the groove with American slang. But linguistically, he's like a blotter. Always has his ear out for a new station-house nifty, and when he catches it, repeats and cinches it, then beams and cries, "WON-der-ful! WON-der-ful!"

Susanna Foster is one of Turhan's current heartbeats. They met at the studio while making "The Climax" and then "Bowery to Broadway" and have been chumming around on sets and off ever since. That fact, by the way, is one of the nicest tributes Turhan could possibly have. Because Susanna is just about the most independent, outspoken young lady in Hollywood and has no time whatever for the Hollywood wolf pack. Turhan is the only movie actor she'll go out with. And she's my authority for this enlightening fact—that Turhan Bey is the only guy in Hollywood who can "kiss a girl's hand without making her feel silly!"

Turhan refuses to date around. If he goes with a girl, he goes until it p-h-h-ts. He bends over backwards, too, to play absolutely square with the conventions, sometimes to what seems an absurd degree.

For instance, he's a great pal of Jean Pierre Aumont's and also of his wife, Maria Montez, with whom naturally Turhan is very friendly, what with all the Universal thrillers they've made together, the newest one being, incidentally, "Queen of the Nile." Turhan used to see a lot of the Aumonts when Jean Pierre was in Hollywood. But the minute he left to rejoin the Fighting French, Turhan hasn't been out to the house nor taken Maria out. It's just not done in his book of rules.

There are a million little things about the Terrible Turk that make him a very rare bird indeed to be found nesting in the Holly-woods. Maybe after he's around a while longer, he'll slip more into the mould and become just another movie star. But right now he's out of this world, and it's a shame if he doesn't stay right there.

On the last day of "Dragon Seed" retakes, it came time for Turhan to say farewell to Katharine Hepburn, whom he unashamedly calls "the most exciting woman I have ever met." Said Turhan frankly, "You know, Katharine, I feel very upset. This is the last day of shooting, and I don't know you one bit better than I did the first day of the picture."

To which Katie replied, "I was just about to say the same thing to you!"

LOTION LORE

SHINY-PUSS—Suppose you're dated up for a football game on a blustery afternoon. You don't want your nose to turn glossy after the first quarter. Neither do you want it to look red and frostbitten as the final whistle blows. Well, then, simply pat a certain all-weather lotion on your face before you step out. This lotion acts as a make-up base and chap-preventive, too. See if you don't pick up a rep for long-term outdoor glamour.

HOUSEKEEPER HANDS—When your hands fly from dishpan to dustrag to wash basin, they deserve special attention. After every sudsing, sleek a lotion over your roughened paws. It will restore the oil to your parched skin and keep your hands looking lovely as a bride's.

AFTER-SHAVE RASH—Dad knows how lotions soothe his prickly skin after a close shave, and you can profit by his experience, too. Swoosh a cool, fragrant lotion over your legs after you've de-fuzzed them. Don't give skin irritations a chance to crop up.

PINK ELBOWS— Pink's high style this season, but not for elbows. If your funny bones are in the sandpaper class, rest them in halves of lemons for fifteen minutes. This will bleach 'em back to normal. Then apply lotion generously to soften them up for exhibition.

GREASE SPOTS—If you've been clutching a monkey wrench on the assembly line, your hands have often looked drenched in licorice. For you, there's a special "beforehand" lotion that will make your cleansing chore easier. Apply it generously before you start work. It will act as a buffer substance so that grime and grease can be soaped off in a jiff when you're finished.

PUMP BUMPS— "Ouch!" you mutter. Sure sign those heel-hazards are rubbing you the wrong way again. Here's what to do. Night and morning massage a milky, softmaking lotion into those pesky calluses until they eventually fade into nothingness. Before you put on your shoes, dust some powder on the heel of your stockings to minimize friction and discourage the appearance of more little bumps.

TO SUM UP—Surround yourself with lotions, fair lady, strategically located in places you most frequent. Don't overlook the shelf just above the kitchen sink or the cabinet over the bathroom washbasin —they rate a bottle, too. A smart gal will keep one discreetly tucked away in her bottom drawer at the office. The accompanying rave notices will be just about as smooth as you will be.

LIKE TO BE IN DE HAVEN'S SHOES?

We can't quite manage that, but we can tell you how you can literally step into her clothes. Take a look at page 48, and see if you wouldn't give a couple of eye teeth to fancy yourself up in dresses exactly like the ones Gloria's wearing. HURRAY FOR LIPSTICK carrot tops and bronzed brunettes are more fetching in tawny, orange lip tones.

APPLICATION TRICKS Once you've decided upon your pet color, how are you going to apply your lipstick to look your prettiest? One thing, says Joyce, you certainly won't do: That is, stab at yourself with a lipstick in the general direction of your mouth and hope that the finished product will suggest Hedy Lamarr.

For the natural effect the boys are clamoring for, take time to do a good job. The trick is to keep your mouth composed and bright, no matter how many boys you kiss good-by, regiment by regiment. Thickly smeared lipstick that leaves a flaming imprint on coffee cups, glasses of "Pepsi" or uniform collars is strictly taboo. Another thing the darlings don't like to see is a red-dyed fingertip. If you use your pinkie as a lip-rouge spreader, be sure to clean it thoroughly.

The correct procedure in Hollywood or Hoboken is to begin every lip-painting job with a perfectly clean mouth. First apply cream to help remove old lipstick. Use a soft cleansing-tissue to wipe away both cream and stale make-up. Tissues are handy to carry in your purse and leave a nice, fresh surface to decorate with lip art.

Now for the lipstick outline. If you feel that Nature has slipped up when it came to creating your mouth, do something about it! Design a new one that flatters the rest of your features. If your mouth is a thin slash, bring your lip rouge out to the extreme edge. If your mouth is a bit too generous for your peace of mind, work well within the natural outline. Only thing you have to avoid is imposing a square Bette Davis form on your own rosebuds, if they're the full, curving Rita Hayworth type.

Take a tip from Joyce and use a lip pencil or brush to draw the perfect mouth. Fill in your deftly drawn outline with lipstick and carry the color well beyond the point where your two lips meet in order to avoid any abrupt dividing line. For a longer-lasting job, powder your lips and allow the powder-impregnated color to set for a moment. Flick off the excess powder with a tissue and apply a second layer of listick. Blot with a folded tissue, and you'll have an indelible "mouth" that will defy the inroads of the hottest coffee.

PROTECTION PLUS In the daytime, be sure your lips are protected with lipstick or lip pomade, because exposure to the elements makes them chapped and rough. Joyce is particular about this. Until she was fifteen, she lived in Texas where the elements can be pretty brutal. To keep your lips always in the pink of condition, apply a soothing lotion or cream every night before resting your weary head on the pillow. This simple care will prevent harsh, cracked lips. And, of course, you know that lipstick itself is a protective against the elements!

Before signing off until December, I have more news. The return of a reasonably priced, quality metal compact after an absence of several years! There are such smooth numbers as "cocktail hour," "pinwheel" and "parade." With that happy thought about compacts (metal ones!) I'll say good-by.

Your letters have been piling in. All I can say is . . . keep them coming! If you have any puzzler, from what shade of rouge to use to how your tresses should be worn, I'll be glad to help. Write to: Carol Carter, Beauty Editor, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

"My career is glamour" says enchanting DANA JENNEY

"Being a Cover Girl is a dream job"—says alluring, successful Dana Jenney. "But I have to be right down to earth about keeping exquisite under the torrid heat of photographers' 1000-watt lamps.

"So I was thrilled when I found a deodorant that really did keep my underarms dry—Odorono Cream! I can trust it under the most trying conditions. It's a wonderful way to keep freshness from wilting—and a perfect safeguard for the expensive dresses and furs I model.

"Every girl will like the things I like about Odorono Cream. First, it contains a really effective perspiration stopper that closes the tiny underarm sweat glands and keeps them closed up to 3 days! That's why it ends perspiration nuisance so satisfactorily.

"It's safe for fabrics too—just follow directions. And you can tell it contains soothing emollients because it's non-irritating even after shaving.

"Another thing—each jar gives you up to 21 more applications for 39¢ than other leading deodorants—a war stamp saving.

"Won't you try velvety, fragrant Odorono Cream—see if you don't agree with me and other Cover Girls that it's a marvelous help in guarding precious glamour!"

GOOD NEWS

"hair-do" at the premiere of "Dragon Seed." Her hair is now decidedly pink in color, and she had red do-dads (that's all I can think to call them) dangling from her coiffure.

Alexis Smith told me a cute thing about the way her romance with her bridegroom, Craig Stevens, started. "You're responsible," she laughed. "You printed in your column that Craig and I, who had never met at the time, had had dinner together.

"The next night he called me up and said, 'Do you like Louella Parsons?'

"I said, 'of course'.

"'Well,' he laughed, 'you had better have dinner with me tonight unless you want to make an awful liar of her'."

Robert Walker came over to my house for dinner and did an awful lot of talking about Diana Lynn. The funny part of it is he has never met her. Just a fan. "She looks like an awfully nice gal," Bob said, "I wonder if she would like to have a date with me. Maybe dinner and a picture show?"

I couldn't let that good opening pass. So the next day I called Diana and told her what Bob had said. "Would I like a date with him?" she laughed, "What girl wouldn't?"

But the sequel is even funnier. In spite of my fine matchmaking, Bob still hasn't gotten his courage in hand to ask her.

When Bob Hope's plane was forced down in the South Pacific, and two cases of whiskey had to be tossed overboard—well, that was just too much for his pal, Bing Crosby, to let pass unnoticed. These two devote half their lives to ribbing each other.

The day after the story hit the front pages, Bing sent Bob the following cable:

"Would send condolences on the loss of your hair tonic and joke book, but cannot condone carrying such contrabands. I'm on the road to Berlin with a good cast. You're on the road to Tokyo with pretty good talent. What odds do you lay—who gets there first? Your guide and mentor—CROSBY."

wanted to sit down on the floor and laugh and cry.

She's haunted by a crime she committed at the age of nine. A little boy proposed to her on the sunporch of a hospital. He had a bank, and people who came to see him put money into it. So when he asked her to be his girl, she said, "all right, if you'll give me your bank." He said, "All right, if you'll give it back when I go home." He went home first and forgot to ask for it, and she forgot to remind him. On purpose. She knew she was being awfully bad, but wasn't it wonderful to have that beautiful bank and all that money! Now she'd like to find the little boy. Maybe they could figure out how much she owes him.

He was her last beau for years. In high school the boys never asked her to go out. She was little and thin and had no sex appeal. Not till she was playing in "Best Foot Forward" did she have a real beau. They were even engaged for a while, but nothing came of it. He was the nicest boy. Used to tell her what to do and not to do, like "You shouldn't drink." Of course she didn't drink anyway, but she let him go right on telling her, it made him feel so good.

She attributes her success to everything but herself—to Fred Astaire's dancing, Betty Hutton's measles, George Abbott's kindness, wonderful Joe Pasternak, and an accident that all but killed her at the age of nine.

She was on a bike playing cops and robbers with the kids when a big beat-up old tree, loosened by a thunderstorm the night before, kind of fell apart on top of June and Teddy—her French poodle who was racing alongside. For a week, they thought she wouldn't live. For months, they thought she wouldn't walk again. For five years she wore a brace on her back. As recently as three years ago, when she danced in the chorus, her legs would sometimes buckle and down she'd go. The other kids laughed and called her clumsy. She laughed back and said, "I sure am." She didn't want them feeling sorry for her. There was nothing to feel sorry about. She was doing fine.

growing pains . . .

The accident happened in Westchester, where she lived with her grandmother, because her mother and dad were separated, and mother worked in New York. All she kept asking about, when her senses came back, was Teddy. Mother finally told her he'd been hurt so badly that they'd thought it best to send him to heaven with the other little dogs. That was her first great sorrow. She still carries Teddy's picture around with her.

When she was 12, her grandmother died, and June went to New York to live with Mother in a little cold-water flat under the elevated tracks. Their only heat came from the kitchen stove, so on winter mornings she'd get up at five and go down to the stores to get wooden boxes to burn.

Two years later all that changed. Mother married again. They moved to Fordham, and June had a room all her own. At first, she just sat and looked at the room. She'd even go sit in the closet, it was so big. But the miracle of the world was getting four pairs of shoes all at once. Every night she'd set them up in a row, so they'd be the first thing she'd see when she woke in the morning. Otherwise, she'd have thought she'd dreamed them.

All through school she kept pretty much

When Daddy does the dishes, daughter Kristin loves to help . . . but solemnly inspects each and every one! "The Very Thought of You" is next Morgan starrer.

Here's where Dennis Morgan proves that folks like good plain food and plenty of it when they hail, as he does, from WISCONSIN

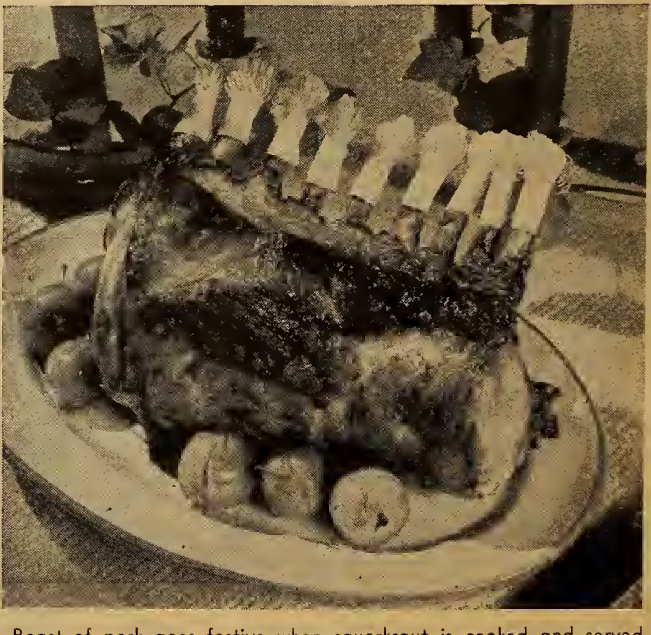
What's Cookin' America

■ WHEN we learned, recently, that both Dennis Morgan and his wife, Lillian, were born and brought up in Wisconsin, we decided that here indeed was a golden opportunity to find out the sort of fare preferred by folks from "The Beaver State."

This happens to be the very first of the Middle Western States to be featured in this series. We think you'll agree that the choice was a fortunate one when you learn about the many fine recipes we collected from the Morgans for you to try.

To begin with, as this Warner Bros. star pointed out, hearty foods are favored back where he came from. This derives in no small measure from the fact that Wisconsin was extensively settled by groups which escaped from Germany after the revolutionary uprising of 1848 . . . and by others who came from Scandinavian countries and from Switzerland—among whom are included Dennis' ancestors. Naturally these people all brought with them not only their cheese and beer making skills but also their liking for substantial dishes, together with their knowledge of how to prepare them. Couple this with the bountiful harvests produced by the outstanding fertility of the Wisconsin soil, and you'll readily understand why natives of that State establish, early in life, the habit of eating plenty—and well!

In this respect Dennis is certainly no exception. The head of the house of Morgan likes to begin his busy day with a big breakfast. Starts off with a large glass of orange juice; invariably includes toast, coffee and boysenberry jam—this last whipped up for his special delectation by Mrs. Morgan herself. Frequently in-



Roast of pork goes festive when sauerkraut is cooked and served with it, and paper frills top each chop. Spiced crabapples are used here to garnish this Wisconsin specialty of the Morgans.

The fourth in our Regional Recipe series cludes on his breakfast menu "Eggs à la Morgan"—a concoction which he proudly claims to have originated.

A great dinner favorite with the entire family is Pork and Sauerkraut—cooked together for delectable results. Plain boiled potatoes accompany this combination. Pickled beets and onions are served as a salad—while rye bread and beer are musts in Mr. M.'s opinion.

Naturally, since Wisconsin has countless well-stocked streams and around two thousand lakes, Dennis has always been an enthusiastic fisherman with a marked preference for the fresh-water variety of fish—the kind he used to catch in the northern part of Wisconsin where he spent his boyhood vacations. Likes nothing better than to cook his own catch, on the spot, frying the small ones in deep fat, after dipping them in cornmeal. However when it comes to big fellows, like "Muskies" (the wily Muskalonge which often weighs around 35 pounds), Dennis recommends planking and baking at home, in a moderate oven (350 degrees F.)—allowing 15 minutes to the pound. You serve this sportsman's special right on the plank—with a garnish of radishes, green onions, lemon slices and parsley and a large red apple in the critter's mouth. (Wisconsin here we come!) With planked fish of all kinds, Lillian Morgan serves cole slaw and her Special French Fries. "No dessert afterwards, except fresh fruit and cheese," specified her handsome husband. "Wisconsin cheese, of course," he added with understandable loyalty!

Speaking of cheese, once again, Dennis also likes to cook up a tangy rarebit, occasionally. Claims he has worked out a method that assures unusual smoothness and mellowness of flavor. And we agree!

Where desserts are concerned, we did not find our host overly enthusiastic. True, he can never say "no" to one of his wife's Angel Food Cakes. And no wonder, for Lillian turns out an Angel Food that is not only as white as the driven snows on Wisconsin pines but is surprisingly moist in the bargain—this last being a noteworthy feature when you think how dry such cakes often are. Excellent bakers, these Wisconsin women. You see we tried her recipe so we know whereof we speak.

Occasionally, however, Mr. M. can be persuaded to eat a portion of a colorful Fruit Whip which Mrs. M. fixes especially for their three kids, who adore it! Nice part about this dessert is that you can make it with any kind of canned fruit.

WOULDN'T YOU LIKE TO HAVE TESTED AND SURE-TO-SUCCEED RECIPES FOR DENNIS MORGAN'S FAVORITE DISHES? Then be sure to send for this month's free recipe leaflet which tells you how to prepare some pretty special fare: Roast Pork with Sauerkraut, Wisconsin Rarebit, Eggs à la Morgan, Special French Fries and Versatile Fruit Whip. Not to mention Holiday Angel Food . . . which takes a lot of egg whites, it's true, but makes up for this by not calling for a single red point. Now that's a thought! "So What ?"

This curious character isn't any one you know. It certainly isn't any one we know. In fact we don't believe the man exists who wouldn't prefer a crisp, white shirt to one that looks dingy and gray.

But we have known women who acted as though their husbands couldn't tell the difference. Not deliberately, mind you! They just didn't know how to get all the dirt out of shirts—or any badly soiled garment.

We get to know these women because a lot of them write to us—when they try Fels-Naptha Soap. They say this mild, golden soap, blended with naptha, makes washing quicker and easier. That it gets things sweeter and cleaner. They say they'll never use anything else.

These women are housekeepers—just like you. So we're passing the tip along.

to herself, being sort of embarrassed about her brace. You couldn't notice it unless you touched her, so she figured if she didn't play with anybody, they wouldn't know. At Roosevelt High School she did make some friends—exclusively girls—and won scholastic honors. She had to be smart, says June, because there was nothing else to do. Of course she'd rather have been popular, but boys never knew she was there. To hide the hurt, she'd brag. "Oh, I could have gone to the dance, but I'm too busy studying to be a doctor." Having spent so much time in hospitals, she worshipped doctors.

One afternoon she went to see "The Gay Divorcee" and, as Fred Astaire danced, something went bong! in her head, the way it does when you get a bright idea. She stayed all day and played hookey from school to go back the next day and the next. Eighteen times she sat through "The Gay Divorcee," and in her room she practised Astaire's routine. Well, anyway, it was based on his routine.

Now she really had something to brag about. "I can dance like Fred Astaire," she told the girls.

So they ganged up on her—cut out a newspaper ad for chorus girls and stuck it under her nose. "Why don't you go down and audition? We dare you—"

She couldn't very well back down, after all that bragging. Next morning, a small figure in bobby socks, flat heels and no make-up stood shaking in the shadow of the theater where "Sing Out the News" was in preparation. Beautiful girls, looking as if they'd stepped out of Vogue, swung gaily through the doors. June turned to go home.

the lesser evil . . .

And have the kids say you weren't good enough? You're going in!

But I'm not good enough.

You bet you're not. But you're going in and let them tell you so.

She pushed herself in and up to a table, where a man took her name. She saw that the other girls had brought their own music. When her name was called, she said, "I do a different kind of dancing. With*out* music—" and she went into the Allyson version of the Astaire routine. They hired her at thirty-five a week, and she had to suppress an impulse to tell the man he'd made an awful mistake, and didn't he want to change his mind?

Instead she flew home and called all the girls. "I'm a big Broadway actress." They sent her orchids and wires on opening night and even forgave her for being in the last row, where they couldn't see her. At the end of two months Mother put her foot down. June was to finish high school. Then, if she still wanted to, she could go back.

She finished at 16 and got a job in the chorus of "Very Warm for May." To hear her tell it, they took her because she danced so badly, they thought it was a new style. And they gave her a specialty number to get her out of the chorus, because she gummed things up by never doing the same step twice. Why, they let her understudy the lead in "Higher and Higher," she hasn't figured out yet—unless it was to keep her from singing in the dressing room and driving the other girls crazy.

Be that as it may, the principal came down with pneumonia just before they opened in New Haven, and June stepped in on three hours' notice. Net result: a specialty dance in "Panama Hattie," plus the job of understudying Betty Hutton.

She roomed with Claire Monahan and Betsy Blair—who's married to Gene Kelly now—at the American Women's Club, and they never had enough money for carfare. Till Betty got the measles. June wouldn't wish the measles on anyone, but as long as Betty had to have them, she's terribly grateful that it happened when it did. Because she kind of stopped the show with “All I Got to Get Now is My Man.” And when it was over, somebody knocked at her dressing-room door.

“It's George Abbott. May I come in?”

“Oh, go away—”

It was such a tired rib. The kids knew she'd tried to crash Abbott's office a dozen times, and never got past the office boy.

“I'm really George Abbott, and I'd really like to talk to you.”

What started her heart pounding was the smile in his voice. It sounded real. She pulled the door open, and there stood this regal-looking man. All she remembers of the next fifteen minutes is, he offered her a featured role in “Best Foot Forward,” and she kept gasping “No!” meaning it couldn't be true, but he thought she meant the other kind of no and kept upping the salary, till she collected her wits enough to say yes.

It would be nice to make a good story of her first Broadway opening—with people going wild and a star born overnight, the way it happens in the movies. Only it didn't happen that way. June was up in knots and never gave a worse performance. Even Mr. Abbott said so. As time went on though, she relaxed and improved. M-G-M offered her a contract. She felt terribly flattered, but decided she wasn't ready for the movies yet. Besides, New York was such fun—with her own apartment in Tudor City and enough carfare and the nice boy. She'd be glad to go to Hollywood after the run of the show—if they still wanted her.

They did. One day she stepped off the train at Los Angeles, all scared and thrilled because there'd be a reception committee and flowers and cameramen and a big to-do—anyone who reads the fan magazines knows that. Well, two hours later, honey, she was still standing there. Of course she'd arrived four days ahead of time and neglected to let the studio know. But that slipped her mind for the moment.

She felt very sad—and kept getting sadder by the minute as she climbed into a taxi and drove to the Beverly Wilshire—the only hotel whose name she knew. In her room, she plumbed the depths of sadness. Ten dollars a day said the card tacked to the door. She had fourteen left, of the fifty she'd started out with.

livin' on nothin' . . .

She couldn't stand the sadness. She had to do something to make herself happy again. So she went for a walk and dropped in at a drug store and bought a bottle of her favorite perfume that she'd never been able to afford. This left her with two dollars, but she smelled pretty anyway.

The air must have cleared her head. It dawned on her that nothing but a phone call stood between her and the studio. M-G-M gathered the lost sheep in and put her to work. Pretty soon she was paying dividends.

From a spot in “Girl Crazy” to “Best Foot Forward” to “Two Girls and a Sailor.” That's when June began feeling the difference. Nothing you could put your finger on—just a gradual change in atmosphere. Like smiles instead of stares. Like people taking you in, instead of letting you stand like furniture. Joe Pasternak produced the picture. She thanks him for everything. He's magic. Without him, she'd just be another girl. She says—He said he wanted her for “Brighton Beach,” his next musical. That was enough to make her delirious, but she got more. Pneumonia, first of all. Joe'd come over and see her, while she was convalescing. Just sit and look at her. “How do you

How can you tell your daughter if..

You, yourself DON'T KNOW these intimate physical facts!

You may be able to save your daughter years of unhappiness in her married life ahead if you'll only tell her these intimate physical facts now.

But first — make sure your own knowledge is just as modern, “up-to-date” as it can be — the newer scientific facts on douching. And it WILL BE if you recommend Zonite (discovered by a world-famous Surgeon and renowned Chemist).

Tell Your Daughter This:

Explain how important feminine hygiene is to charm, health and beauty. And how Zonite so capably helps solve one of woman's most serious deodorant problems.

Old-fashioned mixtures of soap, soda and vinegar DO NOT provide the germicidal and deodorant action of Zonite. And don't let anyone tell you they do!

On the other hand don't use old-time over-strong solutions of harmful poisons (many even with skull and crossbones on label) which can actually burn, severely irritate and damage tissues — in time may even impair functional activity of the mucous glands. Untold misery has come from this. When you use Zonite you take no such risk.

So Powerful Yet So Harmless

Your own Doctor will probably tell you no other type of liquid antiseptic-germicide for the douche of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SO SAFE to delicate tissues.

Zonite actually destroys and removes odor-causing waste substances, it helps guard against infection—instantly kills all germs it touches. Of course due to anatomical barriers it's not always possible to contact all germs in the tract. BUT YOU CAN BE SURE OF THIS! No germicide kills germs any faster or more thoroughly than Zonite! It kills all reachable germs—keeps them from multiplying.

Yet Zonite is so harmless. POSITIVELY non-poisonous, non-caustic, non-burning. Use Zonite often as you want without the slightest risk of injury. Follow label directions.

Buy Zonite today from your drugstore—enjoy the advantages of this newer feminine hygiene.

feel? How soon does the doctor think you'll be up?" Almost as if he were in a hurry. But he couldn't be. He had "Music for Millions" to do with Susan Peters, before he'd be ready for "Brighton Beach."

The first day she was out of bed, he phoned. "Are you standing or sitting?"

"Standing."

"Well, sit down. I've got news that may startle you."

They were taking her out of "Brighton Beach," she thought. All right, she'd be brave about it.

"You're going to do the lead in 'Music for Millions.'"

Even sitting down, her head swam. "Wh-what about Susan Peters?"

"She's not well enough to come back yet. We'll have something else for her when she's ready."

"But—she's so wonderful. How can I do a part that was meant for her?"

"Are you willing to let me worry about that?"

"Willing?" By now the tears were rolling down her cheeks. After all, you can't blame her. She'd just had pneumonia. "You worry, dear Joe," she sniffed. "I'll go find a handkerchief."

So she's making "Music for Millions," with "Brighton Beach" still ahead.

She lives in a furnished apartment with a glassed-in shower. The glassed-in shower makes her feel she's arrived. When she first moved in, she'd take eight or nine showers a day.

three wishes . . .

Long ago she decided that when she was grown up, she'd have a gray Persian lamb coat, a blue convertible with the top down and breakfast in bed. After saving up for the coat and the car, she told Bess one day about the three wishes. She truly didn't mean it as a hint, but next morning Bess brought her breakfast in on a tray. "In fairytales," she said, "all the wishes have to come true."

Bess is June's housekeeper, but she's more like a mother. She leaves messages on the phone-pad. "So-and-so wants to take you to dinner. I think you should go." "Such-and-such called. Wants you to call back. I'd advise against it." June never has to ask whom she likes and doesn't. If she goes to the kitchen and puts on a white apron, that means you don't rate. No apron means you're okay with Bess. Richard Powell and David Rose are no-apron people. These two may be Dick and Dave to all the world, but they're Richard and David to June. Nicknames rub her the wrong way.

She thinks the marriage gossip about Richard and herself is silly. How can you talk about marriage when the man won't be free to marry for almost a year? In a year, anything can happen. Of course they're good friends, else they wouldn't see so much of each other. But she goes out with other men, too—Van Johnson, John Hodiak, David Rose. Her best girl friends are Lucille Ball and Dorothy Cooper, a script clerk. She can tell the first time she meets you if she's going to like you—by your eyes and the way you smile.

Her favorite date's a nice quiet dinner and dancing afterwards. Her favorite dance is the rumba—to Harry James' music or Cugat's or David's. She hates big parties, everything's so confusing. It's nicer to go out with one person, then you know where you are. She's twenty now and still doesn't like to drink and expects to feel the same way when she's thirty. Hot coffee's her passion—the smell even more than the taste. She can't stand it in big cups, so she orders one demitasse after another and sets them where the whiff hits her nose. She'd rather eat hay than carrots, adores spinach and Chinese food and practically anything Bess cooks. She loves to stay out of the kitchen. When she had to feed herself in New York, seems all she ever ate was fried eggs and noodles.

She goes in for tailored clothes and subdued colors—though she's learning to wear them bright in California. Designs her own things, because bought clothes don't fit her, but hates to stand for fittings. So she'll dash in with a sketch, glance at materials, say "I'll take that," and start dashing out again, hoping to get away with murder. But they always haul her back.

Shoes are her pet extravagance—that goes back to childhood when she had to stay home while her one pair a year were being mended. Coupons don't bother her. She has enough shoes from before the war to last practically forever. She saves on hats—hasn't worn one since the accident. For months her head was bandaged. "If I ever get these bandages off," she said, "I'll never wear anything on my head again." On account of the accident too, she's a champ swimmer. She had to swim in the school pool every day to strengthen her muscles.

She likes to sew, but can't knit. Starts thousands of sweaters that somebody else has to finish. Which makes her worse than a moron, because people tell her that even morons can knit. They also make fun of her because she wears her fingernails natural and her toenails bright red. It fascinates her to see those little red things peeking out of her shoes. She has two superstitions. Dropping a comb's bad luck, so you have to step on it to break the jinx. And she always wears one thing —like the same ring or the same garter—from the very beginning to the end of a picture.

She collects pigs. That started in New York when the kids in "Best Foot Forward" held a contest. Whoever looked most like an animal would get the animal she looked most like. June won—with a pig. Mind? Don't be silly. She got a present, didn't she? Besides, they said she looked like a cute little pig, not a porker—melody in blue . . .

Her idea of a lovely evening at home is to sit by the fire, read a sad book, listen to heartbreaking music and eat chocolate candies. Even on warm nights, she has the fire going—and the windows open. She loathes jazz. All her records are long hair. She can't exactly explain why she likes her books and music sad—except they give you deeper feelings than the other kind.

All she carted along from New York were her books and the little radio she bought out of her first paycheck. She could never bear to do away with a book, and still has the first one she ever owned. Every year she re-reads "The Stargazer," Van Gogh's life and Dalton Trumbo's "Johnny Got a Gun," sobbing all the way through.

When she has her own home, there'll be a fireplace in every room. And a library solid with books from floor to ceiling. And a big bear rug in front of the main fireplace. She wants to walk all over a bear rug, the way Lana Turner walked over mink in "Ziegfeld Girl." She'll never forget that!

Meantime, dreams are coming true so fast, she's a little scared. It somehow just doesn't seem right to get everything you wish for. Even Fred Astaire. Only thing that made her sad at M-G-M was, they didn't have Fred Astaire. Now they have him, and she can look at him once in a while, and that makes her very happy. Because just look what he did for her.

The woman who knows she is!

Joan and Les are perfect marriage partners. Wise Joan, like so many modern wives, uses Lysol disinfectant for feminine hygiene. Her doctor told her it is an effective germ-killer that cleanses thoroughly and deodorizes. Yet Lysol is so gentle, used in the douche, that it won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues . . . just follow easy directions. "So simple and inexpensive to use!" says Joan. Try Lysol for feminine hygiene.

Check these facts with your Doctor

Lysol is Non-caustic—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. Effective—a powerful germicide, active in the presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). Spreading—Lysol solutions spread and thus virtually search out germs in deep crevices. Economical—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for the douche. Cleanly odor—Lysol deodorizes completely. No odor of its own remains after use. Lasting—keeps full strength, no matter how often it is uncorked.

SLICK MICK

have a sentimental soft streak as wide as a barn door. He's not the kind of Mick who sings "Mavourneen" at the drop of a pratie and weeps in his beer or anything, but—well—when the war first broke, and the Army scattered its skimpy Coast Artillery in the hills back of George's Beverly Hills Home, he spent his evenings lugging coffee and sandwiches to the soldiers shivering in the winter nights at their exposed posts. As a result, George has a couple dozen red hot GI correspondents scattered all over Uncle Sam's far flung fighting posts, and he stays up nights writing them everything he does with his Hollywood pals. And he gets paid back when he receives notes like the one from a Corporal Sid Levine, along with the Samurai sword of a Makin Island Jap captain.

"Dear Moiph," scribbled the Corp, "right in the middle of a battle comes a mail guy from headquarters and guess what—a letter from my pal! It makes me feel so good, Moiph, that I knock off a few extra Jap bums with my tommy-gun, and one won't be needing this carving knife no more, so I'm sending it along to you."

Well, that in turn made George feel so good that he drove right off across country that night, although he was dead tired, put on two shows in an out-of-the-way Army camp before he passed out cold from exhaustion!

But if George Murphy is a tender Harp at heart, he's also loaded with the other rugged virtues that make an Irishman the greatest collection of contradictions on the face of the earth. He's got spunk and energy and drive and cockiness. He's got good humor and friendliness, the knack of getting what he goes after and a healthy portion of good old Irish luck, too. It's the combination, I suspect, that has made George Murphy what he is today—Hollywood's busiest and about its most personally popular star.

This past movie semester, for instance, George knocked out five straight pictures without one day's rest in between. He headlined the Red Cross Hollywood Speakers Bureau plugging the Blood Bank, Bonds and other war efforts. He managed to stock his Oregon ranch with pigs and cows and things. He made a whirlwind entertainment tour of all the Army hospitals in the Southeast U. S. He served as Vice-President of the Screen Actors Guild and won the nomination for its next prexy. And along the way somewhere, George managed to become a proud papa for the second time.

something for the dicks . . .

The other night, George was working off his surplus energy, jogging along the streets of Beverly Hills after dusk, togged out in an old pair of pants, sneakers and a sweat shirt to work up a steam. He was pounding along when a police patrol car pulled up. Two cops jumped out. They were green officers, and they didn't know George Murphy from Adam.

They grabbed him. "Now where do you think you're runnin off to, Bud?" they inquired. "What second story job did you just pull off?"

George told them who he was.

"Oh, yeah?" barked one cop. "Well, I'm Clark Gable. Suppose you tell us just what you've been up to now in the last few hours."

So George rattled off what he'd been doing: Working at the studio all day. A Command Performance radio show after that, home for dinner, then the workout.

[illegible] throu[illegible]re," revealed George, "I've got a meeting of the Screen Actors Guild in Hollywood."

"Then what are you running around for?" one asked. "Why aren't you taking a snooze?"

The cops scratched their heads. "I guess you ain't any burglar," the other sighed. "Looks to me like you're just plain nuts!"

George is always getting something like that. But when people shake their heads and infer he is nutty to knock himself out, it turns out he's nutty like a few foxes. When George made "Bataan," Bob Walker, who played in that rugged epic with him, caught George pumping himself up and down off the floor one afternoon right before George, Lloyd Nolan and Bob were to go into the most strenuous scene in the script. It was one where they had to come up over a rock cliff, worn out, panting and out of breath. The climb was bad enough. But here was Murphy knocking himself out doing push-ups as fast as he could!

Bob Walker tapped him on the back. "Will you kindly tell me, Murph, why you're doing that?" he inquired softly. "Or have you lost your mind?"

George just grinned. "Try it, kid," he suggested. "And take a tip from an old timer. When you're supposed to be out of breath, get yourself that way. Then you won't have to worry about it when you shoot the scene. Listen, in this acting racket, the fewer things you have to think about in a scene, the better you'll do what's left."

Pretty soon Bob Walker was down on the floor wearing himself out, too. He found it worked.

smack-in-one . . .

Luckily, one look at Murph and you can tell in a minute that the strenuous life isn't going to get him down much longer than it takes to get back his wind. Beneath George's long chin and twinkling gray eyes, he packs the lean and wiry build of an athlete. It's no accident. For one thing, George's dad was Mike Murphy, the most famous athletic coach the University of Pennsylvania ever had. Mike died when George was just a shaver, but his spirit lived on in George. At Pawling, Peddie and Yale, too, George Murphy was a crack athlete—baseball, football, track. Once, against his rival school, Taft, he won a track meet all by himself with five first places and one second. Even today he looks as if he could step right on to the gridiron, the diamond or a cinder path and get going at a moment's notice.

His best friend is Bob Montgomery—pardon, Commander Robert Montgomery, USNR, whom he met at school at Pawling, N. Y. (Thomas Dewey's home town). In fact, it was Bob Montgomery who started George off on golf, his favorite way of keeping trim today. As George recalls, he wasn't too interested in what he considered an old man's game at that point.

But Bob, who was a links nut, dragged him out on the course one day and said, "Go ahead, hit the ball!" So George slammed a two-iron over a hill, and a man came running back yelling and waving his clubs angrily. He'd smacked a professor, who didn't like Murphy anyway, right in the seat of his pants!

Bob Montgomery is still George's best friend. Every time Bob comes back from sea duty, they get together and laugh over old times, and George listens enviously to Bob's new naval adventures. He swears Commander Montgomery will be right there when the Yanks capture Hirohito. Last time Bob was home, he and his wife and George and his better half, Julie, stepped out for an evening at the Mocambo. They had a benefit whisky raffle that night, and George walked off with the case of Scotch, something like stumbling on to a drawer full of nylons these days in war-dry Hollywood. "You lucky Irishman!" Commander Montgomery kidded.

"Look who's talking about being lucky," retorted George, and he wasn't kidding. Because the one thing that burns Murph up is the fact that he's missed two wars—a guy with the name of Murphy, too! In 1918 George was a nipper, more or less, but tall enough to fool the recruiting officers in Canada. He was staying in Detroit then with his sister, when he slipped over the border one day with another chum and enlisted in the Canadian Army. Things might have worked out okay, ex-

A SHAMPOO FOR THE WHOLE FAMILY

No Dull Film remains on your hair after shampooing with this saponified cocoanut oil formula

NOW AVAILABLE for you . . . Fitch's Saponified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo combines mild Cocoanut Oil and vegetable oils into a perfectly blended shampoo. As recognized authorities on hair care for over 50 years, The F. W. Fitch Company asks you to try this beauty shampoo.

LEAVES HAIR SOFTER, NOT DRYING . . . Helps make your hair feel surprisingly softer . . . look silkier. Prevents that brittle feeling often caused by harsh chemicals found in ordinary shampoos.

"MOUNTAINS OF LATHER" . . . In either hard or soft water, a small amount of Fitch's Saponified Cocoanut Oil gives huge swirls of billowy lather that quickly and efficiently cleanse the hair and scalp.

A TRUE BEAUTY SHAMPOO . . . Leaves no dull "soap film" on the hair because it's double-filtered. Brings out those shy highlights that lend glamour to every hairstyle.

PATENTED RINSING AGENT . . . Goes into action when the rinse water is applied. This special ingredient prevents the forming of "soap curd" on the hair and scalp. No special after-rinse is required and the damp hair combs out easily, without troublesome snarling.

DELIGHTFULLY FRAGRANT . . . You'll like the clean, delicate scent of this clear liquid shampoo and the way it leaves your hair, sweetly fragrant. It is antiseptic—yet has no "antiseptic" odor.

DOES THE LAXATIVE
YOU TAKE
GO TO EXTREMES?

Some Laxatives are Too Strong—

It doesn't pay to dose yourself with harsh, bad-tasting laxatives! A medicine that's too strong can often leave you feeling worse than before!

Others are Too Mild—

And it's unwise to take something that's too mild to give you the relief you need! A good laxative should be gentle, yet should work thoroughly!

But—EX-LAX is the Happy Medium!

Try the
"HAPPY MEDIUM" LAXATIVE

Ex-Lax gives you a thorough action. But Ex-Lax is gentle, too! It works easily and effectively at the same time! And remember, Ex-Lax tastes good—just like fine chocolate! It's as good for women and children as it is for the men-folks. 10c and 25c.

IF YOU NEED A LAXATIVE WHEN YOU HAVE A COLD—

Don't dose yourself with harsh, upsetting purgatives. Take Ex-Lax! It's thoroughly effective, but kind and gentle.

cept that George's sister got mad and tipped off the authorities that her brother was only fifteen. They booted him right out.

This time, the evening of the day the Japs smacked Uncle Sam below the belt at Pearl Harbor, George rushed down to Fort MacArthur and stayed up all night, confidently expecting red-balled bombers to paste the fort that night. But nothing happened, and when he tried to join up, George found, to his disgust, that a flock of school-day injuries put him on the technically unfit shelf.

This Murphy tabs the blackest luck an Irishman could have. But as a matter of fact, in all the crack-ups that made him a four F'er, it was pure Irish luck that let George come out alive. One summer, on vacation from Yale, he took a job in a Pennsylvania coal mine, and the darned thing caved right in on him, crushing him so badly that it's a miracle he wasn't crippled for life. An earlier time, at Peddie Institute, when George was only sixteen, he got kicked on the shin in a football game, and blood poisoning set in. George's leg swelled up like a sausage balloon, and he passed out for three days. He woke up in time to catch the doctor starting to saw his leg off. The doc had George's family's permission and everything, because it looked like a case of that—or else a lily on Murph's youthful chest. But George almost shook the hospital down yelling "No!" and somehow he got well, saving his famous-to-be hoofers right in the nick of time.

the luck o' the Irish . . .

The last time his patron saint was good to George was only two years ago. He and Cary Grant were in New York with their bags all packed ready to board the clipper for Lisbon on a trip to give the North African GI's some entertainment and laughs. Four hours before the big bird took off, George got a wire from the Army chiefs. They told him to go back to Hollywood and play in "This is the Army." That called it off for both of them, and the Clipper zoomed off without them.

When it landed in Lisbon—well, maybe you remember—the pilot crashed in the bay, several people lost their lives, and that beautiful songbird of radio, Jane Froman, was badly battered up. So George Murphy really hasn't any big kicks coming in the Irish luck department. Incidentally, he was dangling a St. Christopher medal from his watch chain that narrow squeak. He's never had it off since.

One of the biggest breaks of Irish luck George Murphy ever had, though, was marrying his wife, Julie. Because there's not a happier, gayer couple in Hollywood, nor two cuter kids than the ones Julie has given George in his son Denny, and his year-old baby darling, Melissa. Besides all this, brown-eyed, pretty, vivacious Julie is the main reason George is where he is today. Not only has she been his backer-upper for years, but Juliette Johnson was the girl who talked George Murphy into taking a crack at show business in the first place.

It didn't take much talking, George recalls, because that was back in the late Twenties, and Murph was down from Yale and facing the cruel world in Manhattan. Chores in Wall Street and other dreary marts of trade didn't click with him a bit. He was in and out of jobs and usually busted like an old light bulb. He stagged in a tiny room in the Nineties. But he could usually scrape up enough to take out Juliette, a professional dancer he'd met. The competition was pretty tough, too, he remembers, because Julie had a beau with a Rolls-Royce and more money than brains who showered her with orchids, took her to all the shows and expensive cafes.

WHOLESALE DIAMOND DEALERS SINCE 1887

George's best efforts were walks along Riverside Drive and a bench shared with sailors and their gals. Sometimes they went roller skating in Central Park, when the cops didn't chase them off. The height of dining luxury was Childs, more often the Automat.

swingin' for their supper . . .

But when they would have enough sugar to go dancing somewhere, Julie, who knew her stuff, told George he was light as a feather. She suggested they work out some routines together. George liked the bright lights and color, the thrills and the quick-punching life of show business. He didn't know beans about it, but he could always dance and clown a little from kidhood on, and no one had ever accused him of being a shrinking violet.

Once, for instance, when George's wallet was flatter than a pancake, and he was itching for any kind of a job, but particularly one somewhere around Broadway, he dropped into a little beer joint where he could get a glass of suds and sometimes a steak on the cuff. The proprietor was singing the blues.

"Wouldn't you know it, Murph," he wailed. "The guitar slapper I got is home sick in bed. And in the upstairs room is a bunch of big-shot customers yelling for entertainment."

"That's tough," sympathized George. "But say, I know four chords on the ukulele, and I can sing some songs. Gimme that guitar. I'll sing for 'em!" He did, too, and made such a solid hit that the customers, who were going on to Philadelphia that night, wanted to lug him along with them. But George grinned and ducked out of the party, later kicking himself soundly. Because one of the merrymakers, he found out, was William Paley, a New York big shot who later became president of CBS.

George and his wife, Julie, have lots of memories to look back on today, most of them good for nostalgic laughs. They worked up their first dance routines, for instance, in a room above a Chinese Chop Suey joint at 96th & Broadway, because that was the only place they could find. They made a deal with the baffled Oriental proprietor to dance for his customers free to pay for the room, and sometimes if they were pretty sharp and his customers clapped, he came across with a little chop suey. And George will never forget the time they got good enough for their first crack at a professional job. The place was called "Ten East Sixtieth" then, it was the "Villa Vallee" later on, and today it's the "Copacabana." The hitch for George was that he and Julie had to dance at teatime, and the job required a cutaway coat and all the trimmings. George had no dough but plenty of cultivated tastes. He went to the best tailor he could find, ordered his expensive outfit and timed the final fitting so the suit would be ready a few minutes before he and Julie went on at the cafe.

Then he sent the tailor to the back room on some excuse and bolted out the door. He thinks the race he made from Fifth Avenue to the tea dance joint tearing along like the banshees were after him with his cutaway flying in the faces of astonished New Yorkers was just about the most spectacular race he ever won. Because George won it all right. The tailor couldn't catch up with him, and two hours later, after he'd played the job and cinched it, George called and made arrangements to pay off his cutaway suit on time. Funny thing, too, the tailor became a pal, and George has been getting his suits made there ever since!

Of course, it's pretty hard to get mad at George Murphy, no matter what he does, a fact Julie discovered in the year or more they worked together as a dance team. So in spite of Rolls-Royce-and-orchid rivals, Murphy won in a walk, as he usually does in everything. "And it's not true," he swears, "that I had to borrow two dollars from Julie for the license. I wasn't broke. I had one dollar—she just lent me the other buck!"

Juliette Murphy hasn't danced a lick professionally since George clicked in the big time. But for a couple of years or more, the team of Johnson and Murphy did all right at Manhattan's swanker bistros, like the Montmartre, Lido, Central Park Casino and the Club Richman. They even went abroad to the Mayfair in London and the Opera Club in Paris. London was where George first became such a good friend of Fred Astaire. Fred and his sister, Adele, were playing in London then. All four stopped at the Grosvenor House, and over midnight spaghetti dinners with the girls in hair curlers and the fellows in almost anything, George and Julie had a ton of fun and learned the ropes from the two top artists. George still calls Fred the guy who put him hep to big time dancing, and they see each other all the time in Hollywood. Fred has even taught George's boy Denny a number of nifty hoof routines.

old acquaintance . . .

George, being the friendly Mick he is, has picked up friends all along the success road who are still pals today. When he finally got going on Broadway in shows like "Good News," "Of Thee I Sing" and "Roberta," he ran into a lot of unknown hopefuls like himself. In "Roberta," for instance, there was a wise-cracking, ski-snooted guy named Bob Hope that nobody had ever heard of. (George swears Bob still owes him for half of their last laundry bill—$1.32 for 2 dress shirts and collars.) And there was a saxophone tooter in that same show, Fred MacMurray. George has known Bing Crosby for years and years, and Hoagy Carmichael, the "Stardust" boy, who's a pal of George's today, was having a terrible time getting a song plugged when he and George first started calling each other by their first names.

Matter of fact, Murph's friends are scattered all over, wherever George has stopped off on his rambles. And once he makes a pal, he hates to lose him. When George came to Hollywood the first time, it was five years before he got back to New York City. All the way back on the train he kept worrying to Julie, "I wonder if there's anybody back there I know?" Gloomily he predicted he'd be a stranger.

But the first day George walked out of his hotel, the St. Regis, there was Big Tom, the traffic cop on the Fifth Avenue corner, cussing cabbies like he'd been doing years ago. He waved genially, "Hiyah, Murph!" George felt better. He strolled into the corner drug store, and the same tobacco counter clerk was there. "Where you been, Murphy?" he asked. "Haven't seen you around." The pay-off was when the newsboy from whom he always snagged a paper in the morning, was still at his old stand hawking the news. He was the only one who knew George had been to Hollywood and was in the movies. "Tell me about them Hollywood dames, Murph," was all he wanted to know.

In Hollywood, besides Bob Montgomery and Fred Astaire, George's best friends are probably Pat O'Brien, whom he knew back on Broadway, Carol Tracy (Spencer's brother), Adolphe Menjou, Jim Cagney and Fred MacMurray. George has gag names for all of them. He calls Adolphe "Froggy," Carol "Front Porch" and Cagney "Soft Talkin' Sam" from Jimmy's way of practically getting right up to your face and whispering in your ear when he talks to you. George likes to tell about the time Ann Sothern threw a wonderful party in Hollywood where he had a terrific time. But next day, when George was rehashing the evening with Jimmy, the Cagney didn't remember anything about it. Because all evening he'd been talking into somebody's shirt front, so absorbed in his intense whispering conversation that he had missed all the evening's fun!

mr. murphy's corn . . .

George, on the contrary, is always on the look-out for laughs and circulates like a phoney nickel. His good Irish nature is always right there with a wisecrack or a joke to keep things moving, at work or play. For instance, at RKO Studio "Step Lively" didn't have a title for a long time, so it was known around the lot as "Sinatra Number Two," since Frankie had made one RKO picture before. It began to irk George, who was also in the opus, so he slipped the doorman a fiver one day. "From now on," said George, "this picture is "Murphy Number Two—get it?" The doorman got it. George kept bribing him until finally everybody on the lot began calling it "Murphy Number Two"—even Frankie, although the first time he heard it, he almost swooned.

The one George pulled on his pal, Pat O'Brien, is almost a Hollywood classic by now. Murphy is uncanny at impersonations, and when the screwy surrealist king, Salvador Dali, was in Hollywood, he called up Pat and in an out-of-the-world accent claimed to be Dali and said he was calling because he simply couldn't help it. He, Dali, considered Pat O'Brien his favorite movie star and one of the world's great actors. All in dialect.

Pat fell for it like a load of coal and was touched. He replied gallantly that he considered Dali the greatest painter in the world. Well, the next day in a Hollywood cafe whom should Pat spy but Dali, so he went over and started thanking him for his tributes and all he got was a blank stare. Finally Dali called a waiter. "Who is this man?" he asked. "Is he crazy?" Pat almost blew up.

Wherever you trail around the studio lots after George Murphy, you find evidence of his enlarged funny-bone. A while back one day on the set of "Having Wonderful Crime," George drew an old overcoat from the wardrobe department for a certain scene. Jamming his hand in the pocket accidentally, he pulled out a sheaf of ancient raffle tickets marked "Take a Chance on a Grand Piano—$1." Instantly he had an idea. In no time at all he had sold every raffle ticket around the set at a buck a throw. Pianos are something you just can't get these days, and the chances went like hot cakes.

But finally a sucker got suspicious. "Where is this grand piano?" he demanded. Luckily, there was one on the next set. That saved the gag for a while until another sleuth found out from the studio business manager that the piano was not for sale, raffle or hire. So George hustled out before he got mobbed and bought a toy piano for the lucky winner. The money went to the GI "Buy-A-Phone-Call" fund. And a couple of lucky soldiers got to talk to their folks back home because of George's cut-ups.

Both George and Julie love to dance, like to dress up and step out. George helped organize the Westside Tennis Club. He also belonged to the Beverly Hills Yachting and Polo Association—which never saw a yacht or a polo pony—but was strictly a stag club meeting in a sound-proof room every two weeks for all-night sessions of poker and gin rummy. And especially when George wasn't working, the Murphys were either having their house full of noisy guests or off somewhere being the same themselves.

One of Murph's favorite rendezvous used to be the Jimmy Cagney shack out back of his house. There Cagney, O'Brien, Murphy, Spencer Tracy, Frank McHugh and assorted movie Irishmen with or without their wives, would stage impromptu vaudeville shows and star impersonations worth thousands if a movie camera could ever catch them. Everybody in Hollywood and on Broadway from years back was lampooned, the beer flowed freely, and the nights were long.

house of murphy . . .

At George's house, what with having neighbors around, the fun had to be a bit more refined, but at that the Merry Murphys did all right with conversation and parlor games. Guggenheim, charades and such and a favorite, Travelogues. One Travelogue (the journey of Balto, the dog, around the world) once went on so long that Cesar Romero, who was playing Balto, and hence had to crouch on the floor, fell sound asleep!

Most of the old fun gang are gone now; out on Pacific islands and in French fields, so Murph, who's left behind to his disgust, depends on his home and his family for what spare minutes of relaxation he has away from his movie and war morale jobs. The house of Murphy sits up near the hills behind Beverly. It's not a showplace, but it's big enough, comfortable and homey with pine-panelled walls, antiques and chintzy chairs here and there. No interior decorator got near it; George and Julie, mostly Julie, knew what they wanted, and they waited to get it, although for the first couple of years they lived in the place with hardly a stick of furniture. Their first Christmas, for instance, all the furniture the front room sported was the Christmas tree. Now it's rich with the rare antiques and special pieces that George and Julie had in mind from the start but had to wait to find.

George is fastidious that way. He likes good furniture, good clothes, good food and drink. Although he has been in Hollywood almost a decade now, he still buys his haberdashery at Brooks Brothers, New York's smart men's store, and has his suits tailored by Earl Benham—the self-same tailor who fashioned George's fugitive cutaway, away back when. George's pet extravagance is linen handkerchiefs. He has stacks of them. But while whatever he gets is usually the best he can buy, Murph takes good care of everything. He has a Cadillac, for instance, that he has nursed like a baby and today the speedometer reads 200,000 miles. He has some Dunhill pipes so old and well-smoked that they're black.

George is neat as a pin around the house—likes to keep dressed up, and if guests are coming, always puts on a coat and tie—something that's seldom done in the relaxed movie colony. When he steps out, too, he always wears a stiff collar, which makes Southern Californians stare. The only sartorial slip Murph allows himself alone at home is bare feet. He thinks walking around without shoes keeps his dancing dogs healthy. When he does slip on his number nines, he always puts the right shoe on first, it's his major superstition. He showers and shaves twice a day, keeps his clothes hung up neatly, always slips the detective stories he likes tidily back on the shelves and never spills a cigarette ash on Julie's rugs or spots a table with his favorite Scotch-and-plain after dinner. In short, he's a model spouse around the house.

But the minute he hits the studio, George doesn't pick up a thing, tosses clothes, phonograph records, fan mail, old cigarette

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN

Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.
